COMMITTEE VOTES CODE CHANGE TO CLOSE LOOPHOLE

The Code of Fair Campaign Practices has been amended to close a loophole. It is the first revision in the Code since establishment of the Fair Campaign Practices Committee in 1954. The amendment was approved at a special meeting of the Committee in New York on October 15.

The seventh, or "repudiation" plank of the Code has been amended to read:

> I SHALL IMMEDIATELY AND PUBLICLY REPUDIATE support deriving from any individual or group which resorts, on behalf of my candidacy or in opposition to that of my opponent, to the methods and tactics which I condemn.

The change centers on the phrase "on behalf of my candidacy." In the original version, no reference was made to unfair tactics used against candidate A without specifically endorsing candidate B.

The loophole came to light during the 1958 campaign when a private citizen issued handbills denouncing a Congressional candidate. The leaflets did not endorse his rival. When the offended candidate charged that the handbills were libelous and demanded his opponent repudiate them, the opponent, after reading the "fine print" of the Code, decided he was not, as the Code then stood, obliged to repudiate, since the offending literature did not mention him.

The Committee, in voting unanimously for the amendment shown above, felt the revision more accurately reflected the spirit of the Code than the original wording.

SMEAR STUDY WIDELY QUOTED DESPITE LUNIK, 'K' VISIT

Nationwide press coverage and editorial comment resulted from the September 14 release of the second biennial state-by-state Smear Study of the Fair Campaign Practices Committee. The public attention won by the report was noteworthy by any standard, but especially so in view of its release date: the day after the Russian Lunik hit the moon and the day before Khrushchev arrived in Washington.

Highlights of the study were:

- 1958 saw twice as much dirty campaigning as 1956.
- Smears that backfired were up, to 55 per cent vs. 33 per cent in '56.
- Most unfair campaigning continued to originate outside party organizations.
- Smears based on race or religion more than doubled the '56 level.
- Roman Catholics became the prime targets in this area.

Copies of the full report are available on request.

SMEAR LIGHT IN OFF-YEAR ELECTIONS

In election for statewide and national office, 1959 was an off-year's off-year. Only Kentucky elected a governor in November and there were no special elections to fill Congressional vacancies anywhere in the nation.

Municipal campaigns attracted little wide attention save for San Francisco and Cincinnati. In the Bay city a virulent and old-fashioned smear sheet used caricatures of Jewish merchants and offensive "Jewish dialect" to rally hate against mayoral candidate Russell L. Wolden. Anonymously printed and mailed, the piece enraged supporters of both Wolden and his successful opponent, incumbent Mayor George Christopher, and counted little in an already bitter campaign.

In Cincinnati a Negro city council candidate, Ted Berry, was the target of a classic whispering campaign ("He'll move a colored family into every block in the city.") Unlike the San Francisco situation, observers believe the whispers helped beat Berry in Cincinnati. He ran tenth in a field of 29 for the nine-man council, despite efforts of a non-partisan citizens' committee to fight the smear.

CONFERENCE SCHEDULE FEATURES MUNICIPAL LEAGUE PANEL

Special conference activities in 1959 have included work with the National Conference of Christians and Jews and a repeat of the 1958 panel discussion at the annual meeting of the National Municipal League.

At this year's NML Conference on Government, at Springfield, Mass., the Committee sponsored a panel on the topic, "Community Responsibility for Clean Elections." Moderated by FCPC Chairman Charles P. Taft, a League Council member, the panel featured these participants: Ward Duffy, editor of the Hartford Times; Bernard Hennessy, professor of political science, University of Arizona, on leave with the Democratic National Committee; Rev. Dr. Forrest L. Knapp, general secretary of the Massachusetts Council of Churches; Very Rev. Msgr. Francis J. Lally, editor of The Pilot, official newspaper of the Archdiocese of Boston; and Dr. William Prendergast, associate director of research of the Republican National Committee. The meeting took place on November 17.

Last spring FCPC Executive Director Bruce L. Felknor addressed a meeting of the Religious Liberty Committee of the National Conference of Christians and Jews on the topic of "Bigotry in the 1960 Elections." In November he participated in a panel on Religion and Politics at the annual meeting of the NCCJ.

The conference program, inaugurated last year, will be emphasized further in 1960.

LIBRARY OF CAMPAIGN LITERATURE PROJECTED

Early in 1959 political science professors at leading universities began to ask the Committee to establish a library of campaign literature which would be available for scholarly research. With help from summer session students, the Committee explored the dimensions of the problem.

The further it was studied the more involved the picture became -- and the more apparent was the need for such a facility. Even campaign managers were unable to reconstruct the whole picture of campaign literature, advertising, and radio and television speeches, in a campaign only a few months old.

The summer's study indicated probable cost for a two-year pilot project to establish the library in the 1960 campaigns would approximate $120,000 -- more than double the projected budget for the entire Committee's basic operation in 1960. It now is likely that one foundation will pick up the tab for costs of establishing the complicated mechanism of political science students and faculty supervisors necessary to collect the materal: copies of every piece of special literature, every newspaper ad, tape of every radio spot and film of all TV time purchased for use by candidates in state-wide, Congressional and Presidential races. Cooperating universities would receive duplicate sets of the material for their own states. The projected grant is contingent on raising elsewhere $54,000 for the balance of the first year's operation. Other foundations are being approached for this aid. Without it the project cannot be undertaken.

TRADE GROUP TO BACK TEACHING AIDS

A New York trade association may break the log jam that has kept a teaching aids program, developed two years ago by the Fair Campaign Committee, out of the nation's high schools on a large scale. Teachers in every community of the 20-odd that tested the material acclaimed it but it was impossible to find foundation support for translating the material from mimeographed form to a printed and illustrated version.

Now a New York metropolitan area trade association has indicated it will meet production costs for the program's use in the entire New York area. In addition to making a properly presented set of supplementary school material available in New York, the offer probably will set the stage for similar local or regional underwriting of expenses in other metropolitan centers, thus meeting mounting requests from teachers and school boards to get the program off the ground.

The material helps young citizens to learn to identify smear tactics in an election situation, and stimulates them to develop judgments and values relating to election tactics. Other developments on the teaching aids program: Colleges have requested its adaptation for introductory political science courses. Several church groups have asked that it be modified for use by adult discussion groups.

FIRST STATE ELECTION REFLECTS HAWAII'S TOLERANCE

Hawaiian voters on July 28 chose their first state government and U.S. Congressional delegation -- and reinforced with a bang the Aloha State's reputation for racial tolerance. For their top five jobs, Hawaiian voters picked: a governor of Irish ancestry; a lieutenant-governor whose ethnic background is largely Hawaiian, partly Chinese; one U.S. Senator of pure Chinese ancestry; another (a caucasian) who was born in Kansas; and a second-generation Japanese Congressman.

At the outset of the campaign all major candidates of both parties signed the Code of Fair Campaign Practices. Sparked by the Honolulu Star-Bulletin, the island press stressed the Code repeatedly. From the standpoint of fair play, the outcome was no surprise. An observer reporting to the Fair Campaign Practices Committee added this P.S.:

"The complete lack of success of several candidates who have campaigned in an unfair or bitter manner during the past few years has indicated to all concerned that such tactics are not acceptable to the voters of the new State of Hawaii."

POLITICAL SCIENCE 'INTERN' TO FCPC

The Citizenship Clearing House, which sponsors an "internship" program for qualified college graduate students in political science, has created an internship for the Fair Campaign Practices Committee. Under the arrangement, a graduate student from nearby Hunter College will be assigned to the Committee for research and staff work which otherwise would be impossible to budget.

The CCH move also constitutes important recognition of the value and impact of the Fair Campaign Committee's work. Other such internships are provided for the Democratic and Republican National Committees. Some state affiliates of CCH have comparable programs in local and state government, and a similar program will be launched next summer at the two national political conventions.

BROTHERHOOD WEEK WILL INVOLVE FAIR CAMPAIGN MATERIAL

The special emphasis of Brotherhood Week 1960 will, in many state and local regions of the National Conferences of Christians and Jews, be on fair campaign practices, NCCJ officials have told the Fair Campaign Practices Committee.

An example is Wisconsin, where all local NCCJ operations save one have determined to build the year's program activities around the importance of decent campaigning. The state regional office has developed special material for adult groups, schools and civic clubs, and in addition will use background and reference material developed by the Fair Campaign Practices Committee and the national headquarters of NCCJ. The Fair Campaign Committee's teaching aids program will be made available through the state NCCJ to high schools.

Similar programs are being discussed and planned in other states. The effort is part of this Committee's campaign to get its operations under way early in 1960, particularly in states with early primaries.

DEFICIT MAY CRIPPLE START OF ELECTION YEAR PROGRAM

Each year since 1954 the Fair Campaign Practices Committee has been able to build on the foundation of the preceding year's activity. Today the roster of significant accomplishments has brought praise from politicians, scholars, civic and religious leaders, the press.

Like everyone else, however, we find it impossible to pay the printer with praise. As 1959 nears its end the Committee faces a deficit of nearly $10,000. This can be crippling, at a time when our program must be building up steam for the hottest election in years.

If you have not yet made your 1959 contribution to the Committee, please do it now. It is sorely needed. And it is tax-deductible.

Code of Fair Campaign Practices

There are basic principles of decency, honesty and fair play which every candidate for public office in the United States has a moral obligation to observe and uphold, in order that, after vigorously contested but fairly conducted campaigns, our citizens may exercise their constitutional right to a free and untrammeled choice and the will of the people may be fully and clearly expressed on the issues before the Country.

THEREFORE:

I SHALL CONDUCT my campaign in the best American tradition, discussing the issues as I see them, presenting my record and policies with sincerity and frankness, and criticizing without fear or favor the record and policies of my opponent and his party which merit such criticism.

I SHALL DEFEND AND UPHOLD the right of every qualified American voter to full and equal participation in the electoral process.

I SHALL CONDEMN the use of personal vilification, character defamation, whispering campaigns, libel, slander, or scurrilous attacks on any candidate or his personal or family life.

I SHALL CONDEMN the use of campaign material of any sort which misrepresents, distorts, or otherwise falsifies the facts regarding any candidate, as well as the use of malicious or unfounded accusations against any candidate which aim at creating or exploiting doubts, without justification, as to his loyalty and patriotism.

I SHALL CONDEMN any appeal to prejudice based on race, creed, or national origin.

I SHALL CONDEMN any dishonest or unethical practice which tends to corrupt or undermine our American system of free elections or which hampers or prevents the full and free expression of the will of the voters.

I SHALL IMMEDIATELY AND PUBLICLY REPUDIATE the support of any individual or group which resorts, on behalf of my candidacy, to the methods and tactics which I condemn.

I, the undersigned, candidate for election to public office in the United States of America, hereby endorse, subscribe to, and solemnly pledge myself to conduct my campaign in accordance with the above principles and practices, so help me God.

HANDBILLS AND THEIR PREPARATION

It goes without saying that preparation of handbills and the know-how of doing it is a must for any union organizer.

On larger projects it may be possible to assign someone with experience to doing publicity and preparing the printed material for the campaign. But this is not always possible -- nor is it necessary.

Preparing a handbill can be done easily if we just follow a few simple principles, using our heads, keeping our eyes and ears alert for situations, developments that lend themselves to visual presentation. We can also do some manufacturing of situations connected with a campaign which likewise lend themselves to visual presentation in handbills.

Essentially organizers are salesmen, their primary function being to sell unionism. As salesmen, organizers must be familiar with the proper techniques, the most important of which is advertising.

Organizers must depend to a great extent upon the use of written material to put their views across. It is necessary to know how to prepare this material properly. Three essential principles must be observed if handbills are to produce desired effects. These three principles are: 1) Simplicity 2) Readability 3) Repetition.

Simplicity merely means that we don't try to say too much at one time. Pick out one or two simple ideas and make them the inclusive subject of the handbill. The essence of handbill simplicity is found in the slogan. Slogans do not have to be clever, nor do they have to rhyme, but they should put the point across in as few words as possible. Arguments supporting a position should be clearly stated. You don't have to give every available shred of evidence to prove you are right. Select at most two or three main points in your favor and hammer them home.

Readability simply means that written material is presented in a way which invites reading. It should not repel potential readers. A frequent mistake made by inexperienced pamphleteers is indiscriminate cramming of written material on a sheet of paper. The result: A black mass of type.

White space is not wasted space. To prove this for yourself, look at some newspaper advertisements. There is usually much more white space than black. This makes the message stand out clearly. In mimeographed handbills particularly, care should be given to frequent breaks in the material to provide necessary white space. Short paragraphs and short sentences should predominate. Vary body copy by underlining some important sentence or words and capitalizing others. Keep margins wide.

Repetition should be used with discretion but it should be used nevertheless. To put over the single idea it should ordinarily be stated about three times, presented from different angles if possible but sticking to the main point you seek to get across. Over-use of repetition may backfire if care isn't used but on the whole, it has its advantages. These three cardinal rules -- simplicity, readability and repetition form a solid basis for preparation of effective handbills. Objective is to catch the reader's eye, hold it to the end of the handbill and get your point across during this period.

Handbills are of two types -- printed and mimeographed. The printed job lends itself to wider and more numerous distribution, the mimeographed project lends itself to use in the smaller campaigns or for local use in a larger drive.

Just because a handbill is printed, don't think that it is necessarily better than one which is mimeographed. Often use of a handbill that is printed on a small project may have a harmful effect. We may create an impression that we are slick, that we are careless about spending money. It may backfire and aid our opposition, creating the effect that we are trying to swamp the opposition in a tide of fancy material.

The organizer standing in the rain passing out forlorn looking mimeographed handbills creates a much more favorable impression than an organizer passing out fancy printed handbills, wearing an expensive fur coat. Whether a handbill is printed or mimeographed, the principles are the same. One stated earlier was simplicity. Don't forget the short sentence, short paragraph idea. Don't forget the importance of keeping the handbill idea simple (usually only one separate idea to a handbill). Small amount of copy on a page, and where pictures or drawings are used keep them simple.

REMEMBER YOUR AUDIENCE

Don't expect your readers to know as much about unions as you do. On the other hand, don't talk down to them. Walk slowly, but don't crawl. They may not know much about unions but they are not children.

In sizing up your audience, it is good to sit quietly thinking about how you yourself would react to what you plan to say in the handbill then tone down what you plan to say about 50%.

Remembering your audience, it is well to know as much about the group as you can possibly learn. If it is a group with long union experience, you need one approach. It is has been represented by a pretty effective independent union your approach is a little different. If it is a group which has been represented by a weak independent union, it will be still different and if it has never had a union, your approach again will need to be different.

Knowledge of territorial differences, even colloquialisms among local slang is important. Decide whether the group you are speaking to is ultra-conservative or liberal. Learn how important such things as religion, home life, participation in civic affairs, politics and other similar ideas are to the group. Trim your sails accordingly.

All situations need different and special approaches and this applies to preparation of handbills as much as it does to other aspects of organizing work.

Let's consider a situation leading up to an NLRB election.

If a group has certain pre-conceived notions about AFL-CIO or about unions in general, a frontal attack on these prejudices will just get their backs up and make your job more difficult. Remember when we write handbills for use in organizing as in other types of organizing work it sometimes is necessary to soft pedal things like our affiliation or answer such questions as to why are unions a bunch of rackets, and other equally silly objections. We are organizing. We don't have time to preach. We don't have time to get into arguments. We don't have time to do a complete educating job. That can wait until we win the election. Keep your eye on that immediate objective, winning the election.

If a handbill helps us win, it is a good one. If it doesn't help it is more than a waste of time.

IS THE SUBJECT OF THE HANDBILL IMPORTANT TO YOUR AUDIENCE?

Ask yourself this question. Don't worry about how important it is to yourself. Ask how important it is to the workers you are trying to organize.

In deciding how important it is to them remember that all people think first of themselves. "The world revolves around my head," is a good thing to remember.

So we ask ourselves: Are these workers interested in wage and other contract gains? Of course. What about seniority, job security, layoffs, automation, pensions, speed up? The answer again is yes.

But from here on we begin to get into a field where we must decide the degree of interest. We ask ourselves the question: Just how deeply interested are they in the subject?

Some arbitrary decisions have to be made at this point. People are interested in different things and some are more deeply affected by some things than are others. Older people are more concerned about pensions than the younger ones. Likewise, workers are affected to different degrees at different times. Timing is important. When layoffs are imminent, workers respond more adequately to subjects concerned with seniority and other contract matters affecting job security than they do when employment is increasing.

The type of supervision prevailing in a company has much to do with interest in such things as the speedup and excessive supervision. Reaction to such matters depends on the degree of pushing being done by the supervisors -- and who is doing the pushing.

Finally, ask yourself if the content of the handbill fits the group being organized.

IS IT ATTRACTIVE? -- AN EYE CATCHER?

Now we get into technical principles of handbill preparation. These principles are fairly simple. We'll tell you about some of them.

Heading

This can be a single line across the top of the handbill -- or at most two lines. It can be two or three lines of large type taking up about two-thirds of the left side of the top of the page. The righthand side at the top may be devoted to a picture, drawing or cartoon. Keep in mind what a newspaper headline looks like. Look at your morning or afternoon newspaper to refresh your memory. Give these opening words all the punch you can. Your objective is to get the reader to go further into your text, but if he doesn't read the entire handbill you want him to get the idea anyway from the opening words.

To do this you use larger type for the opening words or heading. If it is a printed job, that is easy. If it is a mimeographed job, a little practice with a stylus will do wonders in dressing up a stencil.

Remember - simple statements, simple ideas.

Witty or striking headings and slogans get people to read your handbill but if the witty statement doesn't help make your point it isn't as good as a simple statement of what the handbill is about. Of course, if the witticism does make your point, so much the better.

A cartoon that illustrates the point helps. But if it doesn't do this, if it doesn't attract the reader, it isn't as good as big print, which does.

General Layout

The same principle applies to the over-all layout of a handbill.

There are all kinds of fancy ways to lay out a handbill. You can use a lot of fancy lettering but you don't get prizes for being fancy.

If the technique slows down the reading or is confusing, eliminate the frills and fall back on clearly written, well laid out headlines, and factual copy, straight across the page.

Leaflets are accepted and read while a worker is entering or leaving a building. A girl may be carrying a handbag, possibly an umbrella, maybe some packages. She doesn't have time to puzzle over long words, or long sentences, or to wade through deep paragraphs.

Keep your words as near one syllable as you can. Keep your sentences as short as you can. Stick to one-sentence paragraphs if you can.

Before cutting the stencil, take another look at the dummy copy. See if there are any sentences that can be cut in two.

The simpler and more directly you say what you have to say, the better.

Final Punchline

Sometimes you can end a handbill with the same words, or words which mean the same as you used in the heading. If you can do this, so much the better. Sometimes you can end it with a slogan.

Remember - and this applies to heading, body copy and ending - slogans, catch phrases and tricky statements have a way of catching on and being repeated. Americans are slogan-minded people. They catch on to them quickly and pass them along to others. Use them as often as possible. Repeating the same ones over and over again helps deepend the impression and makes their use more widespread and more effective.

TYPES OF HANDBILLS

There are three general types of handbills which we'll discuss. These are the announcement handbill, the teaching handbill and the action handbill. Most any handbill you can think of would fall into one of these three general types.

The Announcement Handbill

This type doesn't have to carry the punch of other types. Usually you are trying to arouse interest in the activity you are advertising by use of copy and drawings that suggest what you are announcing. A drawing of a speaker at a table or microphone suggests a meeting. A drawing of people dancing suggests a dance. A drawing of people at a picnic suggests a picnic.

Words used in the heading like "Come to the Meeting" or "Let's have a Picnic" or "You are Invited" or "Shall we Dance?" fit in with the picture to describe the activity you are promoting.

Include time and place (and directions how to get there, if needed) and the names of special dignitaries, if they are coming. That is about all. Almost no copy, letting the bare facts, the illustration and the heading tell the story.

The Teaching Handbill

The teaching handbill makes its point in the headline and in the final large type. Illustrations may be used but are not always necessary. The slogan used in the headline may not even fit here. People don't learn all the facts by just reading slogans.

Your text in this type of handbill is the important part. The sentences, and the paragraphs and the words should be short, but the amount of copy can run to considerable length. If the point you are making is important, and isn't known to the people reading the handbill they will want the facts that make the case.

A teaching handbill is effective if it is honest, and if it gets the workers to thinking -- thinking almost anything about the subject you are on, except that you are a liar.

Action Handbills

Action handbills are simple and positive. They center on one single idea or thought. They are designed to get someone to go out and do something -- immediately. The urge to join CWA or the urge to vote -- and vote for us -- are examples of action handbills.

Handbills in general should be written around experiences the people you are writing to have -- incidents on the job, in the office or shop, in the community, or such things as prices and wages about which they could be expected to feel deeply.

If you cite the name of someone everybody knows, so much the better. Be careful, though, that the use of his name is all right with him.

If you can make the handbill a report or testimonial of someone everybody knows, that's good. Be careful here, too. Don't use the same person over and over. People may just think you are building that person up.

The facts in a handbill should be straight. If you are in doubt about a statement, don't make it. People are just as smart as you, and if they catch you lying about things they know about, they won't believe you on things they don't know about. Talk the special job language of the people who read the leaflet. Writers have a fancy name for this. They call it "significant detail." All this means is that you are using phrases and words that are familiar to those who read your material and which, to them, makes the copy more authentic.

Incidentally, it also shows that you know your industry and know what you are talking about. It leads to closer identification between you and the group you seek to organize and means that they will have greater confidence in you.

Finally, it is important not to try to prove too much in a handbill.

If your opposition is a weak independent union, it's all right to call them that. But don't try to prove that they are tools of the company -- unless you can really prove it. Even if you can prove it, you may have trouble convincing the people reading your handbill that you aren't just slinging mud.

It's far better to use an affirmative approach, showing your readers what CWA can do for them and what they can do for themselves through membership in CWA. Ignore your opposition as much as you can.

The chances are most people will believe you when you say the opposition union is a weak independent, because that probably checks with their own experience. But they probably won't believe that it's run by a bunch of crooks, even if it is.

If you attack the company do it in a general way, being specific only about results of company action, such as low wages, unfavorable working conditions or other such things. Don't try to convince the workers that everybody from the foreman on up is a petty thief.

The chances are that the workers will believe you if you say wages should be higher, or that the company is working them too hard or that hours should be shortened. They will believe you because that checks with their own experience and because you will be reconfirming what they want to believe. If you stick to facts you won't be getting yourself in trouble. A handbill is too powerful a weapon to louse up with exaggerations or misstatements or hooey.

If you think handbills aren't powerful just remember that most organizing drives are kicked off with a handbill distribution at company exchanges or at a plant gate.

SOME SUBJECT IDEAS

Ideas for handbill subjects generally suggest themselves from events or circumstances in a particular campaign. Many of them, though, are ideas which we use over and over again, to cover situations which are present in almost all organizing drives to a greater or less degree.

Here are a few ideas for handbill subjects which have been used from time to time in previous CWA organizing drives. Some are better than others, naturally. Some repeat the same general idea in different words.

This list is by no means complete. It is not intended to be. Your own knowledge and your own analysis of the organizing situation will suggest others.

Usually handbills should be made up on standard 8½ x 11 stock. That's a convenient size to handle at a building entrance. It's also a standard size for mimeograph paper.

There are a lot of other ideas which can and should be used in leaflet distribution. These include half-size four-page leaflets, small one-page handouts, four-page publications with special mastheads, and others. Each of these types lends itself to some form of idea presentation.

Experience will show you which should be used--and when. Some of them can be used with no help other than a borrowed typewriter and mimeograph machine. Others are more ambitious and need professional assistance.

But it's surprising how many of them can be put to good use by the enterprising organizer. And the effects are surprisingly good.

Here is a one-page instruction sheet in use of the stylus on stenciles and sample drawings which you can trace on a stencil to dress it up. We have also included sample type sizes which you can use for headings and sub-headings in your handout.

Let's see what you can do with this material.

HOW TO DRAW AND LETTER ON STENCILS

FIRST make a layout.

Type a dummy on ordinary paper, allowing the right amount of space for the large letters and illustrations you are going to trace. Lay this dummy out exactly as it is to appear on the finished job. Trace your illustration and large letters on it in the proper place.

USE A MIMEOSCOPE if one is available. If it isn't, you can do an acceptable job in an emergency by fastening the dummy and the stencil to an ordinary window pane with scotch tape, where sunlight is shining through.

Make sure, however, you place the flexible writing plate between the stencil and the dummy copy so that the stencil will be cut sharply. A fuzzy line will result if you trace on the stencil with the dummy copy directly against the stencil.

Use the proper stylus. If one isn't available, go to a stationery store and get one. They'll advise you what type you need.

If you make a mistake just blot out the incorrect line with correction fluid. Let dry for a minute or so, replace stencil and re-draw line.

Make sure the pattern is evenly impressed into the stencil.

Maybe you'll spoil a stencil or two when you are first learning how to trace letters and illustrations, but it's easy to do once you have mastered the fundamentals.

In this booklet you'll find illustrations which fit most situations you will come across. Make your selection from this list. Then pick the type size you want to use from the list of sizes also included. Next go to work on your dummy. The rest is up to you.

It is recommended that the better grade of stencils be used for tracing work. Because of the longer fibre, they do not tear as easily as the cheaper grades.

ATLANTA and WASHINGTON

RACIAL DIFFERENCES IN ACADEMIC ACHIEVEMENT

Racial Differences in Academic Achievement

The problem of the differences in academic achievement between white and Negro pupils is one that is too important to leave to hearsay. Fortunately, there is a growing store of factual information that bears upon this question, and it is the purpose of this report to review the findings of two prominent school systems relative to the problem.

The first analysis concerns the Atlanta public schools and the second the Washington, D.C. system. Atlanta has made a notable attempt to get at the differences between the achievement of Negro and white pupils in a segregated system by using an outside agency to set up and carry out a comprehensive survey. The Washington school system has completed five years under an integrated set-up, and is in its sixth year under such a program; it, therefore, provides a good example of what may happen to scholastic standards with integration. The fact that in the District of Columbia schools there is an exceptionally large proportion of Negro pupils makes the findings of considerable interest.

The Atlanta Study

In August of 1955 the Atlanta Board of Education adopted a resolution in response to petitions filed for desegregation of the schools. This resolution charged the Superintendent with the responsibility of finding out differences between white and Negro pupils in achievement.

At a subsequent meeting of the Board it was decided that the Educational Testing Service of Princeton, New Jersey, should be employed to conduct a survey of the schools. The resolution emphasized that the survey should be entirely one of fact finding, and was not to be one recommending procedure for desegregation.

The testing of pupils, and the scoring and processing of the test results were to be entirely in the hands of the Educational Testing Service. This testing was accomplished during the first three weeks of January, 1956. All pupils in the 4th and 6th grades of all regular elementary schools (66 white and 31 Negro schools) were given the Stanford Achievement Test in reading and arithmetic. All pupils in the 8th grade of the regular high schools (13 white and 4 Negro schools) were given the Iowa Every-Pupil Test in arithmetic. All pupils in the 12th grades of these same schools were given the Essential High School Content Battery.

The large numbers of pupils tested gives added significance to the test results from the Atlanta survey. There were, in round numbers, 6,500 4th graders, 6,000 pupils in grades 6 and 8 and 3,000 in grade 12.

Before summarizing the results, it is necessary to say a word about testing methods.

In measuring pupil achievement, "grade scores" are used. A grade score of 4.0 is the middle score made by a national sample of pupils at the time they enter the 4th grade and, similarly, a score of 5.0 or 6.0 represents the middle score of the national sample of pupils at the time of entering grades 5 and 6 respectively. A score of 4.5 represents the middle score of the national sample at the mid-point of the 4th grade and a change of one decimal unit in the score indicates approximately a month's change in achievement.

A word of caution, however, needs to be added whenever reference is made to a grade norm. Such a norm by definition is the point below which 50% fell and above which 50% of the scores rose. Another way of saying the same thing is that on any properly standardized test, half of all the pupils in the country would fall below the grade norm and half would be above it; half of the students tested will always score, in other words, "below average." It is therefore essential that any serious analysis of differences in academic accomplishment show not only comparisons in terms of grade score, but also show the spread of these scores and the degree of overlapping of the two groups being compared. This was done with admirable precision in the Atlanta survey. The spread of scores is expressed in terms of the percentage of pupils making scores above or below a particular point in the scale. Overlapping is also expressed in a percent. This percentage describes the portion of white pupils whose scores were equaled by Negro pupils or vice versa.

Now, what did the Atlanta survey show?

First, as the report states, the most significant fact revealed is that the achievement differences within the white and Negro groups were greater than the differences between the two racial groups. This was true at all levels; it showed up most sharply in 6th grade reading where white pupils were performing anywhere from four grades below to five grades above their own grade; this meant a range of nine grades. Similarly, substantial numbers of Negro pupils were reading anywhere from five years below to two years above their grade level, a range of seven grades. This may appear startling to anyone not familiar with the results of testing, but actually it is typical.

As Walter W. Cook reported in his article, "Individual Differences and Curriculum Practice," Journal of Educational Psychology (1948) 39:141:

> "When the educational achievement of a typical 6th grade class is measured, we find a range of approximately 8 years in reading comprehension, vocabulary, arithmetic reasoning, arithmetic computation, the mechanics of English and other forms of achievement."

In a school by school comparison, similar differences are shown. Looking only at the white schools, the school with the highest average achievement in reading at the 6th grade level showed a median of 8.5, while the white school with the lowest average achievement had a median score of 3.8. Among Negro schools, the highest 6th grade median was 4.4 and the lowest 2.6.

These scores will have for professional educators implications for the future development and potential of a desegregated system. Interpreting them strictly on the surface, we see four apparent facts:

—if Atlanta is more or less typical, an integrated school system would have, at the start, a wider range of student achievement than is the case in either of the segregated systems;

—the achievement levels of an integrated system would, at the start, be weighted downward as compared with the present white system;

—the spread of achievement levels in an integrated system would, at the start, be greater than in the present white system, but not much greater: in 6th grade reading, for example, a range of ten grades instead of nine as at present;

Second, there were students of superior achievement of both races; although proportionately more were found among white pupils than among Negroes. At the various grade levels, from 40% to 60% of white pupils met the standard set by the top half of the national sample, while from 2% to 10% of Negro pupils did so. But it should not be overlooked that the figures show that on most tests less than half of Atlanta's white students in 1956 were up to the national medians.

Third, the overlap between white and Negro students was considerable. On the tests at all levels, the scores of approximately 35% to 65% of the white students were matched by those of 35% to 65% of the Negro students. This would indicate that roughly half of the white and Negro students are about equal in achievement.

Fourth, a few Negro elementary schools showed higher averages than did some white schools.

Fifth, the survey re-enforced earlier studies which showed that the farther one moves up the educational ladder in a segregated system, the greater are the achievement differences of white and Negro pupils. This progressively widening difference has probably a two-fold meaning. In the first place, it has been repeatedly shown that irrespective of race the range of individual differences in achievement gets broader as one ascends through the grade levels. Second, differences in academic achievement are related to socio-economic background regardless of race, and these differences would seem to have a progressively retarding effect on achievement. Since more Negro pupils are so handicapped in terms of background, they show up less favorably than the total white group.

These findings revealed in the Atlanta survey contribute concrete evidence as to the kinds of academic problems which need to be dealt with by any school system contemplating the possibility of school desegregation.

The Washington Experience

Now let us turn our attention to a system which effected integration when faced with such problems.

Immediately after the May 17, 1954, ruling by the Supreme Court, the Washington schools entered the spotlight of national concern. With specific reference to the District of Columbia that decision flatly stated that, "Segregation in public education is not reasonably related to any proper governmental objective and thus it imposes on Negro children of the District of Columbia a burden that constitutes an arbitrary deprivation of their liberty in violation of the due process clause."

Had this ruling come at any time prior to the date of its issuance it would have posed a serious problem. But coming when it did, it found the Washington schools already engulfed in serious difficulties.

First, our nation's capital city had experienced a shift in racial population patterns which began many years prior to the segregation ruling. At the end of World War II the ratio of white pupils to Negroes in the Washington schools was 50,000 to 39,000. By 1950 the Negro pupils were in the majority and by 1958, 74% of the pupils enrolled in the schools were Negro.

Much of the enrollment increase was caused by migration of new families to the District. It might be of interest in passing to mention the origin of this influx. In a recent survey it was found that the 6,000 Negro pupils who had transferred to Washington schools in a given year came from 47 states; 45% were from the states of Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina and Virginia.

Second, the District of Columbia school system was attempting to meet the problem of an increased total pupil load and a mounting Negro majority with out-moded administrative machinery, a serious shortage of classrooms and teachers, and a glaringly unrealistic program for maintaining overall scholastic standards.

As far back as 1946 about 7,000 Washington pupils were on half-sessions in double-shift schools. Of this number more than 6,000 were Negroes. In 1948 a survey ordered by the Senate and House District Appropriations Subcommittees revealed that 18% of the classes in white grade schools and 40% of those in Negro schools had in excess of 40 pupils.

That there was unequal financing is attested by the survey made in 1954 by the Fund for the Advancement of Education. This survey revealed that the expenditure for each white pupil was $240.27, and that for each Negro pupil was $186.71.

Perhaps the greatest handicap of all to a system facing a rapidly changing racial population pattern was the dual system of administration and supervision. Under that system there were first-assistant superintendents, one Negro and one white.

In the case of the Negro schools, the first-assistant superintendent was by law in sole charge of their administration. This line of demarcation in administration and supervision was carried all the way down. For example, there were two city-wide heads of the Department of English, one for white and one for Negro schools.

Separate testing programs were maintained for Negro and white schools, and in general each organization operated as though there were no common obligations to be discharged.

It is not surprising that as a consequence separate academic standards obtained for Negro and white pupils. For example, in 1953, prior to integration, the median grade equivalent in reading for the 6th grade in the white schools was 7.2. In 1954 when test results for all 6th graders, Negro and white, were reported together, for the first time, the average was substantially lower at 4.9. This did not represent a loss by the whites but merely reflected the fact that the Negro pupils, who constituted over 60% of those tested, were considerably below the whites and thus brought the median score down.

How long such a cumbersome and unrealistic plan of organization would have continued in the face of the mounting needs is a matter of conjecture. The Supreme Court's ruling was taken as the occasion for making changes that were already past due.

The Superintendent's plan to implement the Board's policy was approved by that body on June 2, 1954. It provided for extensive desegregation by the following September. A subsequent plan provided for staff reorganization to unify the school system. One assistant superintendent assumed charge of all senior high schools, another of all junior high schools, still another of all elementary schools and a fourth was placed over all vocational high schools and adult education.

The Negro and white supervisory staffs were unified under the direction of a deputy superintendent. A uniform testing program was adopted, and in 1956 there was introduced into the 10th grade the track system of ability grouping. Each year thereafter another grade was added to the track plan until the three years of senior high school had been included.*

Further changes in the instructional program designed to raise academic standards included special summer remedial reading classes, a reading clinic, and increased pupil services to the physically, emotionally, and mentally handicapped. The teaching load at the elementary level was reduced, and there was a reemphasis on thorough teaching.

This extensive revamping of the Washington schools, long advocated by the administrators of the system, came about through an aroused citizenry cooperating with the School Board and the staff in a determined effort to make sure that under integration not only would academic standards be maintained but actually raised. It was the added hope of all these people that juvenile delinquency and other social ills might be favorably affected through this extended cooperative community effort.

What are the facts as to the academic standards in the schools of the District of Columbia, now that this program has been in effect over five full years?

The year 1955-56 was the first time that white and Negro pupils were included in the same testing program. With a school population composed of more than 60% Negro pupils, the median scores were below national norms. The gauge that is significant in measuring the effectiveness of the program undertaken is the amount of improvement that has taken place since 1955-56.

From the time the first city-wide testing program became operative in 1955-56 to the time for the 1958-59 tests a gain was made in the median achievement of every subject tested at every grade level where the tests were given.

The 1958-59 tests showed the 6th grade medians to be at or above national norms in five out of six sections of the test battery.

By this same year the 3rd graders were within either three or four months of the national norm in all subjects tested, and the average rise in these subjects over the 1955-56 figures was seven months.

During this period of improvement the percentage of Negro pupils increased sharply. In grade three, for example, it rose from 66.3% in 1955-56 to 79.1% in 1958-59, and at the 6th grade level the percentage rose from 63.9 to 75.6.

Thus, academic achievement rose at the same time as the proportion of Negro students rapidly increased.

Reading is usually considered the subject where the handicap of a meager background might show up most disadvantageously and particularly is this true in reading comprehension, often referred to as "paragraph meaning."

On this phase of the test there was at the 8th grade an improvement between 1955-56 and 1958-59 of eleven months, with the median rising to only two months below the national norm. For grades 3 and 6, the improvement was eight months. Fifth graders showed a six-month gain, and 9th graders scored a gain of five months.

Word-meaning, another phase of the reading test, showed gains ranging from three months for 5th graders to six months at grade levels 3 and 6.

In arithmetic reasoning, which is mostly problem solving and calls for considerable reading competence, a gain of eleven months was made at the 9th grade level with gains of nine, eight, five, and three months in grades 6, 3, 8, and 5 respectively.

Language, another background-related subject, showed a six-month gain at the 6th grade level, and a three-month gain at the 5th grade level. These were the only levels where comparable language tests were given.

One change made in the high schools was the adoption of a multiple-track system of ability grouping. Among other objectives it was believed that this would be a means of ensuring that the more capable pupils would not be neglected. A comparison was made of scores on the Iowa Tests of Educational Development by 275 top graduates in 1958 who were not in the Four-Track Program, and 275 top honors students in 1959 who were.

Results of these tests show that the median score in Natural Sciences rose from the 80th percentile to the 86th; in Correctness of Expression, from the 91st to the 96th percentile; and in Quantitative Thinking, from the 85th to the 90th percentile. Comparable improvement was shown in the verbal section of the College Entrance Board Examinations.

These figures furnish substantial evidence that these top students have profited by the opportunities provided them. They demonstrate further that integration has not reduced the capacity of Washington schools to produce students of the highest quality.

The most encouraging trend in social improvement has been reduction in the delinquency rate of non-white children between the ages of five and seventeen. This dropped from 37.1 per thousand in 1954 to 21.2 in 1958. While it cannot be claimed that school integration brought this about, it can certainly be said that integration did not result in an increased delinquency rate among non-whites. Nor did it adversely affect the rate of white delinquency, which fell slightly from 15.3 to 15.2.

Another more direct indication of a school system's effectiveness is the drop-out rate among students after they pass the compulsory school attendance age. The greatest loss usually occurs between grades 9 and 10, the point where youngsters enter senior high school. In 1956, 18% of the white and 35% of the Negro pupils left school at this point. In 1957, the percentages had dropped to 14 for whites and 27 for Negroes.

In summarizing the evidence as to what has taken place scholastically in the Washington schools, it is safe to state that during the five years completed under an integrated program, accompanied by an extensive reorganization and a reemphasis on adequate provision for instruction, steady progress in academic standards has been made.

Conclusions

The following observations summarize the findings from the studies of the Atlanta and Washington school systems.

1. The Atlanta survey reasserted two well-known facts which are basic to all educational plans seeking to preserve and improve educational standards: that differences in individual achievement are very marked; and that differences within any racial group are greater than differences between groups.
2. Both the Atlanta study and that of the Washington schools revealed that under a segregated plan, proportionately more of the white pupils than Negro pupils met standards set by the top 50% of the national test group.
3. The Atlanta study showed that the overlap in the achievement of the white and Negro groups was very considerable; that between 35%-65% of the scores made by white pupils were matched by a corresponding percentage of the scores of Negro pupils. Overlap occurred not only with individual scores but there were some Negro schools whose median scores exceeded those of some white schools.
4. The Atlanta study showed that in a segregated system the racial differences in achievement were more pronounced in the higher grades than in the beginning grades. However, it should be remembered that in any kind of school set-up, it is typical that the range of scores increases as pupils advance from grade to grade.
5. The Washington study showed that during the five years following integration, marked progress has been made in academic achievement. From the time the first city-wide tests were given in 1955-56 to the time when the 1958-59 tests took place, a gain was made in the median score for every subject tested at every grade level where the tests were given. The tests results show pronounced gains in reading and such reading-related areas as arithmetic reasoning and language.
6. The Washington study shows that with the introduction of the Four-Track system, 275 top students under this program achieved percentile scores well ahead of a comparable group of students from the last class that was not under the Track program. This program was introduced as one means of raising standards for the top students.
7. Data collected by community agencies and by the school system itself show that integration was accompanied by a definite decrease in incidences of juvenile delinquency among the non-whites, and a reduction in drop-outs between the 9th and 10th grades for both racial groups.

New Census Look at Cities and Race

By Jack Eisen
Staff Reporter

A SEVERE CASE of "hardening of the boundaries" during a period of massive population growth has moved large American cities, Washington among them, into a sort of statistical limbo.

This was emphasized last night by the release of new Census Bureau data showing that the Nation's metropolitan communities are not as racially unbalanced as earlier figures indicated.

In contrast with the earlier statistics, which covered only areas within cities' political boundaries, the new figures are based on entire metropolitan areas—or, as the Government calls them, "standard metropolitan statistical areas."

FOR METROPOLITAN WASHINGTON, the new census figures show that Negroes make up 487,183 of the 2,001,897 total population, or 24.3 per cent—a figure that has remained fairly stable for half a century. Before that, it was higher.

This new tabulation recognizes that virtually all cities have spilled large numbers of urban-oriented families—city-dwellers in every modern sense of the word—across their invisible boundaries into the adjacent suburbs. These families maintain strong social, economic and cultural ties with the central city.

In fact, Richard M. Scammon, director-designate of the Census Bureau, regards today's city as little more than an enlarged downtown for the metropolitan community.

"In fact, we must develop a new concept of a city to replace one that has ceased to have real statistical meaning," he says.

THE MAPS on this page provide a graphic demonstration. They depict, in identical scale, the Nation's 10 most populous metropolitan communities. Solid areas are the central cities — the enlarged downtowns Scammon referred to. The outer lines are the boundaries of the cities' standard metropolitan statistical areas. Shaded areas show the relative size of Washington and its suburbs.

Within the metropolitan boundaries, of course, land remains for development—just as there was space for Washington to grow within its political boundaries in 1910, when the census described the District as "essentially urban or suburban in character," with rural pockets.

In the Nation's earliest days, when most Negroes were slaves working as field hands or body servants, the nonwhite population of this area approached half of the total. It reached a peak of 48.6 per cent in 1810.

During the Civil War, many freed men fled to the protection of Washington, tilting the proportion of Negroes upward for two decades. It dwindled slowly until the World War II and postwar population surge ballooned the size and shape of the metropolitan community.

IN THE PAST 10 years, Metropolitan Washington gained 545,293 population, of which 145,440 were Negroes. Of the latter, 127,706 moved into the central city. The District's population now is 763,956, with Negroes accounting for 411,737, or 53.9 per cent.

But Scammon holds that there is "no essential difference" between such developments in American cities today and what occurred a century ago in urban centers along the Eastern Seaboard. Low-income Negroes have tended to cluster in the center of the metropolitan area, he observes, just as the poor immigrant found a place to live in the much smaller downtown of yesteryear.

Then as now, new development in most cities lapped outward. When a municipal boundary was reached, annexation was easy—something not true today.

Washington of a century ago provides an example. The District had been shrunk one-third in 1846 by returning its original Virginia portion, yet the northern city limits reached only to Florida ave. nw. Beyond lay the farms, villages and estates of Washington County, D. C., extending to the Maryland line drawn in 1801.

Philadelphia attained its present size in 1854, San Francisco in 1856, St. Louis in 1876, New York in 1898. Scammon notes that all 10 cities depicted by the maps on this page are similarly straitjacketed.

In all these cities, as in all other large metropolitan communities on the Census Bureau list, the proportion of Negroes in the central city thus is much higher than that for the total metropolitan area. Frequently it is double.

SCAMMON ALSO NOTES that there is little apparent relationship between the Nation-wide "flight to the suburbs" and a community's racial patterns. He cites Minneapolis, which has 2.4 per cent Negroes—the smallest proportion among the top 25 cities—which lost 38,846 population between 1950 and 1960. Its metropolitan area gained 323,096.

During the same period, Washington lost an almost identical 38,222 persons while the area-wide gain was 537,808.

The Census Bureau's new figures show that two cities among the top 25 have metropolitan populations with higher proportions of Negroes than Washington. Metropolitan Memphis has 36.3 per cent and metropolitan New Orleans has 30.8.

Closely following Greater Washington's 24.3 per cent are metropolitan Atlanta with 22.8 and metropolitan Baltimore with 21.9.

The Annealing of the South

THE ANNEALING OF THE SOUTH

By LESLIE W. DUNBAR

Anneal: to subject to high heat, with subsequent cooling, for the purpose of softening thoroughly and rendering less brittle. In some cases, as for glass and steel, the cooling must be gradual; in others, as for copper and brass, it may be sudden. It is believed that annealing reduces brittleness by removing strains that have been induced in the material by some previous treatment. (Webster's New International Dictionary, 2nd edition.)

NOW the land of fitful somnolence and passion nears the trap of reason. Even while it lashes at its captor, an air of anticipation courses pleasurably through the South at the prospect of the end of the long chase. The South is about to go down again in defeat, and can hardly wait.

The region has been the place where American error and excess go to retire. The most enormous of all, Negro enslavement and peonage, came here to live out its suffering. But this was not the only one. That part of the old frontier spirit which was crude and violent settled and, in some measure, still endures here. Obstinate localism, which is the other side of responsible local self-government, flourished like a tough weed. Wastefulness of the soil, its minerals and trees, always and everywhere an American sin, was most acute here where nature had given so lavishly. A late convert to laissez-faire economics, the South is slowest, perhaps, of all American regions to relinquish it emotionally. That Puritanism should have been received by Southerners seems almost implausible; but even before the chastening of the Civil War it had been, and it is still strong. The American dislike of theory which so impressed de Tocqueville is probably more virulent in the South than anywhere else.

This land of cast-offs has been a maligned society and has, in truth, deserved most of its infamy. Yet it has been and is a beloved society as well, and from its punishing accumulation of hardship and error has somehow woven a life for its people which has not been without richness, and has not bereft men of self-respect. Possibly, just because Southerners are the only Americans who have known the agony of defeat and who have lived constantly with the reminder of their own moral guilt, there may be within them reservoirs of maturity and compassion that are not second in depth. Whites and Negroes, astonishingly like each other in beliefs and manners and attitudes, in sins and in virtues, have created, through the fires of history which have burned away much that is not essential beastliness and goodness in human nature, a society loved deeply by those who live within it.

The South has numerous definitions. It is best thought of as the states of the old Confederacy. In what Americans call the border states there are, however, sections where Southern characteristics and problems are as strong as anywhere, and one non-seceding state in particular—Kentucky—has a general resemblance. Moreover, there are parts of the South as here defined which bear little of the Southern stamp: western Texas is a land to itself, and southern Florida and northern Virginia are rapidly migrating northward in attitude and appearances. In fact, the South has never been all of one piece. There have been variations and fundamental differences of outlook. Nevertheless, there was a unity and it endures, though creakily. There has been the common remembrance of defeat and humiliation and economic inferiority, the common problem of a bi-racial population. There is a resulting sense of history which is more omnipresent than elsewhere in America; there is, as well, a common consent in the misreading of certain lessons and, worst of all, facts of history. And because of their history, and because they live close to it, Southerners have an awareness of their land and of the sanctity of "places" which is rare in this country. The land is as varied as nature could make it, and yet it and its imagery are a single strand in Southern self-consciousness: mountain ridges blend with moss-draped bayous, the heat-laden pine woods with undulating sand hills, the cotton manors fuse with the green valleys where yeomen make their crops, all in a single picture that has haunted and inspirited the Southerner for generations.

In the years following the Civil War, Henry Grady, a Georgian, proclaimed the "New South"; about every decade since, someone has again announced its coming. It comes; but then, of course, so does change everywhere and at all times. It has come but slowly, though now (did it seem so to Grady also?) it seems ready to burst in. That which has delayed change, while at the same time strengthening self-identity, has been the centrality of the racial issue. It has been the tether, limiting the distance which the region could move toward a political, economic, or social similarity with the rest of the nation. After the Civil War, white Southerners united in the conviction that the pre-eminent task was to maintain racial separateness and white superiority. So necessary was this seen to be, that all other concerns of society had to support it, and be subordinated to it. And so it has been. Political, economic, religious, educational institutions—all had to make their contributions to the dominating racial policy, and shape their own development in its interest.

Furthermore, though the tether had varying lengths in the differing sections of the South, at every time of crisis it tended to the marginal—the shortest—length, that of the so-called Black Belt. This is the old plantation country, descending in a great arc from southside Virginia, through eastern North Carolina, most of South Carolina, Georgia, and Alabama, northern Florida, Mississippi, and Louisiana, western Tennessee, and east Arkansas and Texas. Rural, heavily Negro in population ratios, increasingly poor—this flat belt gripped political power long after the cotton which had once made it powerful had fallen from the economic throne. The area in which racial prejudice and cultural backwardness are most pronounced still holds political sway, and, unhappily, provides the South with its typical spokesmen. It has been able to do so because of grossly inequitable representation in the state legislatures, concurred in by the moneyed interests of the region's cities, which have been grateful for the Black Belt's ingrained conservatism. Whenever, before and since the Civil War, there has been crisis, it is this area which has decided what the South will do; the other sections of the South—the prosperous, easy-going Piedmont, the mountains, the tolerant coastal fringe, the Catholic parishes of Louisiana, the upland valleys which never knew plantations—have been brought into line. That power of decision is today in jeopardy, and that is good news for the South, and, indeed, for the nation and the whole Atlantic community.

Old ways die hard. Because Southern society was organized on a racial division, all white men were in a sense comrades. Paradoxical strains of social and political equalitarianism wind through what is, nevertheless, an élitist structure. An occasional Huey Long has risen from the masses to combat the economic oppressors, but this has been the exception. William Faulkner's distrusted Snopeses have largely displaced the old aristocracy, but by now several generations of them have held the reins and assumed the mantle of command, and their racial brothers tend to look upon them as the doers of the family business. There is among white Southerners a feeling of mutual inheritance, of a common sharing in the manners, the style, and the advantages of being a white man; and men have quite naturally grown accustomed to these and have come, also naturally, to regard them as values worthy of defense.

Learned persons have sometimes analyzed Southern racial attitudes and found at their roots dark and vital sexual motives. Perhaps this is correct. Certainly, the cult of woman exaltation was about all that Southern whites could possibly salvage from the chivalrous notions toppled by the Civil War, and to have retained and rebuilt upon that cult would have been a psychological expectancy. However this may be, white Southerners, living in what is a relatively advanced industrial society, have shown a remarkably intense resistance toward change in these racial relations which are their fraternal links. At the same time, there is almost no white Southerner who, by the time he emerges from adolescence, does not feel that he shares complicity in a social and moral decision which he can only hope is right, or, at worst, a venial wrong: yet one which he may very well suspect, or know, is neither. I have never met a white Southerner, not even the most determined of segregationists, who did not betray some moral uncertainty; and in that fact he differs and is set apart from the majority of his fellow Americans.

This is possibly a part of the reason why he will, often after the staunchest resistance, adapt so comfortably to new racial practices. Once the fight is decisively lost (the verdict has to be decisive), once the Negro has secured the right to vote, has gained admittance to the public library, has fought his way into a desegrated public school, has been permitted to sup at a lunch counter, the typical white Southerner will shrug his shoulders, resume his stride, and go on. He has, after all, shared a land with his black neighbors for a long while; he can manage well enough, even if the patterns change. There is now one fewer fight which history requires of him. He has done his ancestral duty. He is free of part of his load, he can relax a bit more. He has been annealed.

But, of course, neither can the typical white man give up without a fight, for that would not be dutiful to the past or to the intricate web of society which he, consciously or unconsciously, feels a need to sustain. So he will not be a leader in the reform of racial practice. What the Negro Southerner has won in the way of equality, therefore, he owes chiefly to himself and the federal courts. (Merely to credit the federal courts is too simple. They have been the instruments of the the Constitution, and the racial reforms of recent years are a striking exhibition of the power of the concept of a fundamental law, undergirding and disciplining and guiding a nation.) By a series of judicial decisions, commencing in 1944, the right to vote is being secured. Decisions since 1948 have rendered housing segregation legally impossible (though social barriers are still high). A notable string of cases since 1938 has firmly established the right of Negroes to enter tax-supported colleges and universities. The epochal decision of 1954, in the case of Brown v. Topeka, declared the right of Negro children to a non-segregated education in the public schools.

It was the 1954 decision which produced the South's current rebellion. The South is again in siege, and the final days draw close. The environs have already been penetrated, the stores of the defenders have run low, the will to continue an unequal contest has dimmed. There is a widespread, and inexact, saying in America that the South lost the Civil War, but won the peace. In the manner of world politics, and with a similar regard for the costs, something like a cold war has been substituted these past seven years for armed combat. It will go on for a few years more; some of its bitterest, ugliest episodes, even more appalling than Little Rock, New Orleans, and Montgomery, probably lie ahead. But the South—the South, that is, of racial oppression and of enervating tradition—will lose again. And that South will not win the peace.

Leave for a time that assertion unjustified. What lies behind this upsurge of interest in and agitation of an old dilemma, to the point where racial relations and civil rights in the South have been America's principal domestic issue these late years? Consider first why the Negro people, who had ineffectually protested their lot for decades, suddenly became, after 1940, increasingly successful. Nothing is more impressively explanatory than the fact that the Negroes of America, in this generation, achieved a quantity of talent sufficient to lead and man a campaign. The arduous, persevering educational efforts, by churches, philanthropies, and public bodies, had finally borne fruit. There were enough Negro lawyers and organizers and educated ministers and businessmen and teachers and students, enough talent finally to be heard. With but few and unimportant exceptions, these men have conducted the campaign for equal rights not only skillfully but with a clear intuition of responsibility. Especially among Southern Negroes, there has been comprehension that the objective was not to punish the South, but to make it acknowledge human rights and to do that in such a way as not to engender new or make permanent old bitterness.

But there is impatience as well as responsibility, and the tension between the two has so far been a creative one. The most spectacular display of the former is the student protest movement, begun February 1, 1960, in Greensboro, North Carolina, keyed to the device of the "sit-in," and spontaneously spread throughout the region. One student leader put it well: "We are not only entitled to service, but we want it." And that states concisely the meaning of the sit-ins. They represent a demand that white Southerners move now, without the compulsion of judicial decrees, to open communities for joint enjoyment and participation.

This came as quite a surprise to the South. The sit-ins were like the longbows of Crecy. That kind of an attack hadn't been expected, and it was disconcerting. It said to the white South, "Do this now, and do it of your own design, because we are all one community, for which you are, at the moment, the caretaker." Puzzled, yet dimly persuaded, the white South responded. And so, within a year, about one hundred cities and towns allowed integration at lunch counters and restaurants; it was as surprising as the movement itself. The students brought a renewal of hope—for courage and willingness to suffer for right are always a cause for rekindling hopes. The white Southerners who in scores of places assented to the students' demands laid a basis for a new hope—that the white South might at last be ready to take its destiny in its own hands and, without compulsion of the federal government and its courts, move to build a true community of persons.

The sit-ins were an expression of impatience, but with almost unbelievably few lapses they have been conducted under canons of responsibility. A large part of the credit for this is owed to the example and teaching of the Reverend Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. His commitment to the philosophy of Gandhi has magnetized the students toward the complementary poles of non-compromise and non-violence.

The Freedom Ride has been a more contrived and less indigenous protest than the earlier sit-ins. National public opinion is a phantom, eluding both measurement and intuition, and perhaps too much a vagrant to be ever addressed. One may, nevertheless, venture the guess that it is uneasy about the Ride. If so, the Negro campaign for equal rights and privileges has, for the first time in a long while, adopted a method disliked by national opinion.

Yet there is general approval of the Ride's objective, and there has been further advance toward a great accomplishment: i.e., the strengthening of communication between the races of the South. Friction and struggle have not, as so often has been alleged, broken down communication. The truth is that in recent years Negro Southerners, for the first time, have been communicating their true feelings and desires and beliefs and the white South has been hearing, and has been learning.

The student movement inevitably yielded proclamations of the advent of the "New Negro," who has, in fact, been announced almost as often, since the Civil War, as the "New South." There has also been great interest in the question of whether Negro Americans feel an identity with the emerging nationalism of Africa. A long and brilliant article by Harold

R. Isaac in Phylon last year, "Five Writers and Their African Ancestors," suggests this answer: formally, yes; but essentially, only at the edges of their concern. Yet historians will surely want to probe and reflect on the coincidence of the surge forward in America and Africa, and the material and spiritual conditions of our time which drove both.

Among the material factors operative here, the expansion of the ranks of Negro talent has been already mentioned. Of equal, if not greater, importance have been the streaming exodus, since 1940, of Negro Southerners from the farm and their movement to cities of the South and North. This has not been an unalloyed blessing: it has thrust formerly stable, rural families into the solvent of city slums, involved Negroes in crime and juvenile delinquency to sickening degrees, and added to the already crushing problems of America's cities. But what was a cancer is now only a fever. The Black Belt has been a cancer eating into America's strength, draining it economically and morally, and frustrating its political policies through the terrific influence which inequitable representation has allowed this section to exert all the way to Congress. The practical interests of the men who hold power within it have been, usually, opposed to racial justice. There are certain ameliorative measures possible and therefore necessary; but there is little prospect of basic improvement in racial relations in the rural Black Belt until all the Negroes who are now marginal producers—and that includes most of them—move. In the cities, large and small, where the winds of impersonal democracy and commerce incline men and policies toward change and solutions rather than defense of status, fevers may run high, but can be, and usually are, cured in time.

1960 census reports reveal the vastness of the Negro migration. New York has the largest Negro population among American cities. Of the first fifteen cities, in numbers of Negroes, only three—Houston, Dallas, and New Orleans—are Southern, and they rank seventh, fourteenth, and fifteenth respectively. Final data are not yet available, but when they are they will show an extraordinary shift of Negroes from the farms of the South to cities, both Northern and Southern. In ratio of Negro to white the Southern cities are still highest, although the first in the South—Atlanta—is far lower than Washington, whose population is now 54 per cent Negro; Atlanta's is 38 per cent. State returns show that New York is now first in Negro residents, having been sixth in 1950. Five other states have more than 1,000,000 Negro inhabitants: they are, in order, Texas, Georgia, North Carolina, Louisiana, and Illinois. The proportion of the nation's Negroes who live in the South declined from 81 per cent in 1910, to 60 per cent in 1950, to 52 per cent in 1960. Negroes have remained a fairly steady 10 to 11 per cent of the American population through several decades.

The white side of the Southern picture is equally fluid. For over a century—after about 1820—the South was not an integral part of the American economy. It is now. Still well below national levels of income and capital accumulation, it has nevertheless been incorporated within the general economy so that it prospers and it declines with the country as a whole. More pertinently, the income of urban whites in the South now approximates national levels. They are the servants of American industry and commerce, and they tend to think and conduct themselves like their fellow-servants in Northern and Western cities; indeed, they work for many of the same employers, for industrialization has been carried to the South principally through branch plants of national firms. Moreover, these plants have brought with them many non-Southerners, to fill managerial and technical positions. The commercial and industrial class, particularly those among it who wear white collars, has largely lost interest in defending the South's racial customs, has been the vanguard of every retreat, and comprises the people who said "yes" to the demands of the Negro students.

Yet there is more to the Southern struggle with itself than surrender to the ethos of commerce. The South's intellectuals have deserted her. Academic scholars have been mostly silent, and the universities politically sterile; at least, however, they have not given succor to tradition. Indeed, almost no one has, and can any institution live without intellectual defense? A distinguished group of editors, on the other hand, has not been silent: the idea of a free, responsible press has never had finer exemplars than men such as Ralph McGill, Lenoir Chambers, Harry Ashmore, Sylvan Meyer, A. M. Secrest, and others like them who have cajoled and driven the South toward national unity. Nor has the Southern ministry been quiet, and as a consequence there has developed for the first time in the region's history a rift between pew and pulpit. It is altogether possible, however, that neither the editors nor the clergy have had an influence on Southern readiness to leave their hallowed cocoon equal to that of the immensely gifted Southern novelists of the period since 1920.

Auden said of Yeats that > . . . mad Ireland hurt you into poetry.

> Now Ireland has her madness and her weather still,
> For poetry makes nothing happen: it survives. . . .

The Southern writers were also "hurt into" their poetry (for such it has typically been, even though in prose form), loving the South so tenaciously that they could write of nothing else, singing, as Auden also put it, "of human unsuccess / In a rapture of distress." They have probed the South's treasured myths, laid bare its agony of spirit and often meanness of motive, chastised its cultural timidity, and exposed its grotesqueries. They sobered for many of the South's brightest people the fun and pride of being a "Southerner," and cast abroad a picture of the South which was believed and which sensitive Southerners have ever since been wishful of changing. By surviving, their poetry has made things happen.

Change has been accompanied by, has been in part both cause and effect of, a decline in Southern political power. This has several facets. Presidents are chosen through a system of electoral votes that enhances the importance of populous states. With the single exception of Texas, the largest American states are characterized by close division of strength between Democrats and Republicans, and by growing Negro populations. The consequence is that the non-Southern Negro vote, which has the potential of tipping all of New York's or California's or Illinois' electoral votes one way or the other, has become more sought after in Presidential elections than Southern support. Presidents, therefore, beginning with Franklin D. Roosevelt, have been heavily committed to the strengthening of Negro rights and opportunities, though President Eisenhower successfully adhered in this as in other fields to his aversion for governmental action. President Kennedy, on the other hand, is using the powers of his office constructively. The order he has issued to enforce the ban against discrimination in employment by federal agencies and governmental contractors is thoroughly serious, and is being vigorously administered. His Attorney-General has placed the weight of the government in civil rights cases now before the courts. The President has realized both symbolic and practical effects by appointments of Negroes to high posts: those of Mr. Weaver as head of all housing agencies and of Mr. Wharton as Ambassador to Norway are especially noteworthy. (No Southerner has been nominated or elected President since 1848, unless Woodrow Wilson is counted. No Southerner has served since Johnson, and he was a Tennessean who had refused to secede. Of the ten men elected to the Presidency before 1848, six were from the South and a seventh had lived there until well into manhood.)

mittee chairmanships, Southerners have often monopolized the leadership of both Houses. Their power is still disproportionately great. It is not, however, what it once was; the passage in 1957 and again in 1960 of the first civil-rights laws in eighty years was evidence of the decline.

The federal government once before—from 1861 to 1877—had taken an active interest in the South's handling of its racial practices. That endeavor ended in confusion and ignoble compromise, and the result was that Negroes passed from slavery in a relatively rich society to unprotected peonage in a miserably poor one. The present period of national concern, buttressed by world-wide attention and prodded by alert Negro leaders, will not have the same ending.

The strength and adroitness of Southern resistance is measured by the mere eight hundred Negro children who, seven years after the Supreme Court's decision, are all that have been accepted into schools with white children in the South, outside of west Texas. But eight hundred is double what there were last year, and the corner has been turned. Georgia desegrates some schools in the city of Atlanta this September, and will evidently do so peacefully. Louisiana will, most likely, continue its tawdry show of racism, but an entering wedge has been driven in New Orleans. Only Alabama, Mississippi, and South Carolina will be left, and their day of reckoning comes closer. It is not likely to be a pleasant day either, for reckless, passionate men are in strong positions in all three states. The sit-ins have produced some desegregation of eating places in every state except these three and Louisiana.

The old tether has been snapped. No longer does the Black Belt control the rest of the South. The Black Belt has been seceded from.

The South has been, like Spain, Ireland, or southern Italy, one of the cultural anomalies of the Atlantic community. Pulled forward by Negroes, including its own, and pushed along by the federal government and national opinion, the South is about to take on a new character. Not yet for a while, however, will it disappear as a culture. There is here too much history, too flavorsome a life, too ingrained a style. But if the South does in time disappear and blend itself indistinguishably with the larger nation, it has still ahead an opportunity that it can fulfill better than any place or people anywhere.

I believe that the South will, out of its travail and sadness and requited passion, give the world its first grand example of two races of men living together in equality and with mutual respect. The South's heroic age is with us now.

(In Report L-8 of this series, issued August 10, 1959, there was reproduced a statement on the subject of race and intelligence, prepared by 18 of the country's leading psychologists and anthropologists. The Southern Regional Council believes that the statement now reproduced below ought to be made available to a wide audience. The statement includes a resolution passed at the recent annual meeting of the American Anthropological Association held at the Benjamin Franklin Hotel in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania during the week of November 13, 1961.)

Association re-affirms its position on race.

At the meeting of the Council of the Association, which included nearly all of the professional Fellows of the Association in attendance at the meeting, the following resolution was adopted unanimously by a vote of 192 to 0:

> "The American Anthropological Association repudiates statements now appearing in the United States that Negroes are biologically and in innate mental ability inferior to whites, and reaffirms the fact that there is no scientifically established evidence to justify the exclusion of any race from the rights guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States. The basic principles of equality of opportunity and equality before the law are compatible with all that is known about human biology. All races possess the abilities needed to participate fully in the democratic way of life and in modern technological civilization."

The statement was interpreted by those present as a strong reaffirmation of positions which have been taken on the subject of race differences by qualified scientific societies for many years. In introducing the resolution to the Council, President Gordon R. Willey of Harvard University (Boston papers) stated that "the concern which I wish to lay before you is I think a grave one--one worthy of careful thought and strategic action. It arises from recent press statements and certain publications on race and racial differences as a basis for social and political action. Many of you have seen such statements. Some of you have called these to our attention. The Board deliberated on this matter which concerns use of the name 'anthropology' and 'anthropological science' in a way we believe to be false and misrepresentative of our profession by persons who are not recognized by the American Anthropological Association as professional anthropologists." The statement on the racial issue concluded with this warning by Dr. Willey: "Clearly we do not consider this statement as the only thing we as anthropologists can and should do in this matter, but we look upon it as a basic statement of position and a resource which our officers and all of us may draw upon in the future. For be assured that the several items in the press and elsewhere which have come to your attention...are but the beginning. We must be prepared to persevere in what we believe to be the truth."

Carleton Putnam's book, Race and Reason: A Yankee View, has been widely circulated in the South. The following commentary by Dr. William P. Sullivan, Assistant Professor of English, McNeese State College, Lake Charles, Louisiana, is reproduced without change from the Southwest Louisiana Register, published in Lafayette, Louisiana.*

Dear Editor:

Carleton Putnam's Race and Reason: A Yankee View (Washington, D.C.: Public Affairs Press, 1961) deserves some comment because the State Board of Education has purchased 5000 copies for distribution to Louisiana schools. The wisdom of this action is questionable, for the book is fundamentally evasive.

Putnam's overt purpose is to embolden the anthropologists of the South to combat the "pseudo-scientific hoax" of "modern equalitarian anthropology." His vision of timid southern anthropologists, fearful of revealing the truth, cowering in their studies, are too much for Putnam. He knows that the Negro is inferior to the White Anglo-Saxon Protestant (WASP) and to anyone else, too. He knows because the "character-intelligence index" - a wobbly term he may have invented - "forms the only possible index of the capacity for civilization as Western Europeans know it," and the Negro has never had a decent civilization.

Putnam's qualifications for revising a science to conform to a political platform (better known as Lysenkoism) appear to be a degree in "science" from Princeton, the ability to round up four men with science degrees more formidable than his own who disapprove of the trend of modern social science, and an unusual confidence in the authority of his own opinion. He is, for example, able to write, with the trump of finality, "I say it with sadness, for every argument he advanced I was obliged to refute." To give either the argument or the attempted refutation does not seem to him necessary.

*Other reports on this subject are: Report L-8 (August, 1959); a reproduction of a statement on the subject of race and intelligence by 18 of the country's leading psychologists and anthropologists; and Report L-29 (December, 1961); a reproduction of a resolution passed by the American Anthropological Association reaffirming its position on race.

Putnam attacks prominent anthropologists because they have, he feels, conspired to conceal the inferiority of the Negro. Not being WASPs, men from central and southern European races like Boas and Herskovits are bent on proving their equality with the majority group, thus elevating themselves and the Negro in theory. Putnam proves how irrational, emotional, or arrogant these anthropologists and other conspirators are by saying they are and he has letters from them (not quoted) which show this. He gives the impression of a wide-ranging, daring scholarship:

"Either from their silences or their comments, I had or sensed the thinking of Kluckhohn and Handlin of Harvard, Murdock of Yale, Herskovits of Northwestern, and Fosdick of Union Theological Seminary. There were dozens of others, from Richard Nixon to Eleanor Roosevelt, from Nelson Rockefeller to Billy Graham, from Allan Nevins to Ralph McGill."

He attacks northern newspapers for not printing his letters and some (he names eight on one occasion) for not accepting a full-page ad; this he deems a conspiracy against the truth. He writes to the Attorney-General, the President, the Supreme Court, and so forth (during the Eisenhower administration). Failure to reply is taken as proof of their silence before his rational superiority. Everywhere he looks, like a peacock in a room full of mirrors, Putnam finds confirmation of his superior posture.

He answers any question, his tone and the make-up of the book suggest; he takes on all comers. Here is how he handles one question:

"But would Christ have discriminated according to race? Was it not always with him a matter of individual worth? Of course, I have never maintained anything to the contrary. In all matters involving dealings between individuals, where the question of intermarrying is not involved, I think individual worth alone should be the criterion. But there is nothing un-Christian in facing the fact that, as individuals differ in merit, so averages differ among races in those attributes involving specific cultures. Judgments as to the average have to be made accordingly. I must repeat that there are few perfect systems in this world, we have to deal with practical realities, and when we are confronted with a situation where a race must be considered as a race, there is no alternative to building the system around the average. The minor handicap to the exceptional individual, if such there be, is negligible compared to the damage that would result to a society as a whole."

His answer to this question goes on and on, to the treating of Negroes as a group. From this excerpt, however, anyone can see the contradiction between, "Of course, I have never maintained anything to the contrary," and his contrary willingness to sacrifice the individual. He answers another question by obviously ignoring the commandment to love your neighbor; perhaps the story of the Good Samaritan (of that despised race of men) has been revised in his Bible. First thing you know, those Samaritans will be wanting to marry our daughters.

Apart from the queasiness of his response to the Christian questions, the essential contradiction within this book lies in the pretended openness and thoroughness of debate and the actual suppression of opposing facts and opinions, even when immediately relevant. A striking instance of this suppression turned up during a check of Putnam's references to articles by Frank McGurk, a Villanova University psychologist who has a Ph.D. from Catholic University. In "A Scientist's Report on Race Differences" (U.S. News and World Report, Sept. 21, 1956), Dr. McGurk explained how his tests showed the Negro to be inferior to the white. This professional article was answered in kind in the Harvard Educational Review (Spring, 1958) by William McCord and Nicholas J. Demerath, III, who concluded:

"In our sample of 612 northern urban boys, we found no significant differences in intelligence between Negroes and Whites. Not surprisingly, however, we found that intelligence is significantly related to socio-economic status, parental education and general home atmosphere... Even if most Negroes were not as intelligent as most Whites, this fact would not deprive them of the rights granted by the American Constitution."

Putnam omitted any mention of McCord's and Demerath's article, even though he printed the second McGurk reference, "Negro vs. White Intelligence - An Answer," (Harvard Educational Review for Winter, 1959), which cannot be understood without reading the attack which it purports to answer. In this method of reasoning Putnam omits the opponent's answer and asserts that the opponent is demolished. Like a champion of old returning alive from combat with a dragon, the existing Putnam is to be taken as proof that the enemy is defeated.

FROM PROTEST TO POLITICS: THE FUTURE OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT

BAYARD RUSTIN

I

THE DECADE spanned by the 1954 Supreme Court decision on school desegregation and the Civil Rights Act of 1964 will undoubtedly be recorded as the period in which the legal foundations of racism in America were destroyed. To be sure, pockets of resistance remain; but it would be hard to quarrel with the assertion that the elaborate legal structure of segregation and discrimination, particularly in relation to public accommodations, has virtually collapsed. On the other hand, without making light of the human sacrifices involved in the direct-action tactics (sit-ins, freedom rides, and the rest) that were so instrumental to this achievement, we must recognize that in desegregating public accommodations, we affected institutions which are relatively peripheral both to the American socio-economic order and to the fundamental conditions of life of the Negro people. In a highly industrialized, 20th-century civilization, we hit Jim Crow precisely where it was most anachronistic, dispensable, and vulnerable—in hotels, lunch counters, terminals, libraries, swimming pools, and the like. For in these forms, Jim Crow does impede the flow of commerce in the broadest sense: it is a nuisance in a society on the move (and on the make). Not surprisingly, therefore, it was the most mobility-conscious and relatively liberated groups in the Negro community—lower-middle-class college students—who launched the attack that brought down this imposing but hollow structure.

The term "classical" appears especially apt for this phase of the civil rights movement. But in the few years that have passed since the first flush of sit-ins, several developments have taken place that have complicated matters enormously. One is the shifting focus of the movement in the South, symbolized by Birmingham; another is the spread of the revolution to the North; and the third, common to the other two, is the expansion of the movement's base in the Negro community.

BAYARD RUSTIN, who organized the March on Washington and has been a close associate of Martin Luther King, is widely recognized as the leading tactician of the civil rights movement. This is his first appearance in COMMENTARY.

To attempt to disentangle these three strands is to do violence to reality. David Danzig's perceptive article, "The Meaning of Negro Strategy,"* correctly saw in the Birmingham events the victory of the concept of collective struggle over individual achievement as the road to Negro freedom. And Birmingham remains the unmatched symbol of grass-roots protest involving all strata of the black community. It was also in this most industrialized of Southern cities that the single-issue demands of the movement's classical stage gave way to the "package deal." No longer were Negroes satisfied with integrating lunch counters. They now sought advances in employment, housing, school integration, police protection, and so forth.

Thus, the movement in the South began to attack areas of discrimination which were not so remote from the Northern experience as were Jim Crow lunch counters. At the same time, the interrelationship of these apparently distinct areas became increasingly evident. What is the value of winning access to public accommodations for those who lack money to use them? The minute the movement faced this question, it was compelled to expand its vision beyond race relations to economic relations, including the role of education in modern society. And what also became clear is that all these interrelated problems, by their very nature, are not soluble by private, voluntary efforts but require government action—or politics. Already Southern demonstrators had recognized that the most effective way to strike at the police brutality they suffered from was by getting rid of the local sheriff—and that meant political action, which in turn meant, and still means, political action within the Democratic party where the only meaningful primary contests in the South are fought.

And so, in Mississippi, thanks largely to the leadership of Bob Moses, a turn toward political action has been taken. More than voter registration is involved here. A conscious bid for political power is being made, and in the course of that effort a tactical shift is being effected: direct-action techniques are being subordinated to a strategy calling for the building of community institutions or power bases. Clearly, the implications of this shift reach far beyond Mississippi. What began as a protest movement is being challenged to translate itself into a political movement. Is this the right course? And if it is, can the transformation be accomplished?

II

THE VERY decade which has witnessed the decline of legal Jim Crow has also seen the rise of de facto segregation in our most fundamental socio-economic institutions. More Negroes are unemployed today than in 1954, and the unemployment gap between the races is wider. The median income of Negroes has dropped from 57 per cent to 54 per cent of that of whites. A higher percentage of Negro workers is now concentrated in jobs vulnerable to automation than was the case ten years ago. More Negroes attend de facto segregated schools today than when the Supreme Court handed down its famous decision; while school integration proceeds at a snail's pace in the South, the number of Northern schools with an excessive proportion of minority youth proliferates. And behind this is the continuing growth of racial slums, spreading over our central cities and trapping Negro youth in a milieu which, whatever its legal definition, sows an unimaginable demoralization. Again, legal niceties aside, a resident of a racial ghetto lives in segregated housing, and more Negroes fall into this category than ever before.

These are the facts of life which generate frustration in the Negro community and challenge the civil rights movement. At issue, after all, is not civil rights, strictly speaking, but social and economic conditions. Last summer's riots were not race riots; they were outbursts of class aggression in a society where class and color definitions are converging disastrously. How can the (perhaps misnamed) civil rights movement deal with this problem?

Before trying to answer, let me first insist that the task of the movement is vastly complicated by the failure of many whites of good will to understand the nature of our problem. There is a widespread assumption that the removal of artificial racial barriers should result in the automatic integration of the Negro into all aspects of American life. This myth is fostered by facile analogies with the experience of various ethnic immigrant groups, particularly the Jews. But the analogies with the Jews do not hold for three simple but profound reasons. First, Jews have a long history as a literate people, a resource which has afforded them opportunities to advance in the academic and professional worlds, to achieve intellectual status even in the midst of economic hardship, and to evolve sustaining value systems in the context of ghetto life. Negroes, for the greater part of their presence in this country, were forbidden by law to read or write. Second, Jews have a long history of family stability, the importance of which in terms of aspiration and self-image is obvious. The Negro family structure was totally destroyed by slavery and with it the possibility of cultural transmission (the right of Negroes to marry and rear children is barely a century old). Third, Jews are white and have the option of relinquishing their cultural-religious identity, intermarrying, passing, etc. Negroes, or at least the overwhelming majority of them, do not have this option. There is also a fourth, vulgar reason. If the Jewish and Negro communities are not comparable in terms of education, family structure, and color, it is also true that their respective economic roles bear little resemblance.

This matter of economic role brings us to the greater problem—the fact that we are moving into an era in which the natural functioning of the market does not by itself ensure every man with will and ambition a place in the productive process. The immigrant who came to this country during the late 19th and early 20th centuries entered a society which was expanding territorially and/or economically. It was then possible to start at the bottom, as an unskilled or semi-skilled worker, and move up the ladder, acquiring new skills along the way. Especially was this true when industrial unionism was burgeoning, giving new dignity and higher wages to organized workers. Today the situation has changed. We are not expanding territorially, the western frontier is settled, labor organizing has leveled off, our rate of economic growth has been stagnant for a decade. And we are in the midst of a technological revolution which is altering the fundamental structure of the labor force, destroying unskilled and semi-skilled jobs—jobs in which Negroes are disproportionately concentrated.

Whatever the pace of this technological revolution may be, the direction is clear: the lower rungs of the economic ladder are being lopped off. This means that an individual will no longer be able to start at the bottom and work his way up; he will have to start in the middle or on top, and hold on tight. It will not even be enough to have certain specific skills, for many skilled jobs are also vulnerable to automation. A broad educational background, permitting vocational adaptability and flexibility, seems more imperative than ever. We live in a society where, as Secretary of Labor Willard Wirtz puts it, machines have the equivalent of a high school diploma. Yet the average educational attainment of American Negroes is 8.2 years.

Negroes, of course, are not the only people being affected by these developments. It is reported that there are now 50 per cent fewer unskilled and semi-skilled jobs than there are high school dropouts. Almost one-third of the 26 million young people entering the labor market in the 1960's will be dropouts. But the percentage of Negro dropouts nationally is 57 per cent, and in New York City, among Negroes 25 years of age or over, it is 68 per cent. They are without a future.

To what extent can the kind of self-help campaign recently prescribed by Eric Hoffer in the New York Times Magazine cope with such a situation? I would advise those who think that self-help is the answer to familiarize themselves with the long history of such efforts in the Negro community, and to consider why so many foundered on the shoals of ghetto life. It goes without saying that any effort to combat demoralization and apathy is desirable, but we must understand that demoralization in the Negro community is largely a common-sense response to an objective reality. Negro youths have no need of statistics to perceive, fairly accurately, what their odds are in American society. Indeed, from the point of view of motivation, some of the healthiest Negro youngsters I know are juvenile delinquents: vigorously pursuing the American Dream of material acquisition and status, yet finding the conventional means of attaining it blocked off, they do not yield to defeatism but resort to illegal (and often ingenious) methods. They are not alien to American culture. They are, in Gunnar Myrdal's phrase, "exaggerated Americans." To want a Cadillac is not un-American; to push a cart in the garment center is. If Negroes are to be persuaded that the conventional path (school, work, etc.) is superior, we had better provide evidence which is now sorely lacking. It is a double cruelty to harangue Negro youth about education and training when we do not know what jobs will be available for them. When a Negro youth can reasonably foresee a future free of slums, when the prospect of gainful employment is realistic, we will see motivation and self-help in abundant enough quantities.

Meanwhile, there is an ironic similarity between the self-help advocated by many liberals and the doctrines of the Black Muslims. Professional sociologists, psychiatrists, and social workers have expressed amazement at the Muslims' success in transforming prostitutes and dope addicts into respectable citizens. But every prostitute the Muslims convert to a model of Calvinist virtue is replaced by the ghetto with two more. Dedicated as they are to maintenance of the ghetto, the Muslims are powerless to affect substantial moral reform. So too with every other group or program which is not aimed at the destruction of slums, their causes and effects. Self-help efforts, directly or indirectly, must be geared to mobilizing people into power units capable of effecting social change. That is, their goal must be genuine self-help, not merely self-improvement. Obviously, where self-improvement activities succeed in imparting to their participants a feeling of some control over their environment, those involved may find their appetites for change whetted; they may move into the political arena.

Let me sum up what I have thus far been trying to say: the civil rights movement is evolving from a protest movement into a full-fledged social movement—an evolution calling its very name into question. It is now concerned not merely with removing the barriers to full opportunity but with achieving the fact of equality. From sit-ins and freedom rides we have gone into rent strikes, boycotts, community organization, and political action. As a consequence of this natural evolution, the Negro today finds himself stymied by obstacles of far greater magnitude than the legal barriers he was attacking before: automation, urban decay, de facto school segregation. These are problems which, while conditioned by Jim Crow, do not vanish upon its demise. They are more deeply rooted in our socio-economic order; they are the result of the total society's failure to meet not only the Negro's needs, but human needs generally.

These propositions have won increasing recognition and acceptance, but with a curious twist. They have formed the common premise of two apparently contradictory lines of thought which simultaneously nourish and antagonize each other. On the one hand, there is the reasoning of the New York Times moderate who says that the problems are so enormous and complicated that Negro militancy is a futile irritation, and that the need is for "intelligent moderation." Thus, during the first New York school boycott, the Times editorialized that Negro demands, while abstractly just, would necessitate massive reforms, the funds for which could not realistically be anticipated; therefore the just demands were also foolish demands and would only antagonize white people. Moderates of this stripe are often correct in perceiving the difficulty or impossibility of racial progress in the context of present social and economic policies. But they accept the context as fixed. They ignore (or perhaps see all too well) the potentialities inherent in linking Negro demands to broader pressures for radical revision of existing policies. They apparently see nothing strange in the fact that in the last twenty-five years we have spent nearly a trillion dollars fighting or preparing for wars, yet throw up our hands before the need for overhauling our schools, clearing the slums, and really abolishing poverty. My quarrel with these moderates is that they do not even envision radical changes; their admonitions of moderation are, for all practical purposes, admonitions to the Negro to adjust to the status quo, and are therefore immoral.

The more effectively the moderates argue their case, the more they convince Negroes that American society will not or cannot be reorganized for full racial equality. Michael Harrington has said that a successful war on poverty might well require the expenditure of a $100 billion. Where, the Negro wonders, are the forces now in motion to compel such a commitment? If the voices of the moderates were raised in an insistence upon a reallocation of national resources at levels that could not be confused with tokenism (that is, if the moderates stopped being moderates), Negroes would have greater grounds for hope. Meanwhile, the Negro movement cannot escape a sense of isolation.

It is precisely this sense of isolation that gives rise to the second line of thought I want to examine—the tendency within the civil rights movement which, despite its militancy, pursues what I call a "no-win" policy. Sharing with many moderates a recognition of the magnitude of the obstacles to freedom, spokesmen for this tendency survey the American scene and find no forces prepared to move toward radical solutions. From this they conclude that the only viable strategy is shock; above all, the hypocrisy of white liberals must be exposed. These spokesmen are often described as the radicals of the movement, but they are really its moralists. They seek to change white hearts—by traumatizing them. Frequently abetted by white self-flagellants, they may gleefully applaud (though not really agreeing with) Malcolm X because, while they admit he has no program, they think he can frighten white people into doing the right thing. To believe this, of course, you must be convinced, even if unconsciously, that at the core of the white man's heart lies a buried affection for Negroes—a proposition one may be permitted to doubt. But in any case, hearts are not relevant to the issue; neither racial affinities nor racial hostilities are rooted there. It is institutions—social, political, and economic institutions—which are the ultimate molders of collective sentiments. Let these institutions be reconstructed today, and let the ineluctable gradualism of history govern the formation of a new psychology.

My quarrel with the "no-win" tendency in the civil rights movement (and the reason I have so designated it) parallels my quarrel with the moderates outside the movement. As the latter lack the vision or will for fundamental change, the former lack a realistic strategy for achieving it. For such a strategy they substitute militancy. But militancy is a matter of posture and volume and not of effect.

I BELIEVE that the Negro's struggle for equality in America is essentially revolutionary. While most Negroes—in their hearts—unquestionably seek only to enjoy the fruits of American society as it now exists, their quest cannot objectively be satisfied within the framework of existing political and economic relations. The young Negro who would demonstrate his way into the labor market may be motivated by a thoroughly bourgeois ambition and thoroughly "capitalist" considerations, but he will end up having to favor a great expansion of the public sector of the economy. At any rate, that is the position the movement will be forced to take as it looks at the number of jobs being generated by the private economy, and if it is to remain true to the masses of Negroes.

The revolutionary character of the Negro's struggle is manifest in the fact that this struggle may have done more to democratize life for whites than for Negroes. Clearly, it was the sit-in movement of young Southern Negroes which, as it galvanized white students, banished the ugliest features of McCarthyism from the American campus and resurrected political debate. It was not until Negroes assaulted de facto school segregation in the urban centers that the issue of quality education for all children stirred into motion. Finally, it seems reasonably clear that the civil rights movement, directly and through the resurgence of social conscience it kindled, did more to initiate the war on poverty than any other single force.

It will be—it has been—argued that these by-products of the Negro struggle are not revolutionary. But the term revolutionary, as I am using it, does not connote violence; it refers to the qualitative transformation of fundamental institutions, more or less rapidly, to the point where the social and economic structure which they comprised can no longer be said to be the same. The Negro struggle has hardly run its course; and it will not stop moving until it has been utterly defeated or won substantial equality. But I fail to see how the movement can be victorious in the absence of radical programs for full employment, abolition of slums, the reconstruction of our educational system, new definitions of work and leisure. Adding up the cost of such programs, we can only conclude that we are talking about a refashioning of our political economy. It has been estimated, for example, that the price of replacing New York City's slums with public housing would be $17 billion. Again, a multi-billion dollar federal public-works program, dwarfing the currently proposed $2 billion program, is required to reabsorb unskilled and semi-skilled workers into the labor market—and this must be done if Negro workers in these categories are to be employed. "Preferential treatment" cannot help them.

I am not trying here to delineate a total program, only to suggest the scope of economic reforms which are most immediately related to the plight of the Negro community. One could speculate on their political implications—whether, for example, they do not indicate the obsolescence of state government and the superiority of regional structures as viable units of planning. Such speculations aside, it is clear that Negro needs cannot be satisfied unless we go beyond what has so far been placed on the agenda. How are these radical objectives to be achieved? The answer is simple, deceptively so: through political power.

There is a strong moralistic strain in the civil rights movement which would remind us that power corrupts, forgetting that the absence of power also corrupts. But this is not the view I want to debate here, for it is waning. Our problem is posed by those who accept the need for political power but do not understand the nature of the object and therefore lack sound strategies for achieving it; they tend to confuse political institutions with lunch counters.

A handful of Negroes, acting alone, could integrate a lunch counter by strategically locating their bodies so as directly to interrupt the operation of the proprietor's will; their numbers were relatively unimportant. In politics, however, such a confrontation is difficult because the interests involved are merely represented. In the execution of a political decision a direct confrontation may ensue (as when federal marshals escorted James Meredith into the University of Mississippi—to turn from an example of non-violent coercion to one of force backed up with the threat of violence). But in arriving at a political decision, numbers and organizations are crucial, especially for the economically disenfranchised. (Needless to say, I am assuming that the forms of political democracy exist in America, however imperfectly, that they are valued, and that elitist or putschist conceptions of exercising power are beyond the pale of discussion for the civil rights movement.)

Neither that movement nor the country's twenty million black people can win political power alone. We need allies. The future of the Negro struggle depends on whether the contradictions of this society can be resolved by a coalition of progressive forces which becomes the effective political majority in the United States. I speak of the coalition which staged the March on Washington, passed the Civil Rights Act, and laid the basis for the Johnson landslide—Negroes, trade unionists, liberals, and religious groups.

THERE ARE those who argue that a coalition strategy would force the Negro to surrender his political independence to white liberals, that he would be neutralized, deprived of his cutting edge, absorbed into the Establishment. Some who take this position urged last year that votes be withheld from the Johnson-Humphrey ticket as a demonstration of the Negro's political power. Curiously enough, these people who sought to demonstrate power through the non-exercise of it, also point to the Negro "swing vote" in crucial urban areas as the source of the Negro's independent political power. But here they are closer to being right: the urban Negro vote will grow in importance in the coming years. If there is anything positive in the spread of the ghetto, it is the potential political power base thus created, and to realize this potential is one of the most challenging and urgent tasks before the civil rights movement. If the movement can wrest leadership of the ghetto vote from the machines, it will have acquired an organized constituency such as other major groups in our society now have.

But we must also remember that the effectiveness of a swing vote depends solely on "other" votes. It derives its power from them. In that sense, it can never be "independent," but must opt for one candidate or the other, even if by default. Thus coalitions are inescapable, however tentative they may be. And this is the case in all but those few situations in which Negroes running on an independent ticket might conceivably win. "Independence," in other words, is not a value in itself. The issue is which coalition to join and how to make it responsive to your program. Necessarily there will be compromise. But the difference between expediency and morality in politics is the difference between selling out a principle and making smaller concessions to win larger ones. The leader who shrinks from this task reveals not his purity but his lack of political sense.

The task of molding a political movement out of the March on Washington coalition is not simple, but no alternatives have been advanced. We need to choose our allies on the basis of common political objectives. It has become fashionable in some no-win Negro circles to decry the white liberal as the main enemy (his hypocrisy is what sustains racism); by virtue of this reverse recitation of the reactionary's litany (liberalism leads to socialism, which leads to Communism) the Negro is left in majestic isolation, except for a tiny band of fervent white initiates. But the objective fact is that Eastland and Goldwater are the main enemies—they and the opponents of civil rights, of the war on poverty, of medicare, of social security, of federal aid to education, of unions, and so forth. The labor movement, despite its obvious faults, has been the largest single organized force in this country pushing for progressive social legislation. And where the Negro-labor-liberal axis is weak, as in the farm belt, it was the religious groups that were most influential in rallying support for the Civil Rights Bill.

The durability of the coalition was interestingly tested during the election. I do not believe that the Johnson landslide proved the "white backlash" to be a myth. It proved, rather, that economic interests are more fundamental than prejudice: the backlashers decided that loss of social security was, after all, too high a price to pay for a slap at the Negro. This lesson was a valuable first step in re-educating such people, and it must be kept alive, for the civil rights movement will be advanced only to the degree that social and economic welfare gets to be inextricably entangled with civil rights.

The 1964 elections marked a turning point in American politics. The Democratic landslide was not merely the result of a negative reaction to Goldwaterism; it was also the expression of a majority liberal consensus. The near unanimity with which Negro voters joined in that expression was, I am convinced, a vindication of the July 25th statement by Negro leaders calling for a strategic turn toward political action and a temporary curtailment of mass demonstrations. Despite the controversy surrounding the statement, the instinctive response it met with in the community is suggested by the fact that demonstrations were down 75 per cent as compared with the same period in 1963. But should so high a percentage of Negro voters have gone to Johnson, or should they have held back to narrow his margin of victory and thus give greater visibility to our swing vote? How has our loyalty changed things? Certainly the Negro vote had higher visibility in 1960, when a switch of only 7 per cent from the Republican column of 1956 elected President Kennedy. But the slimness of Kennedy's victory—of his "mandate"—dictated a go-slow approach on civil rights, at least until the Birmingham upheaval.

Although Johnson's popular majority was so large that he could have won without such overwhelming Negro support, that support was important from several angles. Beyond adding to Johnson's total national margin, it was specifically responsible for his victories in Virginia, Florida, Tennessee, and Arkansas. Goldwater took only those states where fewer than 45 per cent of eligible Negroes were registered. That Johnson would have won those states had Negro voting rights been enforced is a lesson not likely to be lost on a man who would have been happy with a unanimous electoral college. In any case, the 1.6 million Southern Negroes who voted have had a shattering impact on the Southern political party structure, as illustrated in the changed composition of the Southern congressional delegation. The "backlash" gave the Republicans five House seats in Alabama, one in Georgia, and one in Mississippi. But on the Democratic side, seven segregationists were defeated while all nine Southerners who voted for the Civil Rights Act were re-elected. It may be premature to predict a Southern Democratic party of Negroes and white moderates and a Republican Party of refugee racists and economic conservatives, but there certainly is a strong tendency toward such a realignment; and an additional 3.6 million Negroes of voting age in the eleven Southern states are still to be heard from. Even the tendency toward disintegration of the Democratic party's racist wing defines a new context for Presidential and liberal strategy in the congressional battles ahead. Thus the Negro vote (North as well as South), while not decisive in the Presidential race, was enormously effective. It was a dramatic element of a historic mandate which contains vast possibilities and dangers that will fundamentally affect the future course of the civil rights movement.

The liberal congressional sweep raises hope for an assault on the seniority system, Rule Twenty-two, and other citadels of Dixiecrat-Republican power. The overwhelming of this conservative coalition should also mean progress on much bottlenecked legislation of profound interest to the movement (e.g., bills by Senators Clark and Nelson on planning, manpower, and employment). Moreover, the irrelevance of the South to Johnson's victory gives the President more freedom to act than his predecessor had and more leverage to the movement to pressure for executive action in Mississippi and other racist strongholds.

None of this guarantees vigorous executive or legislative action, for the other side of the Johnson landslide is that it has a Gaullist quality. Goldwater's capture of the Republican party forced into the Democratic camp many disparate elements which do not belong there, Big Business being the major example. Johnson, who wants to be President "of all people," may try to keep his new coalition together by sticking close to the political center. But if he decides to do this, it is unlikely that even his political genius will be able to hold together a coalition so inherently unstable and rife with contradictions. It must come apart. Should it do so while Johnson is pursuing a centrist course, then the mandate will have been wastefully dissipated. However, if the mandate is seized upon to set fundamental changes in motion, then the basis can be laid for a new mandate, a new coalition including hitherto inert and dispossessed strata of the population.

Here is where the cutting edge of the civil rights movement can be applied. We must see to it that the reorganization of the "consensus party" proceeds along lines which will make it an effective vehicle for social reconstruction, a role it cannot play so long as it furnishes Southern racism with its national political power. (One of Barry Goldwater's few attractive ideas was that the Dixiecrats belong with him in the same party.) And nowhere has the civil rights movement's political cutting edge been more magnificently demonstrated than at Atlantic City, where the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party not only secured recognition as a bona fide component of the national party, but in the process routed the representatives of the most rabid racists—the white Mississippi and Alabama delegations. While I still believe that the FDP made a tactical error in spurning the compromise, there is no question that they launched a political revolution whose logic is the displacement of Dixiecrat power. They launched that revolution within a major political institution and as part of a coalitional effort.

The role of the civil rights movement in the reorganization of American political life is programmatic as well as strategic. We are challenged now to broaden our social vision, to develop functional programs with concrete objectives. We need to propose alternatives to technological unemployment, urban decay, and the rest. We need to be calling for public works and training, for national economic planning, for federal aid to education, for attractive public housing—all this on a sufficiently massive scale to make a difference. We need to protest the notion that our integration into American life, so long delayed, must now proceed in an atmosphere of competitive scarcity instead of in the security of abundance which technology makes possible. We cannot claim to have answers to all the complex problems of modern society. That is too much to ask of a movement still battling barbarism in Mississippi. But we can agitate the right questions by probing at the contradictions which still stand in the way of the "Great Society." The questions having been asked, motion must begin in the larger society, for there is a limit to what Negroes can do alone.

THIS AGREEMENT MADE AND ENTERED INTO THIS..... day of .....196....., by and between.....

hereinafter designated as the "Employer", and Local ..... of the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, said Local being an unincorporated association and hereinafter designated as the "Union", for and in behalf of itself and the employees now employed or hereafter to be employed by the Employer.

WITNESSETH:

WHEREAS, the Employer represents that it is engaged in the apparel and clothing industry in the making of .....; and

WHEREAS, the workers employed by the Employer have duly designated the Union as their exclusive bargaining representative for the purpose of collective bargaining with the Employer with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours and other conditions of employment; and

WHEREAS, the parties desire to cooperate in establishing conditions which will tend to secure a living wage, improved working conditions and fair competition insofar as labor cost is concerned, and to provide methods for a fair and peaceful adjustment of all disputes that may arise between the parties;

NOW, THEREFORE, in consideration of the mutual promises and obligations herein assumed and contained, and other good and valuable considerations, the parties agree as follows:

ARTICLE I: MUTUAL OBLIGATIONS

The parties agree that this agreement shall be binding upon them and their respective transferees, successors and assigns, and that they will faithfully comply with its provisions. In the event the Employer sells or transfers the business or the shop, the Employer shall nevertheless continue to be liable for the complete performance of this agreement until and unless the purchaser or transferee expressly acknowledges in writing that it is fully bound by the terms of this agreement.

ARTICLE II: UNION RECOGNITION

The bargaining unit covered by this agreement consists of all non-supervisory production, maintenance, packing and shipping workers employed by the Employer. It is agreed that the Union represents a majority of such workers and that it shall be the sole and exclusive bargaining representative for all workers in the bargaining unit during the entire period of this agreement. Neither the Employer nor any of its agents shall directly or indirectly discourage membership in the Union.

ARTICLE III: UNION MEMBERSHIP

1. Unless at the time prohibited by law, membership in the Union shall be a condition of employment for all employees on and after the thirtieth day following the beginning of such employment or the execution or effective date of this agreement, whichever is the later, but not before completion of the worker's trial period. If the foregoing is prohibited by law, then at the corresponding time all employees shall be required as a condition of employment (unless prohibited by law) to pay to the Union a service charge to reimburse it for the cost of negotiating and administering this agreement.

2. In the event that paragraph 1 may not be lawfully applied, all employees shall be informed by the Employer of the existence of this agreement and the terms thereof and shall be advised by the Employer that, in its opinion, good labor management relations are and will be best served and promoted if the employees become and remain members of the Union. The Employer agrees to implement and promote this provision by posting copies of the following notice near all time clocks and on bulletin boards and other prominent places:

"NOTICE TO ALL EMPLOYEES

"This shop is being operated under the terms of an agreement with the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, AFL-CIO. All wages, hours and other conditions of employment are regulated by the terms of this agreement. Good labor-management relations will be best served and promoted, in our opinion, if all our employees covered by this agreement become and remain members of this Union.

Signed .....

Name of Employer"

ARTICLE IV: TRIAL PERIOD — NOTIFICATION

1. Newly hired experienced workers shall be deemed during their first two (2) weeks of employment and newly hired inexperienced workers shall be deemed during their first .....( ) weeks of employment to be engaged for a trial period, during which they may be discharged without regard to cause.

2. The Employer shall notify the Union monthly in writing of all new employees hired and of all employees terminated.

ARTICLE V: CHECK-OFF

The Employer agrees to deduct membership dues (which shall be deemed to include periodic fixed dues, initiation fees, and assessments) from the earnings of its employees monthly and transmit the same to the Union or its designee within forty-eight (48) hours thereafter, subject to the requirements of law concerning authorization and assignment by the workers individually. Sums so deducted by the Employer shall be kept separate and apart from the general funds of the Employer and shall be held in trust by the Employer for the benefit of the Union.

ARTICLE VI: HOURS — OVERTIME

The standard hours of employment shall be thirty-five (35) hours per week divided equally into the first five (5) working days. All work outside the daily regular hours shall be considered overtime and shall be paid for at the rate of time and one-half. Saturday work as such shall be considered overtime and shall be paid for at the rate of time and one-half. Such work may be performed upon Union approval.

ARTICLE VII: WAGES AND STANDARDS

1. All employees who are employed for ..... ( ) months or more shall receive a minimum wage of no less than the following rates computed on a daily basis:

Cutters	..... per	.....
Spreaders	..... per	.....
Operators	..... per	1.50
Pressers	..... per	.....
Finishers	..... per	.....
Floor help	..... per	.....
Inspectors	..... per	.....
Packers	..... per	.....
Shippers	..... per	.....

2. Piece rates for each operation shall be set to yield 20% ad ..... ($ 1.00 dollars per hour. Where workers have demonstrated their ability to earn more than this, piece rates on new work shall be set to yield no less than their previously demonstrated hourly earnings during a representative period.

3. Wages shall be paid in cash weekly on a fixed day.

4. No homework shall be permitted.

5. The Employer shall comply with all the standards of sanitation and safety required by law.

6. The Employer shall not charge workers for damage to material unless caused wilfully.

7. If the settlement of piece rates has been unduly delayed by the Employer, workers shall not be required to work on garments for which the piece rates have not been finally settled unless the Union directs otherwise. When piece rates are settled, such rates shall be retroactive to the inception of the work.

8. The Employer shall send to the Union office monthly a copy of its payroll for the last work week of the preceding month, which shall show the hours and pay of each employee in the bargaining unit. The Employer shall also make available to the Union upon its request the data employed in setting wages or piece rates.

9. A worker shall be compensated for time lost through excessive machine breakdown, and shall also be compensated for excessive waiting time from other causes for which such worker is not responsible.

10. Wages, prices, standards and other working conditions now existing or hereafter established in the Employer's shop shall not be lowered.

11. The prevailing system of work, namely, time or piece work, shall not be changed during the term of this agreement, except by mutual agreement between the Union and the Employer.

12. If provision is made in this agreement for the payment of vacation pay by the Employer to the workers, any worker who leaves his employ for good reason or whose employment is terminated involuntarily prior to the distribution of such payment shall then be entitled to receive his pro rata vacation pay from the Employer corresponding to the fractional portion of the twelve (12) month period preceding such distribution in which he worked for the Employer.

13. The Employer may grant merit, length-of-service, or other individual increases or adjustments only upon approval by the Union.

ARTICLE VIII: DISCHARGES AND DISCIPLINE

No worker shall be discharged or otherwise disciplined without good and sufficient cause, except during his trial period. If the discharge or disciplinary act is found to be unjustified, the worker may be compensated for his loss of earnings during the period of such discharge or disciplinary act.

ARTICLE IX: DISTRIBUTION OF WORK

1. At all times work shall be distributed among the workers on an equal and equitable basis.

2. No member of the Employer or supervisory employee or designer or any person outside the bargaining unit shall perform any work in any job covered by this agreement.

3. If a worker has been laid off and any member of the Employer or supervisory employee or designer or any person outside the bargaining unit does his work, the Employer shall reimburse the worker so laid off for his loss of earnings and shall immediately reemploy him.

ARTICLE X: CHAIRLADY — PRICE COMMITTEE

There shall be a Shop Chairlady and Price Committee selected by or under the auspices of the Union. The Shop Chairlady shall be compensated by the Employer for time unavoidably lost during working hours in the process of adjusting grievances.

ARTICLE XI: FAIR EMPLOYMENT PRACTICES

The Employer shall not discriminate against any employee or applicant for employment because of race, creed, color, national origin, sex or age.

ARTICLE XII: ASSIGNMENT TO OTHER WORK

1. A worker who is requested to perform work other than his regular work while his regular work is available shall receive for such other work his average hourly earnings in his regular work during his last four (4) weeks of full employment prior to the change, or his earnings in the new work, whichever is greater.

2. A worker who is requested to perform work other than his regular work while his regular work is unavailable shall receive for such other work the established piece or time rate therefor or a mutually agreed on guaranteed rate, but in no event less than the minimum provided in this agreement.

ARTICLE XIII: HOLIDAYS

1. The following holidays shall be observed and all employees, whether time or piece workers, shall be paid a full day's pay for them in any event and regardless of whether such holidays fall on a working day or non-working day of the week or in any non-working week:

New Year's Day
Good Friday
Memorial Day
July 4th
Labor Day
One-half day of Primary Election Day
One-half of Election Day
Thanksgiving Day
Day after Thanksgiving Day
Day before Christmas Day
Christmas Day

An employee shall be eligible for holiday pay provided that, while work is available, he works both the day before and the day after the holiday, unless his absence is for justifiable cause.

2. Holiday pay for each time and piece worker shall be based upon his average earnings during his last four (4) weeks of full employment prior to the holiday.

3. In the event work is performed on any such holiday, it shall be paid for at the rate of time and one-half in addition to the holiday pay.

ARTICLE XIV: RIGHT TO LEAVE SHOP — CALL-IN TIME

Workers shall not be required unreasonably to remain in the shop during the day when there is no work for them. All workers who are requested or permitted to report for work shall be supplied with at least one-half (½) day's continuous work or be paid therefor at their average hourly earnings in their regular work during their last four (4) weeks of full employment.

ARTICLE XV: BENEFIT FUNDS

1. The Employer shall pay weekly to the Union a sum equivalent to .....(%) per cent of its total gross weekly payroll (before deduction for federal or state taxes) of all the non-supervisory production, maintenance, packing and shipping workers (whether Union or non-union workers and whether regular or trial period workers) employed in any of its own shops. Such payments shall be allocated as follows:

(a) .....(%) per cent towards the Southeastern Regional ILGWU Health and Welfare Fund, a trust fund established by collective agreement and maintained in trust for the purpose of providing workers with health, welfare, and recreation benefits and services.

(b) .....(%) per cent towards the ILGWU National Retirement Fund, a trust fund established by collective agreement for the purpose of providing pensions or annuities on retirement or death of workers.

(c) .....(%) per cent towards the Supplementary Unemployment-Severance Benefits Fund, ILGWU, a trust fund established by collective agreement for the purpose of providing workers with supplementary unemployment-severance benefits.

If the Employer employs contractors of whatever kind to perform any work for it, it shall, in addition, pay weekly to the Union towards said Funds ..... (%) per cent of the total amount paid to or due to such contractors each week for such work.

None of the payments made hereunder by the Employer shall constitute or be deemed wages due to the workers.

2. The said Health and Welfare Fund, the said Retirement Fund and the said Supplementary Unemployment-Severance Benefits Fund each shall be administered in accordance with its by-laws or rules and regulations by a Board of Trustees. Each Board of Trustees shall be composed of union representatives and an equal number of representatives of employer contributors to that Fund. In the event that the Board of Trustees shall be deadlocked on any issue or matter arising in connection with its Fund, the same shall be decided by a neutral person as set forth in the by-laws or rules and regulations of said Fund, and his decision shall be final and binding. The parties hereto hereby ratify, confirm and approve the composition and membership of each Board of Trustees as now or hereafter constituted.

Each Board of Trustees shall adopt and promulgate such by-laws or rules and regulations to effectuate the purpose of its Fund as it may deem necessary and desirable, including the detailed basis upon which payments from the Fund will be made, and shall have the power to modify the same from time to time. The parties hereto agree to be bound thereby and they are hereby incorporated in and made part of this agreement.

An annual audit of each Fund shall be made by accountants designated by its Board of Trustees. A statement of the results of such audit shall be made available for inspection by interested persons at the principal office of the Fund and at such other places as may be designated by its Board of Trustees.

The Employer shall have no legal or equitable right, title, claim or interest in or to said Funds. No individual worker shall have any legal or equitable right, title or interest in, or claim against, his or any other employer's payments toward said Funds or against said Funds, except as may be provided by the by-laws or rules and regulations of said Funds.

None of the monies paid into each of said Funds shall be used for purposes other than those permitted by law, and to pay the operating and administrative expense of such Fund. The monies of each of said Funds shall be kept separate and apart from all other monies.

3. The Board of Trustees of each said Fund is hereby authorized and empowered, in its sole discretion and upon such basis as it deems desirable, to transfer or mingle the assets of said Fund or to merge said Fund with another health and welfare fund or funds, with another retirement fund or funds, or with another supplementary unemployment-severance benefits fund or funds, as the case may be, now or hereafter existing and established by collective agreement with any unit of the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union or with the said International itself. In the event of such transfer, mingling or merger, the amounts hereinabove provided to be allocated toward the particular Fund shall thereafter be paid over to the fund or funds with which there has been such transfer, mingling or merger.

4. The Union or the Board of Trustees of the Fund, or either of them, shall be proper parties in interest to enforce collection of payments due from the Employer toward said Fund. In the event any amount due from the Employer under this ARTICLE XV remains unpaid for thirty (30) days after becoming due, such amount shall automatically bear interest thereafter at the rate of six (6%) per cent per annum and the Employer shall pay the same.

ARTICLE XVI: INDIVIDUAL CONTRACTS — SUB-CONTRACTING

1. The Employer shall not enter into any individual contracts with any of its workers without prior Union approval.

2. No contractor shall sub-contract its work to any other shop.

ARTICLE XVII: JOB RIGHTS, ILLNESS, LEAVE OF ABSENCE

1. An employee who has been absent by reason of his own bona fide illness, subject to verification, and returns to work within one hundred and twenty (120) days of the commencement of such absence, shall be entitled to the job last performed prior to such absence, if available, otherwise to any job, with entitlement to his original job if same becomes available during the succeeding four (4) months. Such employee's continuity of service shall be preserved.

If such employee returns after one hundred and twenty (120) days of such absence but not later than one hundred and eighty (180) days of such absence, then such employee shall be entitled to any available job and the employee's continuity of service shall be preserved.

2. An employee may obtain a leave of absence up to one hundred and eighty (180) days upon written application to the Employer. Any leave of absence may be extended up to an additional one hundred and eighty (180) days for good cause shown. The Employer shall not unreasonably withhold his consent to the original application or the extension.

ARTICLE XVIII: CONTRACTORS — ADDITIONAL SHOPS — MOVING — INTEGRATED PRODUCTION

1. The Employer shall have no work performed outside of its own shop unless the workers of its inside shop are fully supplied with work, and unless such outside shop is under contract with a unit of the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union and has complied with the terms thereof, is registered by the Employer with the Union herein, and maintains at least the standard of wages and hours established under the agreement herein. With respect to any work done by such outside shop on garments for the Employer, the Employer herein shall also be responsible to the employees of such outside shop for their unpaid wages and to the appropriate unit of the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union for dues and other monies due it.

2. Should the Employer desire to expand or open an additional shop, notice thereof shall be given by said Employer to the Union prior to the expansion or opening of such shop and such shop shall be operated under all the terms and conditions of this agreement. In no case, however, shall the operation of such shop result in reducing the work or the number of workers at present employed in the shop to which this agreement is now applicable.

3. The Employer agrees that during the term of this agreement it shall not move its shop from its present location.

4. In order to safeguard working standards and employment opportunities of the workers covered by this and other agreements in the garment industry, it is agreed that all garments or parts thereof handled by the Employer during the term of this agreement, whether finished or partly finished, shall be manufactured exclusively either in its own shop or, as parts of an integrated process of production under the jobber-contractor system of production, in a shop under contract with a unit of the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union; and accordingly the Employer shall not handle, purchase, import, or otherwise obtain, directly or indirectly, any other wholly or partly finished garments whatsoever during the term of this agreement.

ARTICLE XIX: CROSSING PICKET LINE

To the extent permitted by law, it shall not be considered a breach of this agreement on the part of the Union or on the part of any individual employee if any employee or employees refuse to cross any picket line recognized by the Union or to enter upon the picketed premises of the Employer, either of their own volition or by direction of the Union, nor shall such refusal be cause for discharge or discipline.

ARTICLE XX: STRUCK WORK

The Employer shall not perform any work for or give any work to any jobber, manufacturer, contractor, or sub-contractor engaged in the apparel and clothing industry against which a strike has been declared, and in no event shall it request any of its employees to perform work destined directly or indirectly for such concern. Such work shall not be deemed in the workers' regular course of employment, and the workers need not perform such work.

ARTICLE XXI: LAY-OFF AND RECALL

In the event of a reduction of force in any department for any reason, the workers shall be laid off in inverse order of seniority, provided, however, that the worker retained can perform the work satisfactorily. Upon resumption of work, the workers shall be recalled in reverse sequence, i.e., the last laid off shall be the first recalled. Seniority status shall not be affected by a lay-off.

ARTICLE XXII: ACCESS TO SHOP — EXAMINATION OF BOOKS

1. Representatives of the Union shall have access to the shop of the Employer for the purpose of taking up complaints and for the purpose of ascertaining whether the terms of this agreement are being complied with.

2. The Employer shall, upon request, submit to representatives of the Union the payroll books and all other pertinent records for examination for the purpose of ascertaining whether the Employer has complied with the terms of this agreement.

3. The failure of the Employer to permit access to the shop or to submit such books and records shall be presumptive evidence of the violation complained of and shall justify sustaining the Union's complaint. Moreover, in the event of such failure by the Employer, the Union at its option may consider that the Employer has forfeited its rights under the agreement.

ARTICLE XXIII: AGENCY

The Employer agrees that the sole persons authorized or having the power to act as agents of the Union, or to bind the Union legally with respect to matters arising out of this agreement or arising out of the relations between the Employer and the Union, or to subject the Union to any liability whatever by reason of any act or omission are the Regional Director of the Union and the designated Business Agent servicing the shop (or such substitute or additional persons as the Union may hereafter formally designate by written notice to the Employer). The Union shall not be responsible for the acts or omissions of any other person, including members and employees of the Union. The Employer further agrees that the Union, in entering into or administering this agreement, is not an agent of or acting on behalf of the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, and that in no event shall the latter be bound by or liable under this agreement or be otherwise liable.

ARTICLE XXIV: NON-PAYMENTS — RESPONSIBILITY

1. Notwithstanding ARTICLES XXVIII and XXIX or any other provision of this agreement, if the Employer fails for five (5) days to pay in full any wages due to the workers covered by this agreement, any dues or other monies due to the Union, any payments due under ARTICLE XVIII, or any payments due towards the Funds as provided in ARTICLE XV, the Union may immediately direct the workers to discontinue work until all sums due have been paid in full and/or may immediately institute action at law or equity or before an administrative tribunal to obtain payment of such sums. These rights shall be in addition to all other remedies available to the Union.

2. The officers, directors and stockholders of the Employer shall, as individuals as well as in their corporate capacities, be personally liable, jointly and severally, for full compliance with this agreement including the payments above set forth.

3. In the event of any breach of this agreement by the Employer (including any non-payment by the Employer of sums due to any employees for wages, holiday pay, or otherwise) the Union in its own name shall be a proper party in interest to enforce compliance by the Employer with this agreement on the Union's own behalf and on behalf of any affected employees without further assignments or authorizations from them.

ARTICLE XXV: RISE IN COST OF LIVING

Should there be a rise in the cost of living, the parties will meet for the purpose of considering an increase in wages commensurate therewith. In the event of any disagreement, the matter shall be treated as a dispute under ARTICLE XXIX.

ARTICLE XXVI: CHANGE IN LEGAL MINIMUMS

Should federal or state legislation be enacted increasing minimum wages under the law, the minimum wages under this agreement shall in no event be less than twenty-five (25¢) cents above said legal minimum wage. It is further agreed that, upon any such increase in minimum wages, the Union shall have the right to renegotiate upward the piece rate and wage structure of the shop. In the event of any disagreement, the matter shall be treated as a dispute under ARTICLE XXIX.

ARTICLE XXVII: LIMITATION ON VACATIONS

The Employer shall not designate or provide a vacation period or shut down its shop (or a part thereof) for the purpose of providing a vacation unless the particular action is effected pursuant to a written agreement signed by the Employer and the Union (through its representative designated in ARTICLE XXIII) particularly specifying a vacation as the purpose thereof. Any action contrary to the foregoing, whether taken by the Employer unilaterally or with the consent of any individual employee or group of employees, shall be wholly ineffective and shall not be deemed to constitute or provide a vacation.

ARTICLE XXVIII: NO-STRIKE, NO-LOCKOUT PLEDGES

The Union agrees that it will not call, authorize or ratify a strike or stoppage during the life of this agreement, except for the Employer's failure to submit to arbitration or to comply with the decision of an arbitrator. Should any strike or stoppage occur, the Union's sole obligation shall be to endeavor in good faith, within twenty-four (24) hours after receipt of written notice thereof from the Employer, to bring about the return to their work of its members who have stopped work. Upon the failure of any employees to return to work within said twenty-four (24) hour period, the Employer may at its option consider that such employees have abandoned their employment; but should the Employer reemploy such employees, it shall treat all such employees alike and shall not discriminate against or among them. Compliance by the Union in good faith with this provision shall be deemed full compliance with the Union's obligation hereunder.

The foregoing no-strike, no-stoppage obligations shall be wholly suspended and of no force and effect, and the Union may call, authorize or ratify a strike or stoppage, during the continuance of any strike or stoppage (not in violation of contract) declared by the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union or any unit thereof at any plant of any firm which is directly or indirectly affiliated with or related to the Employer herein.

The Employer agrees that it will not order, authorize or ratify a lockout during the life of this agreement. Should any lockout occur, the Employer's sole obligation shall be to endeavor in good faith, within twenty-four (24) hours after receipt of written notice thereof from the Union, to terminate the lockout and to reemploy the employees. Upon the failure of the Employer to do so within said twenty-four (24) hour period, the Union at its option may treat the matter as a dispute under ARTICLE XXIX, or may consider that the Employer has forfeited its rights under the agreement.

ARTICLE XXIX: ADJUSTMENT MACHINERY — COURT ACTIONS BARRED

1. Any and all disputes, complaints, controversies, claims or grievances whatsoever between the Union or any employees and the Employer or any person responsible under ARTICLE XXIV, which directly or indirectly arise under, out of, or in connection with or in any manner relate to this agreement or the breach thereof, or the acts, conduct or relations between the parties shall be adjusted as follows:

(a) The Shop Chairlady or in the case of piece rate disputes the Price Committee, together with a representative of the Union, shall attempt to settle the matter with a representative of the Employer. No adjustment shall be deemed binding on the Union unless approved by an authorized representative thereof.

(b) If they shall fail satisfactorily to dispose of any such dispute, complaint, controversy, claim or grievance, or if for any reason it has not been taken up by them, or if the matter does not lend itself to the foregoing procedure, the matter shall be submitted to arbitration before an arbitrator agreed on by the parties. If the parties cannot agree on an arbitrator within three (3) days, then upon request of either party the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service shall designate the arbitrator and the arbitration shall be conducted in accordance with its rules. The award or decision of the arbitrator, in addition to granting such other relief as the arbitrator may deem proper, may contain provisions commanding or restraining acts and conduct of the parties. If either party shall default in appearing before the arbitrator, he is empowered nevertheless to take the proof of the party appearing and render an award thereon. Any award or decision of the arbitrator shall be final and binding and shall be enforceable by appropriate proceedings at law or in equity. The taking of the oath by the arbitrator is hereby expressly waived. His fee shall be borne equally by the parties hereto.

(c) The parties agree that any papers, notices or processes to initiate or continue an arbitration hereunder, and all papers, notices or processes in any application to a court to confirm or enforce an arbitration award hereunder, including service of the papers conferring jurisdiction of the parties upon the court, may be served by registered mail directed to the last known address of the Employer or the Union.

2. It is intended and agreed that the procedure herein established for the adjustment of disputes shall be the exclusive means for the determination of all disputes, complaints, controversies, claims or grievances whatsoever, including the arbitrability of any dispute, and including claims based upon any breach of the no-strike, no-stoppage pledges of this agreement or upon any other breach of this agreement. It is intended that this provision shall be interpreted as broadly and inclusively as possible. Neither party shall institute any action or proceeding in a court of law or equity, state or federal, or before an administrative tribunal, other than to compel arbitration, as provided in this agreement, or with respect to the award of an arbitrator. This provision shall be a complete defense to and also ground for a stay of any action or proceeding instituted contrary to this agreement.

3. Any dispute, complaint, controversy, claim or grievance which any employee may have against the Employer may be instituted and processed only by the Union in the manner herein provided. No employee shall have the right individually to institute or process any action or proceeding with reference to any dispute, complaint, controversy, claim or grievance; or to initiate or compel arbitration in the event the Union fails or refuses to proceed with arbitration.

ARTICLE XXX: NEW PRODUCTS

If the Employer at any time makes garments in any branch of the garment industry other than or in addition to the branch in which the Employer is presently engaged, the Union at its option may forthwith renegotiate the terms of this agreement. In the event of any disagreement concerning the new terms, the matter shall be treated as a dispute under ARTICLE XXIX.

ARTICLE XXXI: IMPROVEMENT IN MAJOR MARKET

If during the term of this agreement the major market, in the same branch of the garment industry in which the Employer is engaged, in any manner improves its standards of wages or minimums or hours or overtime or any Fund contributions or other economic standards or working conditions, the Union shall be entitled to a corresponding improvement in the standards under this agreement. In the event of any disagreement, the matter shall be treated as a dispute under ARTICLE XXIX.

ARTICLE XXXII: SUBSIDIARY, AUXILIARY OR AFFILIATED FIRMS

1. Subsidiary, auxiliary or affiliated firms or corporations shall, for the purpose of this agreement, be deemed bound by all the terms of this agreement. The arbitrator selected as provided in ARTICLE XXIX shall have the right and power to determine whether an alleged subsidiary, auxiliary or affiliate of the Employer is such subsidiary, auxiliary or affiliate, and shall be guided by the proof of facts tending to establish any connection or interest, direct or indirect, between them or tending to establish a plan, scheme or device on the part of the Employer to avoid or evade the provisions of this agreement by or through such subsidiary, auxiliary or affiliate.

2. The Employer shall not enter into any partnership or consolidate or merge with another person, firm or corporation in the industry, unless the new firm assumes all accrued obligations to the workers covered by this agreement, the Union, and the Funds towards which payments are required under ARTICLE XV. Upon the formation of such partnership or upon such consolidation or merger, such new firm shall give preference in employment to the workers of the absorbed concern covered by this agreement over all other workers except those then employed by the firm which continues in business.

ARTICLE XXXIII: UNION LABEL

The Employer shall affix an ILGWU Union Label to all garments manufactured in its shops and in the shops of its contractors, if any, in accordance with the rules, regulations, and procedures promulgated by the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union. The Employer shall purchase the labels from the Union at the same price and use them under the same terms and conditions as are applicable in the major market in the same branch of the garment industry in which the Employer is engaged.

ARTICLE XXXIV: LIQUIDATED DAMAGES FOR VIOLATIONS

Should the Employer violate any provision of this agreement where it is difficult or impossible to ascertain the specific amount of damages suffered by its workers or the Union, then the Employer shall be liable to the Union for liquidated damages. In fixing these damages, there shall be taken into account any advantages gained by the Employer through its violation, any deprivation of earnings suffered by workers, and such other factors as are fair under the circumstances. If the Union and the Employer are unable to agree upon the amount of liquidated damages for such violation, then the matter shall be treated as a dispute under ARTICLE XXIX. The proceeds of any such liquidated damages shall be paid to the Union.

ARTICLE XXXV: ADDITIONAL PROVISIONS

The provisions (if any) contained in SCHEDULE "A" hereto annexed shall constitute part of this agreement.

ARTICLE XXXVI: CONFORMITY TO LAW — SAVING CLAUSE

1. If any provision or the enforcement or performance of any provision of this agreement is or shall at any time be contrary to law, then such provision shall not be applicable or enforced or performed, except to the extent permitted by law. If at any time thereafter such provision or its enforcement or performance shall no longer conflict with the law, then it shall be deemed restored in full force and effect as if it had never been in conflict with the law.

2. If any provision of this agreement or the application of such provision to any person or circumstance shall be held invalid, the remainder of this agreement, or the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances, shall not be affected thereby.

ARTICLE XXXVII: TERM

This agreement shall go into effect as of the..... day of....., 196...., and shall continue in effect until the ..... day of ....., 196...., and shall thereafter automatically be renewed from year to year unless either party shall notify the other party in writing at least sixty (60) days prior to any such expiration date that it desires to change or modify the terms thereof.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, the parties have caused this agreement to be signed the day and year first above written.

What Is The Personnel Policies Forum?

The Editors of The Bureau of National Affairs have invited representative personnel and industrial relations executives to become members of the 1965-66 Panel of the PERSONNEL POLICIES FORUM. These Panel members are top personnel officials in all types of companies, large and small, in all branches of industry and all sections of the country.

At regular intervals throughout the year BNA editors ask the members of the Panel to outline their policies and procedures on some important aspect of employment, industrial relations, and personnel problems. From these replies, the editors complete a survey report on the problem, showing prevailing practices, new wrinkles and ideas, and cross-section opinion from these top-ranking executives.

In many cases, the comments, suggestions, and discussions are reproduced in the words of the Panel members themselves. In effect, survey users are sitting around a table with these executives and getting their advice and experience on the major problems in this field facing all companies this year.

Results of each PERSONNEL POLICIES FORUM survey made during 1965-66 are printed in a special survey report which is sent, as part of the service, to users of these BNA labor reports:

INTRODUCTION

Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 is now in effect. It's designed to insure equal employment opportunity to all persons regardless of race, color, religion, sex, or national origin. Its principal provisions for employers are those which make it unlawful to fail or refuse to hire, or to discharge or otherwise discriminate against, any individual with respect to compensation, terms, conditions, or privileges of employment because of race, color, religion, sex, or national origin.

Shortly before the effective date of the Civil Rights Act (July 2, 1965), the editors of BNA decided to send a questionnaire to personnel and industrial relations executives who make up BNA's Personnel Policies Forum to find out the practices in their companies regarding the recruitment, selection, placement, training, and development of but one of the minority groups, specifically, Negroes. The information that follows is based on replies received from 140 executives on the Forum. In the survey, first in the 1965 series, "larger" company refers to one with over 1,000 employees; "smaller" company, to one with 1,000 or fewer employees.

Negroes are employed on a full-time basis in practically all Forum companies. A much higher percentage of them, however, employ male Negroes than female Negroes; this is especially true in smaller companies, where over nine in 10 of them employ Negro males, and less than half employ female Negroes.

What types of jobs are being held by Negroes in Forum companies? They hold down blue-collar jobs in 94 percent of the companies, white-collar jobs in just over seven in 10 companies. A third of the companies have Negroes employed as foremen or first line supervisors and nearly the same percentage have them working in middle management or executive positions. Negroes are employed in scientific, professional, or technical positions in exactly two in five Forum companies.

The percentage of Negroes in the work force is less than many would expect. When asked what percentage of their companies' total work force is Negro, a sizable majority (58 percent) reported that it was 3.9 percent or less. Nearly three in 10 executives, however, reported the figure at 9 percent or more.

Has there been any increase in the number of Negroes in Forum companies since the passage of the Civil Rights Act? According to over three in five executives there hasn't been, but many who reported otherwise were quick to point out that the increase had nothing to do with the passage of the law.

Positive steps to recruit Negroes reportedly are being taken in nearly three fourths of Forum companies. The principal method used by these firms is contacting federal and state employment services for Negro help. The only other methods used by a majority of Forum companies are to seek referrals from Negro employees currently on the payroll and to advertise in newspapers or magazines with a high Negro circulation.

Less than a fourth of Forum companies have been approached by a civil-rights group to hire Negroes, and those that have report very "courteous" or "pleasant" meetings.

Other highlights of the survey include these:

(1) Nearly nine tenths of Panel members whose companies administer mental-ability tests don't agree that such tests are unfair to many Negroes--as has been claimed--because they are based on cultural and educational levels that some Negroes have not encountered and thus underestimate the Negro's learning ability.

(2) The vast majority of Panel members stated that no special steps were being taken to demonstrate to a Negro job applicant--any more than any other job applicant--that he was refused employment simply because he wasn't capable of doing the job or because he lacked the necessary qualifications for doing the job.

(3) Very few companies have experienced problems in integrating Negroes into certain occupations.

(4) Just a handful of companies are making a special effort to encourage Negro employees to enroll in training and development programs.

> NOTE: The first questionnaire sent to Panel members in 1965 concerned the training of first-line supervisors and will be published shortly. Because of the importance of the Civil Rights Act to many executives, it was decided to publish this survey first.

COMPOSITION OF WORK FORCE

What percentage of Forum companies employ Negro workers? Male Negro workers? Female Negro workers? What types of jobs are held by Negroes in these companies? What percentage of the total work force is Negro? Has the number of Negro employees increased since the enactment of the Civil Rights Act? These and other questions were put to members of the Panel to find out the status of Negroes in these companies today. The data that follow summarize the responses.

Negroes Employed: Male & Female

Almost all Forum companies--98 percent of the larger and 92 percent of the smaller ones--employ Negroes on a full-time basis. From a sex standpoint, however, a much greater percentage of Forum companies employ male Negroes. Males of this minority group are full-time employees in 95 percent of the companies, females in 70 percent. However, while 83 percent of the larger companies have female Negroes on their payrolls, just 46 percent of the smaller ones do.

The following table gives a percentage breakdown, by sex, of the Forum companies that employ Negroes on a full-time basis:

Employment of Negroes by Sex

	All Cos.	Larger	Smaller
Employ Negroes	96%	98%	92%
Employ male & female Negroes	69	81	46
Employ male Negroes only	26	15	46
Employ female Negroes only	1	2	--
Do not employ Negroes	4	2	8

Most Panel members in those Forum companies that do not employ Negroes, either male or female, submitted reasons for their companies' practices. Here's what they had to say:

> We are located in Bryan, the county seat of Williams County, Ohio. No Negroes live in the county. The nonwhite minority group averages less than 1 percent of the population.--L. E. Bigler, Personnel Manager, The Aro Corporation, Bryan, Ohio.
> Our work force is composed presently of all white employees. Over the past 20 years we have had only one colored male employee. This man retired six years ago because of age. Our community is all white with the exception of this one retired Negro employee. Over the past years we have had three job applications from Negroes, and they were not qualified to do the work we had to offer. --R.H. Tenley, Personnel Manager, Penberthy Manufacturing Co., Prophetstown, Ill.

One executive whose company doesn't employ Negroes replied that there were no Negro residents or workers in the community. He added, however, that the company recently published a statement of policy with reference to no discrimination because of race, color, religion, sex, or national origin, and that he believed that a "qualified Negro applicant, who met the company's hiring standards, including tests when applicable, would be accepted by the employees on the same basis as any other newly assigned employee."

Another executive whose company doesn't have a Negro on the payroll at the present time makes this comment:

> Our experience in hiring Negroes, though limited, has been good. For instance, F.A. was hired as an assembler learner, became a welding utility man, and then a drill press operator. He was with the company for two-and-a-half years, but was laid off because of lack of work. We tried to rehire him, but he was working elsewhere.
> T.M. came to work as a drill press operator and was promoted to a turret lathe operator. After four years with us, he entered the Navy. A good man in electronics. After his Navy discharge he applied for re-hire. I counseled him at great length, encouraging him to enter the electronics field. This he did and is doing well.
> J.P. was hired as a finish cleaner and rose to the top drill press classification in two years. He quit to accept a job in Washington, D.C. His problem--no social life in Bradford (Pa.) for him.
> These men were all good employees, but J.P. was tops. We have few Negroes in the community. The latest census shows 75 in McKean County.--Thom Williams, Manager of Personnel, Bovaird & Seyfang Manufacturing Co., Bradford, Pa.

Types of Jobs Held by Negroes

It's one thing to know what percentage of Forum companies employ Negroes, but we also wanted to find out what types of jobs are being held by Negroes in these companies. To this end, executives on the Panel whose companies employ Negroes were asked if members of this minority group were working (1) in blue-collar jobs; (2) in white-collar jobs; (3) as foremen or first-line supervisors; (4) in middle-management positions; (5) in executive positions; (6) in scientific, technical, or professional positions; (7) as salesmen; (8) as clerks in the employment office; and (9) as recruiters.

Replies from respondents whose companies employ Negroes showed that well over nine in 10 Forum companies (91 percent of the larger and all of the smaller ones) have Negroes in blue-collar jobs on their payrolls. In the white-collar field, however, the situation is quite different, especially in the smaller companies. To illustrate, just about the same percentage of larger companies that employ Negroes in blue-collar jobs have Negroes in white-collar jobs. In contrast, just 37 percent of the smaller Forum companies have Negroes working in white-collar positions.

Following is a table which gives a percentage breakdown of Forum companies that employ Negroes in blue-collar and white-collar jobs. It also shows the percentage of companies that employ Negroes as foremen or first-line supervisors, in middle-management positions, in executive positions, as salesmen, as clerks in the employment office, as recruiters, and in scientific, technical, or professional positions.

Types of Jobs Held by Negroes

	All Cos.	Larger	Smaller
Blue-collar	94%	91%	100%
White-collar	72	89	37
Foremen or first-line supervisors	33	44	13
Middle-management	22	28	9
Executive	8	11	3
Scientific, technical, or professional	40	47	25
Salesmen	18	25	3
Clerks in employment office	14	20	--
Recruiters	8	13	--

Percentage of Negroes in Work Force

A sizable majority of executives (58 percent), when asked what percentage of their company's total work force is Negro, replied that it was less than 4 percent. However, 27 percent (a fifth of those with larger companies and 39 percent of those with smaller ones) responded by saying that at least one in 10 of their company's employees is a Negro. Following is a breakdown of the percentage of Negroes in the work force as reported by Panel members:

Percentage of Negroes in Work Force

	All Cos.	Larger	Smaller
Less than 1 percent	7%	8%	6%
1.0 to 1.9 percent	16	18	13
2.0 to 2.9 percent	20	20	20
3.0 to 3.9 percent	15	16	13
4.0 to 4.9 percent	6	9	--
5.0 to 5.9 percent	7	9	3
6.0 to 6.9 percent	1	--	3
7.0 to 7.9 percent	--	--	--
8.0 to 8.9 percent	--	--	--
9.0 to 9.9 percent	1	--	3
10 percent	11	4	23
Over 10 percent	16	16	16

Of those executives who replied that the percentage of Negroes in their company is over 10 percent, two reported that it was 12 percent and two said 15 percent. Other percentages mentioned by executives were the following: 10 to 12, 11, 13, 14, 12-15, 16, 17, 18, 25, and 33 1/3.

Highest Job Held by a Negro

As a corollary to the last inquiry, executives on the Panel were asked to name the highest job held by a Negro in their company. For convenience, we have grouped the many job titles listed in the responses under a few broad categories. These, and the percentage of companies that report the employment of at least one Negro in each category, appear below. Job titles typical of each category also are shown.

Unskilled (13 percent--5 percent of the larger companies and 29 percent of the smaller ones)--Enamel sprayer; lead janitor; truck driver; comb tender; pre-press worker; mill operator; chemical operator.

Semi-Skilled (3 percent)--Rolling mill operator; machine operator.

Skilled (9 percent)--Machinist; tool and die maker; electrician; press operator; welder; color maker.

Clerical (11 percent)--General clerk; senior cashier; production control clerk; secretary; production control expediter; staff assistant; messenger-driver; shipper and receiver in charge; department clerk.

Sales (2 percent--3 percent of the larger companies, none of the smaller ones)--Sales clerk, salesman.

Professional (18 percent--21 percent of the larger companies, 13 percent of the smaller ones)--Engineer; design engineer; process engineer; chemist; senior editor; auditor; pilot; supervisory engineer; attorney; accountant; registered nurse; head nurse; scientist.

Technical (10 percent)--Engineering draftsman; drafting technician; inventory analyst; systems analyst; marketing coordinator; market researcher; lab technician; electronics technician.

Foreman and Assistant Foremen (13 percent--18 percent of the larger companies, 3 percent of the smaller ones).

Managerial (18 percent--21 percent of the larger companies, 13 percent of the smaller ones)--Assistant divisional manager; manager-research; industrial relations assistant; store manager; laboratory director; executive; unit personnel administrator; research section head; assistant data servicing manager; plant supervisor; director of industrial relations; buyer; sales supervisor.

Management Trainees (2 percent--3 percent of the larger companies, no smaller ones).

Unclassified (5 percent) (Job duties not specified with sufficient clarity to permit classification)--group leader; "skilled machine operator."

Negro Employment Since the CRA

In order to find out what effect, if any, the Civil Rights Act had on Negro employment, Panel members were asked this question: "Since the enactment of the Civil Rights Act in 1964, has the number of Negro employees increased in your company?"

According to slightly more than three fifths of the executives, there hasn't been any increase in the employment of Negroes since the passage of the law. This reply was given by 54 percent of the executives with larger companies and 76 percent of those with smaller ones. All of the remaining executives reported that there are more Negroes on their payrolls, but a few of them were quick to point out that the increase had nothing to do with the new law. As one executive phrased it: "The increase is due to participation in Plans for Progress, and not legislation."

Those Panel members in Forum companies in which the number of Negroes had increased since the Civil Rights Act was passed further were asked to give the percentage increase. Here's a summary of their replies: Just under three in 10 of these executives answered that the increase was small, insignificant, minimal, or the like; a fifth reported the increase as 1 percent or less; 12 percent set the increase somewhere between 1.1 and 2.0 percent; 16 percent reported increases between 2.1 and 5.0 percent; while virtually all of the remaining executives reported the increase as over 5 percent. The executives in the last category gave these percentages: 8 to 10 percent, 10 percent, 20 percent, and 25 percent. One executive, it should be noted, replied that his company had no Negro employee prior to the passage of the Civil Rights Act.

RECRUITMENT OF NEGROES

There's been a lot of talk recently concerning the difficulty in recruiting Negroes. Some companies have said that they haven't encountered any problem in finding qualified Negro employees. Others explain that their company hires on the basis of merit alone and without regard to an individual's race, creed, color, or national origin, but that the company has been faced with a problem of finding qualified Negroes. Many of these companies are members of the Plans for Progress program, others are not.

A few executives--whose companies have based employment strictly on merit--strongly object to the idea of going out and finding qualified Negroes, because this approach, they feel, is giving "preferential treatment" to the Negro population. One of these executives--whose company is a member of Plans for Progress but which did not agree to seek out qualified Negroes as did other such companies--leveled a strong jab at BNA's questionnaire, while expressing other viewpoints on the Negro question. Here's what he had to say:

> With all due respect to the Bureau of National Affairs, I believe that this is the most poorly conceived questionnaire that I have ever seen emanate from your great institution.
> Initially, the purpose of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act was to create employment opportunities on the basis of merit, yet many of your questions are ill-conceived and imply preferential treatment for Negroes and I, personally, resent this approach on your part very much.
> The American public has been badly misled; employers have been duped; and our obligations under the Plans for Progress program is to employ . . . as we have for many years . . . on the basis of merit only. Currently, many of the people responsible for administering the progress under Title VII and Plans for Progress are interested in statistical improvement in the percentages of Negroes on their payrolls. I must say that, in my opinion, the percentage of Negroes on our payroll will probably be reduced and not increased as a result of the necessity of upgrading our employment standards to keep abreast of technological changes occurring within our industry. If we were hiring Negroes for the first time, obviously our statistics would improve, but I resent the following and predict that there will be substantial opposition to these points:

(1) Paying a premium salary to Negro college graduates just for the sake of getting a Negro on the payroll.

(2) Seeking out Negroes by recruiting at all-Negro colleges.

(3) Seeking out, exclusively, Negro employment sources just for the purpose of getting Negroes on the payroll.

(4) The emphasis on culturally deprived being applicable only to Negroes, because it is equally applicable to culturally deprived whites.

(5) The lack of intestinal fortitude on the part of businessmen to make the merit employment concept a reality and not use it for the purpose of preference to Negroes.

You will note in the document signed by President Johnson and our President and Chairman of the Board that we did not agree to seek out qualified Negro applicants as did many companies, since we feel that this is contrary to the American way of life and to the merit employment concept.

Again, I must repeat that your questionnaire is "lousy" and only misguides an already naive group of employers who yield to government pressure as a price of doing business.--John R. Hundley, Vice President, Industrial Relations, Granite City Steel Co., Granite City, Ill.

A few other Panel members voiced their concern in this manner:

I believe most people in the Northeast respect the Negroes' rights and view this as a moral issue. However, government interference and pressure to get more Negroes employed at all levels regardless of qualifications--the so-called "affirmative action" required by Executive Order 10925--has caused some apprehension of Title VII. The idea that employers will be pressured into discriminating for Negroes is a fear that I sense among groups of employees and applicants.

We have set high, but not unreasonable, employment standards and uniformly require all applicants to measure up to these standards. This helps offset the fear that Negroes will be hired because of pressure rather than qualification and it makes good business sense to hire the best qualified people regardless of color. I believe this is basically what the Negro community wants and expects.--Gerald C. Burdick, Director of Industrial Relations, Mesta Machine Co., Pittsburgh, Pa.

We have not made any special efforts to seek out Negro applicants any more than we make extra efforts to seek out Mexicans, Jews, Catholics, Chinese, or what have you. Nor do we discriminate against anyone solely because of race, religion, etc. We have actively cooperated with the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity, and have revised written policies and union contracts to specify company policy.

We do not believe special considerations, specific quotas, or reverse discrimination is the answer. If the qualifications of Negro applicants are comparable to whites, they will be hired. We know that increasing pressure will be placed on us to hire Negroes because they are Negroes and not because they are qualified. The answer lies with the Negroes themselves to pull themselves up by their bootstraps, without reliance on special government pressures.--Herman Harrow, Director of Industrial Relations, The Welch Grape Juice Co., Inc., Westfield, N.Y.

The vast majority of executives didn't condemn the questions asked by BNA on its questionnaire and didn't score government "pressure" or "interference," although conceivably many of them could have had thoughts along these lines but didn't go out of their way to express their feelings. Many of the respondents, however, did say that they have in the past, and will continue, to hire without regard to a person's race, creed, color, or national origin, thus implying that the Civil Rights Act and the Executive Orders concerning the employment of Negroes weren't necessary in the first place.

To find out what Forum companies actually are doing to recruit qualified Negroes, if anything, these questions were asked: "Has your company taken any positive steps to recruit qualified Negroes, and if so, what steps are being taken?" "Has your company taken any steps to insure that private employment agencies aren't being discriminatory in their referrals?" And "Has your company been approached by any civil-rights group to hire Negroes?" The answers to these and other questions appearing on the questionnaire, as given by members of the Panel, appear below.

Action Taken to Recruit Negroes

Close to three in four executives on the Panel--77 percent of those with larger companies and two thirds of those with smaller ones--reported that their company takes positive steps to recruit qualified Negroes. How do they go about it? The principal method, according to over four in five of these Panel members, is by contacting federal and state employment services for Negro help. The next most widely used method is to seek referrals from Negro workers currently employed by the company. The only other method used by a majority of Forum companies is to seek referrals from such organizations as the NAACP, CORE, and the Urban League, which is the practice in just over three fifths of Forum companies. However, slightly more than one in eight of these executives reported that his company sought referrals only from the Urban League. Other methods used by at least one in five Forum companies in which positive steps are taken to recruit qualified Negroes are to place advertisements in newspapers or magazines having a high Negro circulation to send recruiters to high schools and colleges with predominantly Negro student bodies, and to seek referrals from Negro clergymen.

The following table gives a percentage breakdown of the methods used by Forum companies to recruit qualified Negro help:

Methods Used to Recruit Qualified Negroes

	All Cos.	Larger	Smaller
Making contact with federal and state employment services	83%	86%	75%
Seeking referrals from Negro workers currently employed by the company	78	76	85
Seeking referrals from such organizations as the NAACP, CORE, and Urban League	62	78	25
Advertising in newspapers or magazines with a high Negro circulation	45	51	30
Sending recruiters to high schools and colleges with predominantly Negro student bodies	33	43	10
Seeking referrals from Negro clergymen	22	29	5
Other	22	24	15

Among the "Other" methods used by Forum companies to recruit qualified Negroes are the following: contacting local mayor's panel on equal employment opportunity; contacting other companies for Negro help; contacting influential Negro business and community leaders; seeking referrals from the Youth Opportunity Board; participating in and using the National Urban League Skills Bank; interviewing Negro applicants at times when the company is not hiring, so as to have applications on file when positions open; placing "Equal Employment Opportunity" on all advertisements; and by participating in the Cleveland Occupational Planning Programs and the Seattle Job Fair.

To illustrate, in detail, what certain Forum companies have done to seek out qualified Negro employees, here are a few comments from Panel members in these companies:

> We originally had no Negroes. With the advent of the Civil Rights Act, we hired some Negroes. We have an over-all total of five, four of whom are in production and one in the accounting office.

> We started out by writing letters to all agencies that we contact or use in securing employees, outlining our policies in such matters, and calling on the local state employment office, local business school, chairman of the Mayor's panel, on equal employment opportunities, principal of the local Negro high school (the schools are integrated) . . . the president of the local state vocational school (a Negro institution which has some white students). Letters also were written to the NAACP, and Urban League groups outlining our policies. Notwithstanding any of the above, there has been no appreciable number of Negro applicants.--James Jennings, Personnel Manager, Modine Manufacturing Co., Paducah, Ky.

We have invited representatives of various Negro groups such as HARYU (Harlem Youth Action project) and discussed the problem of attracting skilled Negroes. For example, of the hundreds of industrial engineers, skilled trades--screw machine operators, toolmakers, boring mill hands, draftsmen--we can count on one hand the number of Negro applicants. Negro leaders acknowledge that their people simply do not take advantage of the opportunity to learn such skills and trades--even though the schools are open to all and in most instances are free of charge. We encouraged the leaders to send likely trainee prospects to be interviewed for the few training programs we have. They sent one candidate who we placed in a clerical position, which offers a good opportunity for advancement.--Robert O. Wechtler, Manager of Industrial Relations, Neptune Meter Co., Long Island City, N.Y.

All plant personnel managers and plant department heads with personnel responsibilities were informed orally in November 1963 of our policy on equal employment opportunity. (The policy is to provide equal employment opportunities for all persons regardless of race, creed, color, or national origin.) This same policy also was sent at that time to all other managers and department heads in the company.

The plant managers and department heads at all plants were informed in special meetings personally by the Vice President, Organization & Personnel Division, or one of his representatives (in April 1964) that it was not only their responsibility to see that no discrimination against minority members occurred in their plants, but that they were specifically to seek out qualified colored people and employ them until a significant percentage was working successfully in their plants.

The company's policy regarding equal employment opportunity was presented to all employees in the employee publication in June 1964. Almost all of the plants with significant Negro populations in the community have now been integrated with no unfortunate incidents.--Larger-company executive.

Prior to 1964, there were no Negroes in our employ. We have never found it necessary to recruit employees, as there was always an abundant supply of applicants coming in unsolicited. Contrary to the policy of many companies, we have been quite successful in employing many people from the same family. Hence, many of our new employees have come to us recommended by present employees. With the introduction of the Civil Rights Act, however, we were somewhat at a loss as to how to find qualified Negro help. We decided to stay with our present policy of hiring only from applications, but took care to interview all Negro applicants who could possibly qualify. There were very few Negro applicants and it was several months before we were able to hire our first Negro. We were extremely selective in hiring him, as this employee would have to prepare the ground for other Negroes. We were fortunate in our first selection, and have been able to integrate with no racial problems developing. After the first Negro was hired, she was able to refer other qualified Negroes to us, and we now have seven in our employ.--Smaller-company executive.

Prior to 1964, the company had paid "lip service" to integration and in a period of five years had only hired three Negro applicants. During the summer of 1964, the Personnel Director brought this to the President's attention. He in turn brought it up before the Board of Directors. The Board formally issued an employment policy that there shall be no discrimination against any employee or applicant for employment by reason of race, color, sex, religion, or national origin. Meetings were then held with both the office and shop supervisors and with the union explaining the new policy. From that point on qualified Negro applicants were referred to supervision and, as a result, approximately 40 Negroes have been hired in the last eight months. Except for a few minor cases, the integration has been successful.--Harold F. Young, Preformed Line Products Co., Cleveland, Ohio.

Use of Private Employment Agencies

Seventy-seven percent of Forum companies (85 percent of larger companies and 62 percent of smaller ones) use private employment agencies to recruit employees. And three in four of these companies, according to replies from Panel members, take some type of action to insure that the agencies they use aren't being discriminatory in their referrals.

What definite steps are taken? Virtually all Forum company executives stated that the agencies are informed--mostly in writing, but in some cases orally--that applicants are to be considered on ability alone, that their company is "An Equal Opportunity Employer," that applicants are to be referred without regard to race, creed, color, or national origin, or some such remark. A few of these companies also inform their agencies that they are not to discriminate on the basis of sex, either.

One executive stated that in addition to sending a letter to the agencies informing them that applicants are to be considered on the basis of ability alone, his company also makes telephone calls to the agencies to motivate special effort to find qualified Negroes. Another executive replied that his company requires a compliance statement of those agencies which are used.

One smaller-company executive, who said that his company didn't take steps to insure that employment agencies weren't being discriminatory, stated that a local ordinance prohibits discrimination by employment agencies, and added that he knows "by experience that the agencies used do not discriminate."

Contact by Civil Rights Groups

This question was put to Panel members: "Has your company been approached by any civil-rights group to hire Negroes?" According to the replies, many of their companies have been approached, but not as many as might have been expected. Just under a fourth of the Panel members (35 percent of those with larger companies and 3 percent of those with smaller companies) said that their company had been contacted by at least one civil-rights group. All of the remaining companies hadn't.

Executives in those Forum companies that had been approached by certain civil rights organizations then were asked to describe their experiences. Many of them reported "courteous" or "pleasant" meetings. Here's what they had to say:

> Local human relations council met with us urging additional hirings. Very pleasant meeting. This took place over a year ago--no contact since. They were told that we would continue to hire only qualified applicants.--K.C. Brown, Director of Personnel, Channing-Wolverine Cos., Battle Creek, Mich.

> Approached by NAACP. They have been very understanding and have not flooded us with applicants. We told them our standards are high for all jobs, consequently they do their own screening.--W.F. Carman, Manager of Industrial Relations, Titanium Metals Corporation of America, Toronto, Ohio.

A few other executives on the Panel reported that they had had problems in dealing with certain civil rights groups and that these problems, for the most part, have been resolved. Here are their comments:

Effective Sources for Recruiting Negroes

Referrals by employees and contacts with federal and state employment services are the two most effective sources for recruiting qualified Negroes, according to nearly two in five Panel members. Of those who mentioned employee referrals, the total was divided this way: 14 percent explained that the referrals were from Negro employees, the rest did not specify the race of the employees who made the referrals, although it may be assumed that in some instances the referrals were made by Negro employees.

Other sources specified as being effective by Panel members, mentioned by at least one in 10 of these executives, were contacts with the Urban League (no respondent mentioned the NAACP or CORE), Negro job applicants walking in off the streets, and recruiting at colleges, high schools, and vocational schools.

Below is a tabular presentation of the most effective sources for recruiting qualified Negroes as listed by Panel members:

Most Effective Source for Recruiting Qualified Negroes

	All Cos.	Larger	Smaller
Employee referrals	38%	27%	61%
By Negro employees	14	10	22
Not specified	24	17	39
Federal and/or state employment services	38	39	35
Urban League	16	22	4
Classified newspaper advertisements	15	16	13
Recruiting at high schools, vocational schools, and colleges	13	18	4
"Walk-in" job applicants	9	8	13
Private employment agencies	5	8	--
Recommendations from influential community and business leaders	5	8	--
Other	11	14	4

Included in the "Other" category are the following: retraining centers, job clinics, community-sponsored workshops, Youth Opportunity Board, Plans for Action in Changing Times, and the clergy. Two respondents listed in this category explained that they haven't found an effective source, while one made this comment:

> We are opposed to recruiting Negroes and object to this question. It implies preferential employment. We engage in merit employment and do not seek out any particular group of people.--John R. Hundley, Vice-President Industrial Relations, Granite City Steel Co., Granite City, Ill.

SELECTION & PLACEMENT OF NEGROES

The material that follows covers a few key questions in the selection and placement of Negroes. In brief, this section shows that (1) nearly nine in 10 Panel members whose companies administer mental-ability tests do not buy the idea that such tests are unfair to many Negroes (as has been claimed) as based on cultural and educational levels that some Negroes have not encountered and as thus underestimating the Negro's learning ability; (2) Panel members can see no particular reason for treating Negroes any differently from other job applicants when informing them that they lack the necessary qualifications to perform the job; and (3) there are very few problems encountered in integrating Negroes into certain occupations.

Administration of Mental-Ability Tests

At least some job applicants are given mental-ability tests in 74 percent of Forum companies--77 percent of the larger companies and 68 percent of the smaller ones.

Executives in those companies that give such tests to prospective employees were asked this question: "Do you believe--as has been claimed--that such tests are unfair to many Negroes because they are based on cultural and educational levels that some Negroes have not encountered, and thus underestimate the Negro's learning ability?" Just one in eight of the Panel members answered affirmatively, and virtually all of the rest gave a negative reply. A few of the executives didn't answer either "yes" or "no," but gave answers such as the following: "If such tests are validated against performance, their use is justified;" "This is a distinct possibility;" and "This may be true, however, you must have some sort of yardstick to measure ability if you are to consider the best applicant."

One executive who answered neither way, gave this reply: "Since we require a high-school diploma, the use of a verbal-type test for mental capacity presented us particular problems; occasional 'double-checks' with a non-verbal test usually correlated well. However, we observed a remarkable tendency of Negro applicants to score low on a mechanical aptitude test which was non-verbal."

Respondents who answered that mental-ability tests are unfair to Negroes for the reasons cited were asked to explain why. Here's what these executives said:

> The validity of these tests undoubtedly is established on the basis of the society group over which they are spread.--Larger-company executive.

Panel members who replied that such tests are not unfair to the Negro population gave a wide variety of replies, including the following:

Turning Down Negro Applicants

In devising the questionnaire, it was assumed that some Negro applicants who failed to meet the qualifications for a particular job would charge that the company was being discriminatory in its hiring procedures. What we wanted to know was if any special steps were being taken, or under consideration, to demonstrate to a Negro job applicant that he was refused employment simply because he wasn't capable of doing the job or because he lacked the necessary qualifications for doing the job.

According to the vast majority of Panel members, no special procedure is taken or under consideration. Virtually all the executives explained the company's position as did the following Panel member who stated: "A Negro job applicant will be given the same explanation as all other applicants who fail to meet the requirements, and that is that they have not met the minimum requirements established by the company or they do not have the required qualifications for the job."

A few executives, however, explained that certain steps were being taken to demonstrate to Negroes that they were turned down only because they weren't qualified. According to one executive, his company is showing them the results of the tests that are given to both whites and Negroes; another stated that the company frankly discusses with Negroes their aptitude and experience as compared with job requirements and available applicants; still another replied that the company conducts "skillful" interviews.

Integration Problems Encountered

Very few Forum companies have experienced problems in integrating Negroes into certain occupations, replies from Panel members indicate. When asked if problems were encountered along these lines, just eight percent of the executives answered "yes"--a tenth of those with larger companies and six percent of those with smaller ones--and all of the rest said "no."

Those executives who were faced with problems of this nature were requested to illustrate the various problems they had and then to explain how the company handled the situation. Their replies follow:

> In departments where no Negroes were employed there has been apprehension but no incident of any significance. Most employees believe it better to hire qualified Negroes than to be pressured into hiring unqualified Negroes because of government or group pressure.--Gerald C. Burdick, Director of Industrial Relations, Mesta Machine Co., Pittsburgh, Pa.

> In office: Although efforts were made to insure acceptance, the Negro girls were not willing to go the needed half-way but, instead, after introductions and invitations to coffee breaks, they grouped by themselves. Further efforts by responsible girls were of no avail.--Smaller-company executive.

A couple of executives whose companies have encountered problems in integrating Negro employees into certain occupations offer advice on how to avoid the occurrence of future incidents. They explain their companies' practices this way:

> We sit down with the group involved and explain that a new Negro employee has been hired. We ask for the group's cooperation and any suggestions they may have that will help make this employee feel accepted.--J.H. Peak, Industrial Relations Manager, Pflauder Permutit, Inc., Elyria, Ohio.
> We had to overcome traditional Southern thinking. Before placing the first Negro in a position other than custodial, we discussed the situation with supervision to anticipate particular questions and problems. Then we held a meeting with employees of that department, explaining that we--from a practical and job security viewpoint--had no choice if we were to continue to enjoy government contracts. After placing the first Negro in a production job, the obvious resentment diminished to the extent that we now place male Negroes in all areas without any fanfare and in exactly the same manner as white employees.--Russell J. Sims, Director of Personnel, Fouke Fur Company, Greenville, S.C.

One executive explains that integration of Negroes into certain occupations isn't a problem because of a "general lack of community antipathy to integration, because of the strong policy in regard to equal opportunity, and because Negroes hired have been competent to perform the jobs on which they have been placed."

TRAINING & DEVELOPMENT OF NEGROES

What percentage of Forum companies have Negroes enrolled in work-study programs? Apprenticeship training programs? Supervisory and management or executive programs? Tuition-aid programs? Scholarship programs? To find out the answer to these questions, Panel members were asked a series of questions. A summary of their responses appears below.

Negro Employees: Training & Development

Executives on the Panel were asked two questions. First, they were requested to indicate if their company conducted work-study, apprenticeship-training, supervisory-training, management or executive training, tuition-aid, or scholarship programs. Those executives whose company conducted such programs then were asked to indicate if Negro employees are enrolled in these programs, or to indicate if their company did not employ Negroes in jobs from which candidates for the various programs are selected.

Following is a table which shows the percentage of Forum companies which conduct the six training and development programs listed above. Under each program listed also are the letters A, B, and C in parentheses. The (A) shows the percentage of companies that have Negroes enrolled in the program; the (B) indicates the percentage of companies that do not employ Negroes in jobs from which candidates for the program are selected; and the (C) shows the percentage of companies that failed to specify whether Negroes are enrolled in the program or whether they employ Negroes in jobs from which candidates are selected.

Motivating Negro Employees

Seven in eight executives on the Panel (85 percent of those with larger companies and 92 percent of those with smaller ones) reported that their company isn't making any special effort to encourage Negro employees to enroll in various training and development programs. The majority of these executives said they encourage all employees equally.

All of the remaining Panel members said that their company does make special efforts to get Negroes to enroll in these programs. How do they go about it? Among the methods mentioned are the following: house organ and bulletin board publicity, stressing that such programs are open to all regardless of race, publishing training opportunities in employee handbooks, etc.

Of those executives who stated that their company does not make any special effort to encourage Negro employees to enroll in these programs, one made the following remark:

> All employees are encouraged to participate in any self-improvement program that would benefit them. No special effort is made to single out the Negro for these programs since this might be considered an overt action indicating he is below par. It is my opinion Negroes and other minority groups must be made to feel they are equal. If this is done properly, these people will want to better themselves on their own by taking advantage of available programs.--J.H. Peak, Pflauder Permutit, Inc., Elyria, Ohio.

Plans for Progress Orientation

To insure that all employees, regardless of race, creed, color, or national origin, get a fair shake, the Training & Development Branch of American Airlines' Maintenance & Engineering facility, Tulsa, Okla., conducts a Plan for Progress Orientation program. Following in full text is the facility's teaching guide, which may be of interest to those who plan similar programs:

PLAN FOR PROGRESS ORIENTATION

A. General Introduction

I am sure it is not necessary in this kind of meeting to spell out all of the reasons why the matter before us deserves our attention; yet it is worth reviewing some of the principles involved, because each of us is going to be called upon from time to time to answer questions and explain the company's position. To do this, we must have a clear understanding of the "why" of American's policy with regard to nondiscrimination . . . and the Plan for Progress.

Basically, it is a matter of human rights--a moral problem, if you will, which each of us must face at some point in time. We all accept the principle that no man has the right to interfere with the rights of another. To do so is unjust and, therefore, morally wrong. Perhaps the whole idea was never better expressed than in that single sentence in the Declaration of Independence: "We hold these truths to be self-evident: that all men are created equal and are endowed by their creator with certain inalienable rights . . ." This is undoubtedly one of the greatest challenges ever raised by man at bigotry, discrimination, and intolerance.

It follows then that to the extent that American Airlines denies to any man the opportunity for a job merely because of the color of his skin, we are doing that man an injustice. We are violating one of the fundamental moral principles upon which our whole free society has been built. In this room there are undoubtedly members of many different religions; yet not one of us would advocate discrimination on that basis. In the same way it is our job as members of management to see to it that there is no discrimination against any man because of the color of his hair, or differences in his manner of speech--or for any other similar reason.

We enjoy an excellent reputation for our record of good relationships among our people. You, as members of management, are certainly chiefly responsible for building and maintaining that reputation. Yet I think we'll have to agree that in some cases in the past, we may have fallen short in our responsibilities in this respect. There is no room whatever in the American Airlines organization for discrimination, intolerance, or bigotry--whether it is based on race, religion, or color. This is the fundamental principle confronting us. It is, if you will, the moral side of the issue. And on that basis alone, our course is clear.

And yet, this isn't the whole story. There are other, additional arguments which must be considered, growing from the fact that the people of this country do not like discrimination, particularly when they are the object of discrimination. By and large, people will approve an institution that is doing the right thing, and disapprove any company that is falling short in some important respect. Call it a matter of public image, if you will, or the image which American presents to its many customers and to the public at large. We have always been known as America's Leading Airline from the standpoint of service, dependability, and technological progress. There is no earthly reason why we should not form the pattern for others to follow in the equal treatment of our employees, and those who seek employment with us.

In following a policy and a program of equal opportunity, based on qualifications alone, we not only help to win the growing economic good will of the Negro business man and vacationer, but of the public as a whole. Thus, as we contribute to the social welfare of our community, we can expect to continue to build the kind of reputation that ultimately pays off in a higher volume of business.

There is yet another aspect of the problem which may affect our business. Let me read to you the government contract clause of an order issued by President Eisenhower: "In connection with the performance of work under this contract, the contractor agrees not to discriminate against any employee or applicant for employment because of race, religion, color, or national origin. The aforesaid provision shall include, but not be limited to, the following: Employment, Upgrading, Demotion, or Transfer; Recruitment or Recruitment advertising, Layoff or Termination, Rates of Pay or other forms of compensation; and selection for training, including apprenticeship. The contractor agrees to post hereafter in conspicuous places, available for employees or applicants for employment, notices to be provided by the contracting officer setting forth the provisions of the nondiscrimination clause." This means, in effect, that as a government contractor, we are subject to the provisions of this clause, just as are the large manufacturing and aerospace corporations who deal largely with government.

There's another, broader problem that affects us just as surely, though a little less directly. Present estimates are that the nation's 16 million Negroes have an annual income of about $15 billion dollars. One out of every ten people in this country is a Negro. If they all had equal opportunities to earn a better living, there would undoubtedly be many billions of dollars of additional purchasing power available. That would increase business activity, expand the demand for all kinds of products, including air transportation. It would help to create a healthier economy and therefore add to the prosperity of American Airlines and everyone associated with us.

Another reason arises from the results of discrimination. In many cases, crime, juvenile delinquency, and other social evils are traceable to the conditions that have been created by prejudice and discrimination. The cost of dealing with these problems, apart entirely from their effect on the society in which we all live, is tremendous. And each of us individually has to pay a share of that cost.

Then, too, American Airlines, like every other major corporation, is competing for the best available talent and experience to strengthen every phase of our operation. There are many highly qualified Negro people who could make a real contribution to this organization if they were selected on the basis of their qualifications regardless of the color of their skin.

There is another even broader reason for offering job opportunities to Negroes, and it has to do with the greatest threat of our times--the slow spread of communism throughout the world. There can be no question but that one of the strongest supports of communist activity in this country has been the fact that certain types of American citizens have been denied the full opportunities of our society. More than that, one of the strongest arguments of the communists in other parts of the world has been that there is discrimination in the United States.

This has helped to win for Soviet Russia the allegiance of people who might otherwise prefer our kind of democracy--and I would remind you that two-thirds of the world's population is colored. We all have a responsibility in this connection, to help eliminate the kind of discrimination that gives the communists ammunition to play up racial bigotry and create anti-American sentiment.

As we meet here today and discuss a problem like this, we may wonder just how difficult such an adjustment in many of our minds might be. The experience of all kinds of organizations--manufacturing, merchandising, and service, and other institutions such as colleges and universities--has generally been this: Once a program of nondiscrimination and equal opportunity is adopted, if it is properly handled, there are virtually no problems whatever. And, I think we have some evidence of this with our own experience to date. Negroes are in our employ as Sales Representatives, Personnel Representatives, Ticket Agents, Ramp Agents, Reservations Agents, Mechanics, Technical Foremen, Office and Clerical workers, and various Management/Specialist positions--and, of course, as Stewardesses. These employees are doing an excellent job of selling American, and are visual evidence of the company's non-discriminatory policies. They have received numerous letters of commendation for excellent job performance from the public and from supervisors. Each, in his own way, has set an example of the ideal toward which we are working.

To sum up, we have a moral obligation here, and what we do about this obligation, how we face it, how we present it to our people, will either help our business, or damage our business, help our community, or hurt our community, help our nation, or help our enemies. The choice is ours--yours and mine--and the course is clear.

Now, in terms of an actual creative effort, and positive action toward the solution of the problem, we must understand that under no circumstances will Negroes be employed just because they are Negroes. All applicants must meet employment standards and be well qualified for their job assignments when hired. Negroes will be placed thoughout the company according to their qualifications and abilities.

As our hiring continues, the Personnel Division will talk with each supervisor requisitioning new personnel, to determine the advisability of placement of a Negro applicant, should one be thoroughly qualified to fill the vacancy. At the same time, we should make it absolutely clear to all of our people that we will not depart from purpose or policy, nor yield to outside pressures of any kind which may develop; that we simply plan to offer greater employment transfer, and promotional opportunity to the Negro employee, according to his qualifications and ability.

We must solicit the cooperation and the understanding of all employees, and from the very few who might oppose this program, we must demand it.

This, broadly, is the company's position. It is of the utmost importance that each of you understand it fully and that you prepare yourself to do your part when the time comes; to transcend whatever personal emotion of resentment or resistance you may feel as a result of attitudes which you may have developed long ago; to work in a positive and cooperative spirit to the good of your company, your community, and your country; to view what we have said here today not as a command directive which forces you to change values and traditions in which you may most sincerely believe--but as policy developed by your company to provide equality and justice to human beings, who, like yourself, wish only to better themselves in a fruitful, productive, and meaningful way.

B. The Plan for Progress -- Background

Now, to discuss in detail the PLAN FOR PROGRESS, we will first distribute additional copies of the plan to you. You will recall that the PLAN was initially issued by mail to all Management and Specialist employees on March 15, 1963. We'll take a few minutes now, to present additional details and clarification concerning the PLAN FOR PROGRESS, and American's commitment to the ideals which the PLAN represents.

American Airlines became the first domestic airline to participate in the PLAN FOR PROGRESS program, which was sponsored by the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity. Mr. C. R. Smith, and Mr. G. Marion Sadler signed a PLAN FOR PROGRESS statement along with corporate officers of other leading companies of the United States, at White House ceremonies on January 17, 1963.

Since then, we have re-emphasized--and pledge to continue--our policies for providing equal employment, transfer, and promotion opportunity for all persons, without regard to color, race, national origin, or creed. In addition these policies relate to equality in training, compensation, conditions and privileges of employment, layoff, recall, discipline, and discharge.

There can be no question of the intent of the company to implement and enforce this policy; it applies to every unit and section, to every station and city, to every function, and there can be no evasion, no lip service, no minimizing its intent or application. The policy applies to all employees, hourly, salaried, Management/Specialist, and Management, and must be activated with no mental reservation on the part of any supervisor in the performance of his duties of managing. You, as a member of management, have the responsiblity for the implementation of this policy. The meaning is clear and understandable. you should make certain that your employees know of this policy, and if they do not know of it, then you should make them aware of it, in a positive and constructive manner, leaving no room for interpretation or misunderstanding.

C. The Plan for Progress -- Specifics

a. General. -- The President of the United States has stated a national policy that all persons are entitled to equal employment opportunity, regardless of race, creed, color, or national origin.

American Airlines intends to follow the President's policy, and has voluntarily embarked on this company-wide program to expand and strengthen its efforts to promote equal opportunity.

This is a long range and a continuing program, and many problems lie ahead--not one of which is unsurmountable if approached openly, and with clear heads, clear thinking, and logic.

b. Policy. -- It should be thoroughly understood by your people that American Airlines continually seeks the best qualified applicants and employees in all categories of employment and work assignment, and that all such employment and assignment shall be made without regard, under any circumstances, to race, creed, color, or national origin. Further, that promotion, training, compensation, and conditions and privileges of employment, discharge, layoff, and recall, shall similarly be made without consideration to race, creed, color, or national origin.

How long has it been since you recommended any of your employees for promotion to a better job? Are there employees working for you now who have done superior work, who hold potential for moves to positions of greater responsibility?

Look around, when you return to your job, and make your recommendations, get them to the Personnel Division--but make certain, as you do this, that you have carefully considered everyone who may be qualified, and that you are not overlooking someone who has the potential we need, but who may have a darker skin, or a name unlike yours.

c. Dissemination of Policy. -- Each member of management has been provided with a copy of our PLAN FOR PROGRESS. In the event yours has been misplaced, we are distributing additional copies in connection with this talk. How many of you have discussed the PLAN with your people? Do your people know and understand the plan? What is their attitude toward the plan? If you haven't discussed the plan with your people as yet, when do you plan to do so?

d. Recruiting. -- In addition to being an "EQUAL OPPORTUNITY EMPLOYER" thru the issuance of the PLAN FOR PROGRESS and this re-statement of our policy of non-discrimination, American will continue to cooperate with educational organizations and school systems with emphasis toward programs designed to raise the level of aspiration of all youths.

e. Transfer, Promotion, Termination, and Recall. -- It has always been American's policy to promote from within the employees who have demonstrated by past performance that they are well qualified for promotion. When opportunities for transfer or promotion occur, careful measures must be taken to make certain that minority group employees receive equal consideration.

Every effort will be made to insure that equal consideration is given to all qualified candidates without regard to race, creed, color, or national origin.

f. Training, Compensation, Facilities. -- Minority group employees will have equal training and demonstrate equal capacity in job performance with regard to compensation. Facilities will continue to be maintained on a non-segregated basis.

g. Implementation of Policy. -- As was stated earlier in this presentation, the responsibility for compliance with this policy of non-discrimination rests with all members of management. It has been delegated from the office of Mr. C.R. Smith. We cannot avoid our individual responsibility in this area.

In addition to the implementation of this policy, all supervisors should examine facilities, bulletin boards, and the work environment to make certain that no documents or printed matter not specifically authorized by the Company or the Union are posted.

It should be generally known that the Company will under no circumstances tolerate displays which tend to discredit or degrade minority groups, and that disciplinary action, when required, will be prompt, direct, and severe, in every case. As a member of management, you are requested to police this very carefully, and to take firm and deliberate action when circumstances such as this occur.

D. Conclusion

The responsibility for the general supervision and coordination in implementing this policy has been assigned to the Vice President - Personnel. You should feel free to call upon the Personnel Division regarding any problems or questions which you may have in regard to minority group relations. Remember, the Personnel Division exists to aid you in the discharge of your duties, and to assist you in meeting your obligations as a supervisor. The Division can also be expected to maintain surveillance of the implementation of the PLAN FOR PROGRESS, and will from time to time, offer constructive recommendations concerning means of applying the PLAN. Above all, in order to succeed as it should, the PLAN requires constant team effort of all managers and supervisors. The success of the plan, lies in your hands as management representatives of American Airlines. We have every confidence in your ability to see it through.

Announcing a new and timely addition to BNA's labor information services . . .

FAIR EMPLOYMENT PRACTICES

If you are responsible for the conduct of employer-employee relations and/or have employment recruitment duties, BNA's new labor information service, FAIR EMPLOYMENT PRACTICES, is a "must" for you.

Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 makes it an avowed objective of the Federal Government to eliminate all employment discrimination based on race, color, religion, sex, or national origin in all industries affecting interstate commerce. The law imposes a new set of obligations upon employers, labor unions, and employment agencies. It gives employees, job applicants, and members of minority groups new rights, and it sets up machinery for enforcing those rights. It creates complex federal-state relationships in the enforcement of its provisions.

The purpose of BNA's FAIR EMPLOYMENT PRACTICES service is to keep you fully informed of the actual requirements of the federal and state laws dealing with "equal employment opportunity" and to acquaint you with the administrative and enforcement procedures already established or newly being developed under these laws.

• FULL TEXTS, CLEAR EXPLANATIONS

FAIR EMPLOYMENT PRACTICES combines textual material with editorial treatment. It provides full text of the applicable laws and regulations, summaries of court rulings, and clear explanations of what management can and can't do in this complex area of employment practices.

The service is divided into six sections. The first contains the text of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act; the executive orders forbidding discrimination by federal government contractors; and the regulations, forms, and administrative interpretations of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity.

The next four sections contain explanations of the coverage, prohibitions, administration and enforcement, and the reporting and record-keeping requirements of the Federal Act and orders. The final section contains the text of state laws, regulations and interpretations. The service is fully indexed.

• SERVICE KEPT UP-TO-DATE THROUGH REGULAR SUPPLEMENTATION

Every other week, you will receive a brief report, titled "Latest FEP Developments," covering current trends and events of special significance. And looseleaf supplement pages for the service itself will be issued promptly, whenever it is necessary to add new information or to replace material which has become outdated.

FAIR EMPLOYMENT PRACTICES has been developed as an addition to BNA's LABOR POLICY AND PRACTICE service and is coordinated and identified with that service. It is available, however, as a self-contained service in addition to being a unit of the complete LABOR POLICY AND PRACTICE service.

AFL-CIO LEGISLATIVE GOALS FOR 1965

Statement Adopted Unanimously by The AFL-CIO Executive Council

CONGRESS OF INDUSTRIAL ORGANIZATIONS

THE WILL OF THE PEOPLE has never been more clearly evident. Last Nov. 3, American voters overwhelmingly voiced their confidence in the social and economic structure that has been built, step by step, over the last 32 years.

They forthrightly rejected a radical assault on that structure.

They decisively proclaimed their desire to move on from a good present to a great future.

They gave their mandate to the program of progress Pres. Johnson has called the "Great Society."

Now it is incumbent upon all who joined in that mandate to translate it into practical reality.

Basically, this means adapting the ideals and aspirations of the Founding Fathers of the Republic to the America in which we live—America in the second half of the 20th Century.

The ideals and aspirations have not changed. Liberty, equality, opportunity are still the American dream. But the nation itself has changed to a degree that the wisest men of 200 years ago did not and could not have conceived.

The United States has burgeoned from a sparse scattering of farms and villages along the Atlantic coast into a vast urban and industrial complex, spanning the continent, extending half way across the Pacific and reaching north beyond the Arctic Circle.

The 2.5 million Americans of 1776 have become over 190 million today. Today's Americans—most of them—live in the city, not the country. They work in business and industry, not on farms. With the same unquenchable spirit, the same energy and the same ingenuity that characterized their forefathers, they have made the United States the richest and most productive land the world has ever known.

But for too many Americans this wealth and this production is a remote ideal. They do not share in it; they live in misery and want.

More than one in five of America's families suffer the indignities of unemployment, poverty and slums. America's major problem, unemployment, remains unsolved, despite the record 46 months of continuing rise of economic activities.

These ugly aspects of our social order will not simply disappear by the wave of a magic wand. Indeed, there is a danger that they can fester and poison our entire society.

The rising demands of our youth, of Negroes and of disadvantaged Americans of all races and creeds for jobs and economic opportunity cry out for positive responses. This is our challenge.

Today we have the opportunity to meet that challenge, to take, in 1965, a giant step forward on the road to a society that will enable all our citizens to realize their full potential. And this giant step forward can be taken through enactment of the measures the AFL-CIO has long urged.

These are not novel measures. They are not visionary measures. They are practical, down-to-earth measures.

They are far less revolutionary than the idea upon which this nation was built—the idea that "all men are created equal." Yet they are essential if the goals of 1776 are to be realized today.

The only requirements are the courage, determination and imagination to support what needs to be done; to make a massive investment in America, one that this nation's immense productive potential can take in stride, one that truly brings within reach an end to poverty and deprivation in our time.

Let us first summarize our goals.

We believe in the total elimination of poverty in America.

We believe that this requires, first, jobs at good wages for all who are able and willing to work; and second, a social insurance program that protects young and old alike from the economic hazards which are no fault of their own.

We believe in full and equal opportunity, full and equal rights, for every American in every phase of life, regardless of race, creed, color or national origin.

We believe this equality can be brought about only if there is full employment.

We believe that free collective bargaining is an indispensable element in the search for economic justice and personal liberty for workers.

We believe in the wise use of America's riches to create a richer life for all Americans.

We believe that government, the instrument of the people, should use its powers to attack and to solve the people's problems.

We believe that progress toward these goals can be made in the 1965 session of Congress by the measures set forth below.

Restoring Free Collective Bargaining

The importance of free collective bargaining to the living standards of workers and to the economic stability of the nation has been recognized for three decades; the encouragement of collective bargaining, through all this time and through all the changes in labor-management legislation, remains the stated policy of the United States.

Thus it is evident that free labor and free management should be able freely to agree upon mutually acceptable terms of employment. They should, therefore, be free to negotiate a contract making union membership a condition of employment.

Experience has proven the adverse effects of the unique provision of the Taft-Hartley Act making it possible for the states to forbid such voluntary labor-management agreements. Sec. 14(b) allows the states to outlaw the union shop as such, regardless of the wishes of the workers and their employers. It cedes a negative jurisdiction to the states in an area which the federal government has otherwise properly pre-empted.

This is an unwarranted intrusion upon the rights of organized workers and their employers to negotiate mutually acceptable agreements. It offends the basic principles of federal-state relationships and should be repealed.

National Labor Legislation

There are other provisions of existing federal labor law that directly conflict with the established policy of the United States to further collective bargaining. These provisions restrict the right of workers to organize, to picket and to strike. They urgently require revision.

Three major bills relating to labor-management relations have been enacted since 1935. Some of their provisions overlap or are contradictory, causing needless complications, uncertainty and court appeals. We urge prompt action to eliminate inequities and resolve contradictions in basic labor-management law.

Social Insurance

The Social Security System's contribution to American life has touched virtually every family in the nation. Possibly more than any other social program, it has operated to ameliorate and prevent poverty. It has improved the quality of everyday life for millions.

The worst threat to old-age security today is the high cost of illness. The general design of a workable remedy became clear beyond doubt in the 88th Congress—a national hospital insurance system based on social security principles for those over 65. Now the 89th Congress must implement what is unquestionably the will of the people.

To make Social Security truly effective in reducing poverty, substantial increases in cash benefits are also absolutely necessary—for the retired, the disabled and for widows and dependent children. Adjustments in such benefits should also take into account that age 65 is in fact no longer a realistic age for retirement. As a minimum the actuarial reduction for early retirement should be modified.

There should be established a federal system of reinsurance for all private pension plans to assure the payment of the benefits provided by such plans. Tax credit for employer payments into such pension plans should be contingent on participation in the reinsurance plan.

It has been clear for years that unemployment compensation must be freed from inequitable state limitations on weekly benefits, eligibility and duration of payments, and from inadequate financing. We have repeatedly asserted that a federal system of minimum standards must be enacted to enable unemployment insurance to fulfill its intended role of maintaining a strong economy and meeting the needs of those who are unemployed through no fault of their own.

Wage-Hour Improvements

Since most Americans agree that there is no excuse for poverty in America, poverty among those who are fully employed at useful work must surely be regarded as intolerable. There must be no "working poor" in the richest nation on earth.

The Fair Labor Standards Act was designed to outlaw that kind of poverty. The time has come when it must be modernized to achieve that end.

Coverage of the act should at once be broadened to include all workers whose jobs affect interstate commerce. The exclusion of millions, over many years, has been a disgraceful injustice and an economic absurdity.

The basic minimum wage should be raised to $2 an hour, simply to assure all employed workers of a standard of living above the poverty level.

The standard workweek should be cut to 35 hours, in line with the higher productivity of American workers.

The overtime penalty should rise from time and a half to double time, in order to discourage overtime and create new jobs.

Education

Every American child is entitled to as much education as he wants and can usefully absorb.

This is a basic principle. It is basic to the American way of life and it is basic to the future of the United States as a nation.

Great strides were taken by the 88th Congress, but there are greater strides yet to be taken if this principle is to become a reality. They include:

1. A major program of federal aid to elementary and secondary schools to help meet all needs, including construction, in the categories of instruction covered by the National Defense Education Act. This should include construction grants for all schools.

2. Substantial federal aid to schools which serve large numbers of culturally-disadvantaged children from low-income areas, including work-study opportunities for vocational and high school students.

3. Comprehensive assistance, embracing scholarships, expanded student loans and work-study opportunities, for junior college and college students. The Cold War GI Bill of Rights would help meet this need.

4. We urge the appropriation of additional federal funds to foster the growth of community junior colleges.

Urban Problems

The great cities that only a generation ago were America's pride are now beset by problems that only expanded federal action can resolve. The decay of city centers is a shocking waste. The urgency of these problems grows daily, for every day the United States becomes increasingly an urban nation.

Ever since the early years of the New Deal this country has been pledged to the proposition that every American family is entitled to a decent home. That goal must still be met.

Public housing for low-income families has been shamefully neglected. A heavy increase in grants-in-aid is required to give reality to the fight against slums.

Low-cost, long-term loans must be more readily available to provide housing for those of moderate income.

These same needs should also be met in rural areas, but the problem is far more acute in the teeming cities.

Urban renewal in the broad sense must be stepped up, with emphasis on slum clearance and modernization, based upon community planning.

Special attention—and assistance—must be devoted to the thousands of families and small businesses which even now are dislocated each year by new highways, housing developments and other public projects.

Mass transit is a decisive factor in the future of urban life. The bill enacted by the 88th Congress must be reinforced by fully adequate appropriations.

All the foregoing can be expedited by the establishment of a Dept. of Housing & Community Affairs in the Cabinet.

Community Facilities

There has for years been a vast backlog of urgently-needed community facilities, from water and sewage systems to cultural centers and public buildings. A continuing federal program of grants-in-aid is essential to dispose of this backlog and keep pace with the mounting requirements of a rapidly-growing population. In addition, full appropriations of already-authorized funds is needed for the attack on air and water pollution and for the construction of highways, hospitals, other health facilities, college buildings, and airports.

This whole area is a classic example of the economic dividends that flow from social progress. As the nation invests in these facilities, it will also create huge numbers of useful jobs—and therefore increase the number of consumers and taxpayers.

Regional and Resource Development

Experience under the Area Redevelopment Act of 1961 has demonstrated the need for a broader assault on chronic depression—an assault that embraces a region rather than a single community. The proposed Appalachia program conforms to this need and it has our support.

There should be similar programs in other areas, based upon the concept of regional planning. Financial and technical assistance by the federal government can obviously be more effective on this broader base.

There remains the national challenge of conservation and development of natural resources. Such areas as water supply and river development, giant grids for the interstate transmission of electric power, desalinization of sea water, the preservation and maintenance of national forests and range lands—and these are but a few—require firm federal initiative.

Health Problems

The ever-accelerating advances in medical science hold forth the promise of long life and good health to a degree never before imagined.

The benefits of this astonishing progress must be made available to all Americans. But this cannot be brought about without legislative action.

There is still a pressing need for skilled personnel to man the hospitals and other health facilities now being built. This requires federal scholarships and other assistance to students in the health professions. Also among the essential areas of federal action are grants and loans for the operation of community mental health centers, construction of facilities for direct-service health plans based on group practice, and hospital construction and the modernization of existing hospitals.

War on Poverty

Pres. Johnson's declaration of war on poverty has captured the imagination of America, and rightly so. It is fully consistent with the policy of the American labor movement, for poverty has been our sworn enemy since the first union was established.

Virtually every item in this present list of legislative goals is an attack on poverty. Many are direct, like wage-hour improvements; some are indirect, like conservation; but all contribute to the objective.

The war on poverty is already in progress and needs more support; specifically, it needs more money. We refer in particular to the Economic Opportunities Act and the Manpower Development & Training Act.

Tax Policy

There is general agreement that the federal tax structure needs improvement.

We support at this time the elimination of excise taxes that now apply to goods and services generally used by all Americans.

We further call for effective action against all tax loopholes.

We most vigorously urge a revision of the tax structure to ease the disproportionate burden on low income groups, and we insist on the elimination of income taxes imposed upon those who are at or below the poverty level.

We oppose the indiscriminate rebate of federal taxes to the states with no restrictions on the use of such funds.

Consumer Protection

It has been clear for a long time that the American consumer is at a serious disadvantage in dealing with sharp lenders and unethical merchants. A number of measures to aid the consumer that have already been proposed deserve enactment.

One is a simple requirement that an installment buyer should know how much interest he is really paying.

Another asks that packaged goods give a clear indication of what's inside, in terms that the buyer can understand without a slide-rule.

Others reinforce the work of the late Sen. Kefauver on drugs and drug prices.

We also propose a federal consumer information service to help buyers meet the complexities of today's marketplace.

We cannot understand why any reputable merchant or manufacturer should oppose these simple ground-rules. They are consistent with the principle of free competition. Similarly, we oppose all forms of "fair trade" laws, under any name, that are designed to maintain monopoly price-fixing.

Migratory Labor

Migrant farm workers have long been the most painfully exploited people in America, whether they were citizens or imported visitors.

The AFL-CIO was gratified when Congress put an end to the importation of Mexican farm laborers under Public Law 78. We are appalled to learn that some large agricultural interests are making efforts to continue the same program under Public Law 414. This is clearly contrary to the intent of Congress and it must not be allowed to happen.

Moreover much remains to be done for American migratory labor. Congress should provide minimum wage standards for migratory farm workers, include them under the unemployment compensation system, strike out their exemption from the protection of the general labor laws, assure them of adequate housing and health services and see to it that their children have full and equal educational opportunities.

Foreign Trade and Aid

The AFL-CIO has amply demonstrated its commitment to the principle of trade expansion.

We have also stressed that trade expansion will continue to command broad national support only if accompanied by a mechanism to protect workers and businesses adversely affected by increased imports.

The present law contains a mechanism but it has yet to work. Unless it can be made to work, it must be replaced by one that does.

The incorporation of fair labor standards in international trade should be an integral part of United States trade policy.

The foreign aid and economic assistance programs have also had the whole-hearted support of the labor movement since their inception. While we believe private American investment in developing nations is desirable, it can only be a supplement, not a substitute, for government help. Moreover, while the United States government should make sure that funds provided for specific projects are spent efficiently, it should fully respect the right of aided nations to determine their own forms of economic control and ownership. The use of American flag ships in transporting materials used in aid projects and indeed in all aspects of our export-import commerce must be expanded.

The principles of the Alliance for Progress should guide American aid undertakings in Africa and Asia. The United States should also seek joint efforts with other democracies in both civilian and military assistance projects in new and emerging nations.

Conclusion

Inevitably there will be those who ask what all this will cost; who question whether the nation can afford a better life for its people.

There is a two-fold answer.

The first is that America cannot afford anything less. Poverty, unemployment, discrimination and ignorance are intolerable in a society that has the resources to wipe them out.

Second, what we are proposing is a massive investment in the future of the nation—an investment the country can easily afford, and one that is essential to its destiny and to the future of freedom on earth.

Our view would be more easily understood if the United States like other western nations adopted a capital budget—an accounting that truly distinguishes between costs and investment. The federal government's accounts should separate housekeeping costs and national security outlays, on the one hand, and on the other, the sums used to create, improve or acquire assets, or advanced as recoverable loans. This is the general practice in private business, in many states and cities, and even in well-run individual households.

Nearly all our proposals for 1965 involve federal outlays which are in the investment category. And we believe they are investments this country dare not refuse to make.

We believe in the Great Society. We believe in it, not just as a dream, but as an attainable reality. We do not want a Great Society just for union members, or just for wage-earners, but for all—for every American, and indeed for all mankind.

The goal is within reach. Our own nation is rich, productive, and prosperous as never before. Human knowledge is every day expanded into new areas. The aspirations of 2,000 years are within our grasp.

Change in the Contemporary South. Edited by ALLAN P. SINDLER. (Durham, N. C.: Duke University Press, 1963. Pp. x, 247. $7.50.)

The failure of the South to become one of the main currents of American life has long attracted the attention of novelists, poets, literary critics, sociologists, historians, political scientists, economists, and other genre of publicists. That such attention is deserved will be doubted by few, that such a propensity to attract attention is complimentary will be questioned by many. Change in the Contemporary South is a welcome addition to the literature on the South as prime problem in national life. An outgrowth of a conference conducted by the Department of Political Science at Duke University, the volume consists of nine essays by recognized writers in history, economics, law, sociology and political science.

Thomas D. Clark provides historical perspective in the first essay and concludes that "the modern South cannot accept the advantages offered by industrialism without adapting many of its social and political ideas and forms." (p. 23). Although many changes have occurred as a result of rising urbanization and industrialization, the refusal of southern leadership for the most part to face realistically the dilemma posed by a sterile and perverted traditionalism and economic development has produced inordinate stresses and tensions in politics, economics, race relations, and the social order generally. Migration from the South, low wages, uneven economic growth, poor education, lack of capital and anti-intellectualism are all treated graphically by Joseph J. Spengler.

John P. Frank has a comprehensive essay on the legal developments in race relations followed by Edgar T. Thompson's chapter on the second emancipation in which he traces changes in race relations generally and changes in the ethos of the Negro. One aspect of this new ethos is the increase, uneven as it is, in Negro voter registration ably treated by Donald R. Matthews and James W. Prothro in what is perhaps the most important essay in the volume.

The inevitable and chronic speculation concerning political realignment in the South, its causes and consequences, presents itself in successive chapters by Robert J. Steamer on southern disaffection with the national Democratic Party, Donald S. Strong on durable Republicanism, and a major political realignment by Philip E. Converse. All three of these writers agree that significant changes are taking place with respect to party loyalties and voting patterns. Mr. Strong tends to interpret these changes from the perspective of distinctly southern factors, whereas Mr. Converse sees the South as participating in national trends.

None of these writers emphasizes the kind or quality of Republican growth that is occurring in the South. That the present generation of southern Republicans with their extreme emphasis upon state rights, laissez-faire economics, racial segregation, and a narrow nationalism in world affairs hardly speak with the same inflections and accents as Abraham Lincoln, Theodore Roosevelt, or leaders like Elihu Root, Charles E. Hughes, Henry L. Stimson, or even Everett McKinley Dirksen is fairly obvious. Certainly, there is little that is national, Republican, or conservative among the "new" Republicans of the "new" South. It is seriously to be doubted that either the nation or the Republican Party benefits through the attachment of radical reactionaries and unphilosophical anarchists to a party once identified with political and economic nationalism, basic civil rights for all people, and active government. For the Republican Party to exchange Abraham Lincoln for John Randolph of Roanoke or Theodore Roosevelt for "Pitchfork Ben" Tillman is hardly an equal bargain.

Unions, Civil Rights Groups Join In Alabama

MOBILE, Ala. (PAI) — Trade unionists and Negroes are joining forces in Alabama to provide the state with a political organization dedicated to the liberal, pro-labor policies of the National Democratic Party.

The "third force" would give the voters an alternative between the Dixiecrats led by white supremacist Gov. George Wallace and the Goldwater-oriented Republicans.

Plans for the organization came to light during a convention of the Alabama Democratic Conference, Inc. here. This group was originally founded by Negro civil rights leaders who were excluded from the Wallace party.

In recent months liberal and moderate whites have joined the Negroes with the open objective of either forcing their way into the state Democratic organization or establishing a liberal Democratic force aligned with the National Democratic Party.

Among the trade union speakers at the conference were Philip Weightman, associate director of the AFL-CIO's Committee on Political Education in Washington and Thomas (Teddy) Gleason, president of the International Longshoremen's Association. The ILA has a large membership at the Mobile port.

The Alabama AFL-CIO is not officially part of the conference but a large number of unions are participating.

One union spokesman told Press Associates that "we have embarked on a joint campaign with the civil rights groups to register as many Negroes as possible and our registration campaign is already well under way."

A problem openly faced by some unions in Alabama is that some of their members are tied up with such extremist groups as the Ku Klux Klan or the White Citizens Councils and this limits their effectiveness. Other unions, however, find that extremists are such a small proportion of their total membership that they can work with civil rights groups with relative freedom.

The conference, attended by some 35 delegates, adopted a resolution asking the National Demoder way.

A problem openly faced by some unions in Alabama is that some of their members are tied up with such extremist groups as the Ku Klux Klan or the White Citizens Councils and this limits their effectiveness. Other unions, however, find that extremists are such a small proportion of their total membership that they can work with civil rights groups with relative freedom.

The conference, attended by some 35 delegates, adopted a resolution asking the National Democratic Party for a progress report on a requirement adopted at the 1964 convention that Alabama's Democratic Party open its activities to full participation by Negroes.

Orzell Billingsley, Jr., Birmingham Negro lawyer who heads the conference, said that no action would be taken by the group until the Alabama Democratic Party's executive committee meets in January and decides whether or not it will admit Negroes.

Miss Ethel Payne, assistant to the vice chairman of the Democratic National Committee, pledged that the national organization would see to it that Negroes are permitted to participate fully in the affairs of the Alabama party.

A key speaker at the conference was Alabama Attorney General Richmond Flowers, a bitter opponent of the Klan who has also battled Wallace. He was given a standing ovation.

He gave a hard-hitting talk in which he declared: "The time has come for us to act like men. Our people are turning their backs on a party that has done so much for them through far-reaching laws which were fought throughout by the opposition party."

Flowers gave no hint as to what his own plans would be. There has been speculation that he might run for governor. Wallace, himself, met with a major defeat at the hands of the Alabama legislature when they refused his demand that they act to permit the governor to succeed himself.

One other major office open in 1966 is that of the seat of Senator John Sparkman. A one-time moderate, Sparkman in recent years has aligned himself with ultra conservatives in Congress. Wallace could oppose him.

A world free from tuberculosis? Not now, but some day, perhaps. Christmas Seals work for that kind of future. Have you answered your Christmas Seal letter?

EFFECTS OF SHIFT IN POPULATION

The Big Changes Shown in Census Survey

Broad shifts in population . . . West and Southwest showing biggest gains . . . national total growing less than expected, yet approaching 200 million. These and other changes, now reported officially, hold important keys to planning for future.

A close look at the America of the mid-1960s, spotting important changes that occurred during the first half of the decade, is provided now by the U. S. Census Bureau.

It is set out in a new report, "Americans at Mid-Decade," showing what has happened to the country in the five years after the 1960 census.

What's shown is a pattern of broad shifts in population, rising incomes, changes in the age groupings of the population, other trends. These shifts carry important meaning for businesses in their market and sales planning.

Biggest increases in potential markets are developing in the West and Southwest. California, during the past five years, has overtaken New York as the most populous State, while Texas has replaced Ohio as fifth-largest.

Fastest-growing States are: Nevada, Arizona, California and Florida.

Some other States in the South and some along the path of the Boston-Washington "megalopolis" are also growing faster than the country as a whole.

Political power as well as buying power is affected by changes afoot.

All across the U. S., the shifting of people is toward metropolitan areas and away from smaller towns and the countryside. States depending on farming are showing the slowest growth.

Now: 195 million. All told, the U. S. population now has passed 195 million. Of these people, almost two thirds live in or near big cities.

People are found, by and large, to be bettering themselves in many ways.

There is an upgrading of workers, with more and more people in professional and technical occupations. Today, for the first time in U. S. history, more than half of all white Americans 25 and above have a high-school education.

Incomes of $10,000 a year now are common. One of every five families earns that much. A decade ago, only 1 in 10 had an equivalent income.

More education and rising incomes create expanding demand for goods and services and an upgrading in consumer tastes.

Each year sees the population grow by between 2.5 and 3 million people. This rate of growth has slowed a bit in recent years, due largely to a declining trend in the birth rate.

The Negro population, on a percentage basis, is increasing more than half again as fast as the white population.

More of the young. The population, as a whole, is becoming somewhat younger. In the last five years, the biggest increase has occurred in the age group of 14 to 24. These are the people pressing on the market for jobs, pushing up enrollment in high schools and colleges and adding to the number of marriages.

More marriages, in turn, are expected

Age 65 and older	16.7	18.2	Up 1.5 million or 9%

Half of the population rise in the last five years has been concentrated in the 14-24 age group — the people now flooding high schools and colleges, looking for their first jobs, getting married, forming new families.

in future years to mean a rising number of births; this in spite of the declining birth rate and a trend toward marriage at a somewhat older age than has been the case in recent years.

As marriages rise, so do the number of new households formed. And new households mean larger demand for houses and apartments, and for everything that goes into them.

All of these developing trends will have their effect on school enrollment.

As a result of the declining birth rate of recent years, the rate of increase of children moving through elementary schools has slowed down sharply. Enrollment in high schools, now growing at a fast clip, is to drop in future years as those now of elementary-school age move upward.

Pressure eased. In other words, many communities now are beginning to feel declining pressures to expand their school plants.

It's a different story in the case of the nation's universities and colleges, where enrollment is to surge sharply in coming years.

All this and more shows up in the United States of the mid-1960s. Changes are vast, and they include shifts of population that are certain to have a profound impact on many aspects of American life.

C.O.P.E. REPORT

COMMITTEE ON POLITICAL EDUCATION, AFL-CIO
815-16th STREET, N.W., WASHINGTON 6, D. C.

EDITORS: This is another in the "C.O.P.E. REPORT" series which will come to you monthly for exclusive publication in National and International Union Journals.

COPE Report for March 1966 International Journals

NOTE TO EDITORS: The main story and sidebars cover major facts for election year 1966. We hope you will be able to use these in your international union publications.

1966--THE TOUGHEST TEST IS COMING

Example: A switch of two votes in the House of Representatives in 1965, would have butchered the public works bill. A key proposal to increase public works funds barely passed, 196-194.

Example: A switch of four votes in the House would have kayoed the President's proposal for rent subsidies for the poor. It nudged by, 208-202.

Example: A switch of 12 votes in one instance and 10 in a second would have doomed 14 (b) repeal in the House. In the first case, a move to kill the repealer was defeated, 223-200. Following that, the vote on repeal itself passed, 221-203.

Example: A switch of only 17 votes would have torpedoed the new Housing and Urban Development Department, proposed to coordinate federal aid to cities. It got by the House, 217-184.

More than anything else, these examples and others like them spotlight the crucial nature of the 1966 congressional elections. They show how thin the line is between the present liberal-controlled Congress and a potential conservative-controlled Congress.

They show how important labor's role in politics will be this year, for the new programs workers and their families want and need are riding on the results of the voting next November.

The main event will be the battle for control of the House, and the major battlefields will be those normally-conservative districts that switched to liberal in 1964 on the strength of the Johnson landslide.

There are 51 first-term liberals in the House. As the above examples show, these newcomers provide the winning margin on a significant number of key votes. Any heavy cut in their numbers next November would douse hopes for new Great Society legislation in the next few years.

Addition of only a small number of conservatives would install a new set of uppers for the presently defanged Dixiecrat-GOP coalition and bring back the bite that for decades chewed up efforts to enact needed new programs.

In the Senate, continued Democratic control is assured, though here too a loss of liberal seats could endanger passage of liberal legislation.
The present balance is 68-32 for the Democrats. Of the 35 Senate seats up for grabs this year, 21 are held by Democrats and 14 by Republicans.

The factors that make 1966 labor's toughest political test ever are these:

* 1. The tradition of off-year losses that hit the party in control of the White House. The average loss in the House over the past 60 years has been 37 seats, in the Senate five seats.

* 2. The large number of new liberals coming from districts with histories of conservative representation.

* 3. The absence of a strong head-of-ticket like President Johnson, whose huge vote rubbed off on liberal candidates in 1964.

* 4. The growing savvy of right wing and conservative political action groups. It is not just the Birchers and other extremist organizations. Respectable conservative outfits like the NAM's Business-Industry Political Action Committee (BIPAC) and the AMA's American Medical Political Action Committee (AMPAC) have picked up know-how in recent campaigns, and will be more effective this year.

* 5. The usual drop-off in voting that takes [illegible] in non-presidential years, a drop-off averaging more than 15 percent. It cuts most deeply into the vote of working people.

Control of U.S. House of Representatives. Present strong liberal majority threatened by three factors:

1. Many liberals elected in 1964 came in on Johnson presidential sweep, were elected from usually conservative districts. Particularly vulnerable: 51 first-term liberals whose votes gave President the edge he needed for Great Society legislation.

2. Traditional shake-out that hits party in control of White House in congressional election years. Average loss of seats in past 60 years: 37 in House, five in Senate.

3. Stepped-up right wing political action. John Birch Society alone eyes $12 million political warchest for ultra-conservative candidates, plans organization in 325 congressional districts. Fast-growing rightist GOP splinter groups also geared for effective action.

RUGGED SENATE RACES LOOMING

Some Senate races this year shape up as potential donneybrooks, with both incumbent liberals and incumbent conservatives involved.

In Michigan, Sen. Pat McNamara (D), who has taken the lead in legislation to heop the elderly, might run into Gov. George Romney as an opponent, though Romney hasn't yet announced. McNamara in 1960 won with only 51.7 percent of the vote.

In Montana, progressive Sen. Lee Metcalf will be the target of right wing and conservative interests and may face a tough foe, Gov. Tim Babcock who is mentioned as a potential GOP candidate. Metcalf won by only 50.7 in 1960.

Other liberals who won close races their last times around are Sen. Paul Douglas (D.-Ill.) who won with 55.5 percent of the vote; Sen. Thomas McIntyre (D.-N.H.), 52.3 percent; Sen. Fred Harris (D.-Okla.), 51.2 percent; Sen. Ross Bass (D.-Tenn.), 52.1 percent; Sen. Jennings Randolph (D.-W. Va.), 55.3 percent.

Conservative Republicans up for election this year who had tight races in their last campaigns are Gordon Allott (Colo.), 54 percent; J. Caleb Boggs (Del.), 50.7 percent; Len Jordan (Idaho), 50.9 percent; Jack Miller (Iowa), 51.9 percent; Karl Mundt (S.D.), 52.5 percent; John Tower (Texas), 50.6 percent.

NEWPORT NEWS LANDMARK PACT

Shipyard Case Opens Many New Opportunities

The nation's largest shipbuilder has signed an agreement with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission to provide broad new promotion opportunities for Negroes.

The Newport News Shipbuilding and Drydock Company signed the agreement after six days of intensive negotiations at Commission headquarters in Washington. Representatives of the Department of Defense and the Department of the Navy joined with Commission conciliators in shaping the agreement.

The agreement grew out of employment discrimination charges filed with the Commission by 41 Negro employees under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The Commission had determined reasonable cause to believe Newport News was violating Title VII. The Departments of Labor and Navy also had determined that Newport News was not in compliance with the Executive Order dealing with Federal contracts.

Under the agreement, an outside expert, approved by the Company and the Commission, will evaluate jobs and pay rates in the Newport News plant to determine whether Negroes are being paid the same rates as whites doing the same or substantially equivalent work. Where it is determined that Negroes are being paid discriminatory rates they will be immediately raised to equivalent levels with whites.

A survey of key departments will be made to determine the promotion pattern of whites over past years. The history of Negro promotions will be compared to the white promotion profile and where Negroes have not progressed accordingly, they will be promoted immediately.

At the time of the agreement, Commission Chairman Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., said:

"One effect of this agreement will be an increase in pay for hundreds of Negro employees at the Newport News plant. It will also mean widespread promotions for Negroes. An even more far reaching effect will be the application of this agreement as a model for the correction of discrimination in other industries by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. In this case, the government spoke with one voice."

The package of remedial programs which the company and the Commission developed was described by Roosevelt as being "not a grudging agreement to stop discriminating, but a model of comprehensive affirmative action to reach and counteract the effects of prior discriminations."

Secretary of Labor W. Willard Wirtz said: "The successful completion of these negotiations resulted from a concerted government effort to make equal employ-

SPECIAL ISSUE—The First Year—pages 2-11

EEOC

A SPECIAL ISSUE—THE FIRST YEAR

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission has been pounding down the track ever since the starting gun was fired on July 2, 1965.

The breathing has been a little heavy at times and there has been some wide swinging on the turns, but this agency, created by Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, looks as if it might cross the first year finish line without serious injury.

This issue of the EEOC NEWSLETTER takes a look back—and a look ahead.

It sees more than 7000 employment discrimination charges received by EEOC in 10 months where only 2000 were anticipated for the whole first year.

It sees some dramatic landmarks along the way—such as the Bogalusa Dovetailing Principle and the Newport News Agreement.

It sees some of the complexity that was predicted in the part of Title VII which deals with sex discrimination—but none of the bunny girl frivolity that caught the early headlines.

It sees the tremendous reservoir of goodwill—the willingness to comply with the law—that exists in many segments of business, industry and labor . . .

And it ruefully sees the difficulties of getting at discrimination directed against the Mexican-American and Spanish-speaking minorities in the United States.

The nuts and bolts of the line operations are described briefly in this Newsletter.

The Commission lost its chairman to the New York Governor's race, but he left his mark of leadership on the first 10 months.

Each of the Commissioners expresses his feelings about the accomplishments, shortcomings, and future goals and needs of this agency's leading part in the battle to end discrimination in employment practices.

From a sudden and unrehearsed start, the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission has come a long, if sometimes bumpy way. It is on the threshhold of even tougher problems, more demanding challenges, and hopes to have a little better budget to keep it abreast of the vote of confidence given it by the public in all parts of the Nation. ■

COMPLIANCE

7,000 COMPLAINTS FLOW IN

More than any other division of EEOC, the Office of Compliance has felt the strain of short budget and staff during the Commission's first 10 months.

"Compliance" is where the action starts—and keeps on and on and on.

Charges of employment discrimination arrive in the Office of Compliance. They are analyzed there. If they appear to have grounds, they are investigated from there.

When the investigation is completed, and the Commission finds cause, the charge comes back to Compliance and the Conciliation Section moves into action.

Picture a staff budgeted for on the basis of 2000 complaints in a year—confronted with more than 3000 charges in the first six months—and 7000 by the 10-month mark.

Compliance has operated with no more than 45 investigators—all but 20 on loan from other agencies—when it should have had almost 100 to keep ahead of the avalanche.

In spite of it, these figures show what has been done:

In the first 10 months, the Commission received 7,060 charges of discrimination in employment. These cases were analyzed as follows:

Probable jurisdiction (recommended for investigation)	3,074
Deferred for state or local FEP action	686
Returned for additional information	958
Rejected—no jurisdiction	1,809
Closed or withdrawn	533

Investigations have been completed on 1,220 of the 3,074 cases recommended.

The Commission has found cause to believe there is a violation of Title VII in 517 of these cases and sent them to the Conciliation Section. No cause has been found in 218 of the cases in which investigation is complete. Eighty-two cases have been closed during investigation and 403 are pending a finding before the Commission.

Of the cases where cause has been found, 70 have been successfully conciliated. Thirty more are nearing conciliation. In 25 cases, conciliations have been designated "unsuccessful," either because signed agreement was not achieved, or all of the counts charged were not resolved. But in most of these cases, substantial accomplishments have been made.

The Compliance Division is expanding its staff as rapidly as the supplemental appropriation will permit. It hopes to have 96 investigators on full-time staff soon. The Division hopes that this will enable it not only to catch up with the backlog, but to stay even with the flow of charges that continues to come to the Commission. ■

TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

Working with Business and Labor

EEOC's Office of Technical Assistance is in business to put the Commission's complaint-handling departments out of business.

OTA offers business, industry and labor an assortment of Do-It-Yourself programs designed to accomplish compliance with Title VII and to open up new job opportunities at every level through voluntary affirmative action.

OTA operates on the principle that most business leaders want to comply with the law, not only as a matter of avoiding the costly and time-consuming complaint route—but also as a matter of good will and conscience. This reservoir of good will is demonstrated by community equal employment opportunity councils—many of which were established before Title VII became law. OTA tells leaders of business and industry how such councils can be set up and furnishes guidelines.

There is a widely-held opinion that equal employment opportunity is good business. OTA has compiled information from those who practice it and presents this in a booklet designed to show that it is, indeed, good business.

OTA's "How-To" program underlines the need for active recruiting, job training, and liaison and cooperation with civil rights groups.

Another OTA program is designed for new and expanding plants. It aims at giving minority groups employment opportunities before hiring patterns have been set.

In situations where EEOC's conciliation officers go to work on active charges, OTA offers educational and technical support for affirmative action beyond the resolution of those specific charges.

OTA works with a climate of cooperation and seeks to extend the beneficial effects of such a climate. Through personal contacts, speeches and seminars with employer groups, at business and trade association meetings and conventions, OTA spreads the word: "Equal Employment Opportunity is Good Business." The final word, of course, must be spoken by business, industry and labor. Technical Assistance can only tell them "How."

It is not too much to suggest that the technical assistance side of the Commission's operation consists largely of persuading laggard companies and unions to adopt the practices of the most progressive and successful employers and labor unions. ■

GENERAL COUNSEL

INTERPRETING THE LAW

The General Counsel is probably the most talked-to office in EEOC. The five attorneys measure just about every question that comes before the Commission—from specific charges all the way to broad policy decisions—by the yardstick of Title VII.

An unusual amount of time in the General Counsel's shop has been called for on matters relating to the sex provisions of Title VII. What became law with very little legislative history has moved through the opening forays of bunny-girl frivolity into the serious realm of seniority, retirement, bona fide occupational qualification, and other issues. Guidelines for solution of conflicts between state protective laws for women and the sex provisions of Title VII is a current and future project undertaken by General Counsel.

In the course of dealing with these and other questions, General Counsel has prepared some 150 memoranda and written some 750 opinion letters. The office also has published a digest of legal interpretations and one supplement. Another supplement is in preparation.

General Counsel reviews all private suits filed under Title VII to determine whether to file briefs or intervene; reviews cases for submission to the Attorney General for possible civil action; drafts Commission guidelines (i.e. help-wanted ads) and proposals for guidelines (i.e. religious discrimination).

General Counsel also has a big hand in: legislative proposals; conciliation agreements; and Commission hearings on broad issues such as seniority. A longer-range project is the publication of a detailed interpretive analysis of Title VII. ■

SEGAL SMILES—EEOC's Liaison Director, Ben Segal, wouldn't let a turned ankle keep him from the swift completion of his appointed rounds. Pressed for a statement, Segal said: "It happened on the tennis court."

LIAISON

FEDERAL, STATE AND LOCAL

Equal Employment Opportunity doesn't exist in a vacuum. Other vital issues such as housing, education, public accommodations, voting rights—all interact upon the problems of fair employment. Liaison with agencies concerned with these areas is an important part of EEOC's effort.

And on the specific issue, EEOC isn't the only agency in the business of assuring fair employment practices. There are other Federal agencies whose jurisdiction sometimes overlaps that of EEOC, such as the OFCC which covers government contractors. There are 31 states and two cities to which the EEOC has agreed to defer action on discrimination complaints. There are conflicts between state and Federal law and the problems of resolving such conflicts.

The EEOC's Office of Liaison undertakes to keep lines of communication open between these numerous jurisdictions and agencies, hoping that left hands will be kept aware as much as possible of what right hands are doing.

Steps in this direction include a Memorandum of Understanding (between EEOC and state FEP agencies); administration of grants for research projects through private organizations; exchanges of ideas about fair employment problems through regional meetings and through direct contact with state and local FEP's.

The Memorandum of Understanding was drafted by EEOC and is under consideration by state and local FEP organizations. It outlines standard agreements on procedure in connection with employment discrimination complaints and deferral by EEOC to state agencies.

EEOC played a leading role at regional meeting of state FEP agencies at Providence, R. I., which included representatives from New England and Middle Atlantic States.

Eleven state and municipal FEP agencies are sharing in a $165,000 grant provided by EEOC to Wayne State University to research patterns of discrimination in employment. The EEOC Liaison Office is working out a two-year program for promotion of common Federal, state and local fair employment projects for which $900,000 has been requested from Congress for Fiscal 1967.

EEOC policy decisions, news developments, legal opinions, and other information are sent regularly to state and local organizations and EEOC receives information in turn from the state groups. ■

LIAISON

CONGRESS AND THE PUBLIC

Telling the story of Title VII and the Commission is a responsibility shared by all the Commissioners and staff.

It is the particular assignment of the Liaison Office when it comes to inter-agency and federal-state communications. It is the particular assignment of the Congressional Relations office of EEOC in terms of keeping 100 Senators and 435 Congressmen advised of programs and needs of the EEOC.

And as a matter of general public information, the story of Title VII and the EEOC is a particular responsibility of the Public Affairs office of EEOC.

The Congressional Relations office has handled more than 1500 written and phone requests from Members of Congress, their staffs and committee personnel. Contact has been maintained with the appropriate legislative and appropriations committees on matters relating to EEOC activities.

The Commission's supplemental request for funds has been approved in the amount of $500,000, making a total appropriation of $3,250,000 for 1965-66. Legislation which would widen the Commission's jurisdiction over employers and unions and provide enforcement powers beyond the present conciliation authority has passed the House. Similar legislation is under consideration in the Senate.

Working with Public Affairs, Congressional Relations has arranged for the appearance of Commissioners and radio and television programs of Senators and Congressmen and numerous articles about the EEOC activities have appeared in Congressional newsletters.

Public Affairs has issued 117 general press releases on EEOC actions, guidelines and statistics. Public Service spot announcements about the Commission were prepared and recorded by Public Affairs and distributed to all radio and television stations in the United States. Return advice from more than 10 per cent of these stations show that the television spots have been used at least 56,659 times and the radio spots at least 54,707 times.

A general Fact Pamphlet about Title VII and the Commission and other information about Commission activities was prepared and distributed by Public Affairs to the general public, trade associations and press, radio and television.

Three Newsletters prior to this issue have been written, published and distributed by Public Affairs. ■

RESEARCH

SEEKING ANSWERS FROM FACTS

When it comes to Government Forms To Be Filled Out, it might be said the EEOC Research Division is the Businessman's Best Friend.

Replacing Standard Forms 38, 40, 40A, 41 and EEO-10 is the new joint reporting form for employers which will serve EEOC, the Office of Federal Contract Compliance and Plans for Progress.

JUST A FEW of the thousands of EEO-1 Employer Reporting Forms which have come into Washington are tackled by Herbert Hammerman, chairman of the Joint Reporting Committee, and Betty Reynolds of the EEOC research division.

The name of the new form is "Standard Form 100 Equal Employment Opportunity Employer Information Report EEO-1," which is a mouthful but at least employers can now tell it all in four pages.

More than 35,000 employers have done so as of the deadline of April 30 and some stragglers are expected to bring the total up. The data submitted on EEO-1 (there, you see it wasn't hard to say, was it?) will be processed by the Bureau of the Census. This information will be used by EEOC in technical studies of employment practices in selected geographical areas and industries.

The Office of Research has also pulled together a study of testing procedures used in employment and is looking for a full-time expert to add to the staff to work in this field. Meanwhile, a consultant from the Department of Labor is on detail to EEOC one-day a week for preliminaries.

Other study projects the Office of Research is undertaking include: a profile of the Mexican-American worker; dynamics of equal employment opportunity and the economic status of the Negro worker. ■

ADMINISTRATION

KEEPING HOUSE FOR EEOC

If there's a beef about the way the elevators are working at EEOC headquarters in Washington—it goes to the Office of Administration.

And when the Commission wants to beef up the budget request to take care of the flood of business—that's the business of the Office of Administration, too.

Administration takes on its big jobs and little jobs with plegmatic calm. If you want a typewriter or a typist, a desk or a directive, office space in Atlanta or an order for printing—just call Administration. They'll manage it.

During the first year of EEOC, here are some of the things that the Office of Administration has managed:

More than 7,500 employment applications were evaluated. By early May 157 employees were in headquarters and 17 were assigned to new field offices in Atlanta, Chicago and Dallas.

Off and on since last July, 75 investigators have been borrowed from 26 state and federal agencies until the supplemental appropriation enables EEOC to bring its own staff of investigators up to full strength.

The Fiscal 1967 budget request for $5,870,000 is now under Congressional review. Office of Administration put together the nuts and bolts of it to present to Congress.

In the months ahead, opening and staffing the remaining field offices is the biggest assignment of this office. ■

REGIONAL OFFICES

THE COMMISSION MOVES TO THE FIELD

Regional offices are operational in Atlanta, Dallas and Chicago. Recruitment for additional offices is underway. Additional regional offices will be located in Los Angeles, San Antonio, New Orleans and Kansas City. Target date for these offices is June 30.

These offices will employ 149 persons when fully staffed. At present 10 professionals are on detail from other agencies to investigate complaints now before EEOC.

A coordinated field program has been approved by the Commission. This program is now in effect where offices have been activated. It will continue under study and review for possible improvement.

Discrimination complaints, except in cases of special significance, will be investigated and conciliated by field staff under supervision of regional and area directors. Each field director will represent the Commission in the states under his jurisdiction and will report to the Deputy Executive Director in Washington.

In early April, staffs of the Dallas and Atlanta offices underwent one week of training. The program emphasized the Commission's philosophy and objectives in respect to Title VII; investigation and conciliation techniques; report requirements and special problems. These programs will be continued and revised as new problems occur. ■

MARGARETTA BELL, EEOC's Executive Secretary, includes among her responsibilities assignment of thousands of pieces of mail for action and the operation of the Speaker's Bureau. Since last July, Commissioners and Senior Staff have accepted 482 invitations to tell of the work and objectives of EEOC in 148 major cities in 42 states.

HOW TO FILE A COMPLAINT

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission was established by Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The Commission's responsibility is to assure that all in the American labor pool will be considered for hiring, firing and promotion on the basis of their ability and qualifications, without regard to race, color, religion, sex or national origin.

If a person believes that he or she has been discriminated against by an employer, labor organization, employment agency or joint labor-management program, that person may file a complaint with the Commission.

Persons believing a pattern of practice of discrimination exists in their areas may call such pattern to the attention of the Commission. After investigation, the Commission will consider filing a Commissioner's Complaint.

Instructions and complaint forms are available at the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, 1800 G Street, N.W., Washington, D. C. 20506.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT, JR.

On May 11, Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr. handed his resignation as chairman of the Equal Employmen Opportunity Commission to President Johnson and announced the next day as a candidate for the Democratic nomination for governor of New York. Stepping down from the helm after guiding the Commission in its first 10 months, Mr. Roosevelt expressed his impressions in the following statement:

I am proud of the progress that has been made by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission in its first year.

We have helped to bring about new employment attitudes and practices in many areas throughout the South – in retail and department stores and taxicab companies, in famous New Orleans restaurants and in public service establishments – and in major industry after industry in all sections of the U. S.

The Newport News Shipbuilding Company settlement is probably the most comprehensive and far-reaching solution ever achieved in a job discrimination case. Thousands of Negro employees were brought up to the starting line – for promotion and for pay – to remedy past discrimination in the country's largest shipyard.

In Bogalusa, a strife-torn, Klan-ridden community, the principle of horizontal merging of segregated lines of promotion was established by the Commission, the Crown-Zellerbach Paper Company and the International Paperworkers and Papermakers Union. We sat down for three hours at a table and hammered it out. We not only settled a stubborn seniority problem; we improved the race relations climate in the community.

Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 did not create new responsibilities for the major employers in the nation, except, perhaps, in respect to sex discrimination. These employers have been subject to fair employment practice laws for years in many states. If they were Government contractors they were committed to avoid discrimination and, indeed, to engage in affirmative action to provide equal opportunity in employment.

But Title VII WAS the first Congressional declaration in the employment field. It followed a long and dramatic Civil Rights struggle that overcame fire hoses, police dogs and an 83-day filibuster. Thus it assumed an importance beyond the letter of its modest law.

Those who designed the Commission budget estimated that we would receive 2000 complaints in our first year. We stand today six weeks away from our first year in business and already the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission has been deluged with more than 7000 complaints.

This is striking testimony to the confidence minority persons have in this Commission. Title VII is an article of faith throughout the land, a bright light toward which the disadvantaged in every walk of our life have turned.

The Commission has conciliated 70 charges brought against 28 respondents and 30 more are nearing solution. In most of the 25 charges against eight respondents where we must say that our efforts were "unsuccessful" – because every count was not resolved or signed agreement was not accomplished – correction of many of the issues was nevertheless achieved.

In all 14 court cases which have been filed by charging parties to protect their rights to file, none has been brought to trial as we continue conciliation efforts.

For all sorts of reasons major segments of business, industry and labor have shown they are anxious to comply with the new law and the national policy it propounds – a fair chance for all at a job or a promotion, regardless of race, color, religion, sex or national origin. Business and labor are concerned about public image, but more than that, they are responding to the law because it is right and because there is in this country a basic reservoir of good will based upon that rightness. For those segments which persist in discriminating, we have asked for new laws with more powers. Happily, the House has already passed the Hawkins bill which I advocate and the President has asked the Senate to follow suit.

Discrimination in employment practices, of course, has not been wiped out by the Commission and Title VII. In many places discrimination is still deeply rooted in habit and custom. But the gates to opportunity have been opened by this new law and the momentum of positive accomplishment will keep Americans moving through these gates more and more and more as this Commission and this Administration continue to pursue their convictions with dedication and resolve. ■

First Year—And Ahead to the Future

The concept of affirmative action, which seeks through Title VII to urge employers, unions, and employment agencies to go beyond the letter of the law and grasp its spirit, is basic to my philosophy of equal employment opportunity.

If we are to build on the experience and achievements of government—both state and federal; management and labor as well as that of civil rights and civic leaders, we must exercise care not to retread steps that were taken a decade ago, or even last year. This means to me that the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission must not only take remedial action as evidenced by our complaint adjustments, but must "look ahead" if the word "progress" is to have meaning in the 1960s.

Faced with modern technological requirements, manpower skills of minority groups must be drastically upgraded. This means training and education, much of it on-the-job, to fill the present need for manpower.

Once we have reversed the spiral of futility of low income, poor health, low educational attainment and consequently low employability—we will then have attained the opportunity to be equal.

As we look into the future and at the expanding goals of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, our affirmative action programs will have opened the doors for all qualified citizens to participate in the mainstream of American economic life. It is at this point that the combined efforts of government, business and labor to remove barriers to employment opportunities; of parents and civic groups to lift aspirational levels; and of educators and civil rights leaders to provide basic skills and stimulation, will begin to harvest the real fruits of equal opportunity. ■

RICHARD A. GRAHAM

The EEOC through key cases and through cooperative efforts with business and labor groups has made clear what is expected under Title VII and how to do it.

In its first year the Commission received four times the number of charges of discrimination that had been predicted—some 8,000 in all. It has set up field offices and a headquarters staff to handle them.

Often case work has been the trigger for affirmative action programs—the extra efforts needed to overcome the traditional discrimination that prevents true equality of job opportunity.

The Commission has brought together the nation's leading research authorities on racial discrimination for guidance. Top business and labor leaders have met with the Commission to work out revisions to bargaining agreements that have held captive the victims of past discrimination. The Justice Department has been requested to bring suit in the few cases where employees have resisted compliance and private suits have been brought where the Commission has been unable to conclude conciliation.

The Commission is now receiving reports on the work forces of all employees covered by the Act—reports that businessmen say are as important to management in assessing job equality performance as inspection reports are in controlling quality.

Though few jobs can be performed only by a man or only by a woman, hundreds of thousands of jobs are still classified by sex. Twenty per cent of Commission cases charge sex discrimination and employers and unions alike have generally accepted the idea that in a society where most women will work outside the home, equality of work opportunity is fair and is now required. ■

AILEEN C. HERNANDEZ

New techniques must be devised if "equal opportunity" is to be more than a pious pronouncement to America's disadvantaged. Too many years of too many rejections have made the victims of discrimination reluctant to apply and reluctant to complain. Disillusionment, fear, cultural patterns may limit the utilization of government agencies by those most in need of assistance. For example, few Mexican Americans, few women, few Jews, few American Indians have brought formal complaints before this Commission or any local Commission. Yet we know that individuals from all these groups have suffered discrimination. And actually, even though more Negroes have brought complaints, relatively few have, in proportion to the problem.

This Commission has a unique opportunity to put President Johnson's concept of "creative federalism" to the test:

1. We can demonstrate that by developing a meaningful, working relationship with state and local FEP agencies, together we can set guidelines, raise standards, and move imaginatively as partners to fulfill our mutual responsibility to end employment discrimination.

2. We can devise a comprehensive rather than a piecemeal attack on job bias—incorporating complaint processing, but going beyond to include affirmative actions to overcome the effects of past barriers.

3. We can plan ahead rather than wait passively to react to the results of discrimination—a Watt's explosion. ■

SAMUEL D. JACKSON

It has become more and more clear since the implementation of the various provisions of the 1964 Civil Rights Act that employment is the vital factor in the struggle for equal opportunity.

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission is acutely conscious of its responsibility and role in the effort to overcome bias based on race, color, religion, sex or national origin.

Since July 2, 1965, Commission members and staff have tackled a variety of problems springing from unlawful practices. Many of these have been long-standing, deep-seated problems—cemented in tradition and surrounded by a wilderness of stubborn attitudes. Hiring, promotion, referral, testing, segregated facilities, and the extreme complexity of seniority systems are typical problems.

I feel that we have come far this first year toward long-sought goals, accomplishing some widely-known successes and others which also have deep significance although they may be less newsworthy. In the handling of more than 7000 discrimination charges, we have accomplished many gains for disadvantaged citizens. We must undertake more in the way of industry and community-wide programs to eliminate discrimination patterns which continue to throttle the Negro's full participation in the job market.

Positive compliance—incorporating bold, imaginative programs to implement affirmative action—will contribute much to closing the widening gap between the earnings of white and non-white Americans. The responsibility to make it possible for minority citizens to enjoy the full bounty of America is one we on the Commission hope every other American will share with us. ■

ment opportunity a fact at this major shipbuilding firm."

Newport News Shipbuilding and Drydock Company builds nuclear submarines, aircraft carriers and other ships for the United States Government. Its contracts with the Government run into billions of dollars. The company employs about 19,000 persons, about 5,000 of whom are Negroes. Its last report to the Government showed that only 32 out of 1997 persons employed in supervisory positions were Negroes. It showed that only 6 out of 506 apprentices enrolled were Negroes.

On March 16, Newport News came to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and requested assistance in conciliating the charges against it. Conciliation sessions began on March 22. On March 25, Secretary of Labor W. Willard Wirtz directed all Federal agencies not to award contracts to Newport News until the agencies and the Department of Labor were satisfied that the company was in compliance with the Executive Order requiring equal employment opportunity.

Principal architects of the agreement were Alfred W. Blumrosen, EEOC conciliation chief, and Kenneth Holbert, EEOC conciliator.

Participating in the sessions for the Departments of Defense and Navy were: Jerry Clark, Alan Reeves and Sam Schwartz.

Some of the charging parties have filed a civil suit under Title VII against Newport News through the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund.

Other principal terms of the agreement include:

- immediate promotion of three Negroes who had filed charges to supervisory positions;
- rapid conciliation of the complaints of the other 38 charging parties;
- further opening of all job classifications to all employees without discrimination;
- complete elimination of segregated facilities;
- revision of promotion policies and practices to improve opportunities for qualified Negroes to and within supervisory levels;
- improvement of transfer procedure to other departments for Negroes;
- re-evaluation of Negro employee skills, institution of training programs to develop and improve Negro skills, promotion and pay adjustment on the basis of such evaluation and/or training;
- giving qualified Negroes equal opportunity to apprenticeship programs and actively recruiting for such programs in Negro schools.

The company also agreed to:

Post a non-discrimination policy statement, signed by the president, throughout the Yard and attach it to the paycheck of each full time employee within 30 days of the agreement signing;

Assemble all supervisory employees to read the policy statement to advise them of the terms of the agreement and to instruct them to advise employees in group meetings that a violation of such policy shall result in disciplinary action—including discharge where appropriate;

Make a detailed report to the Commission of actions taken to comply with the terms of the agreement 90 days after signing and each quarter for two years thereafter. ■

WALKER

Phillip Walker, NAACP attorney who represents the charging parties in the Newport News case said:

"This is a long fought for solution. We are grateful to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission for its vigorous and successful handling of our cases."

HOLDEN

Donald A. Holden, president of the company, said:

"We are proud of our part in working out this agreement. It represents, in our view, an effective and responsible effort by the company and the Commission to further achieve genuine equality of opportunity for Negroes in our yard."

BELTON

Robert Belton, Assistant Counsel NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund, Inc., said:

"Exemplary—is our designation of the conciliation agreement between the Newport News Shipbuilding Company and the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

"Agreement to promote the Rev. J. C. Fauntleroy, president of the local NAACP chapter, and other complainants, shows the good intentions of the Newport News Shipbuilding Company.

"The firms's additional pledge to end discriminatory hiring and future promotion practices; and, its willingness to end segregated facilities in its plant, shows intention to comply with the spirit as well as the letter of the law . . ." ■

Industry Expert Asks: Do Tests Tell All?

Do psychological tests used in employee selection and upgrading discriminate unfairly against the culturally-deprived?

Dr. Philip Ash of Inland Steel makes some interesting observations on this question in a recent Chicago Merit Employment Committee Newsletter. Dr. Ash is research assistant to Inland's vice president for industrial and public relations. Excerpts of his article follow:

For whatever reason, Negro job applicants as a group consistently score significantly below white job applicants on most of the standardized paper and pencil tests used in selection. For example:

- In the administration of a junior-management civil-service examination to 5,000 white residents of an eastern state, forty per cent earned a qualifying score and were placed on the eligible list. But of 300 identifiable Negro applicants also taking the test, only three per cent made the eligible list;
- Of 100 whites and 100 Negroes taking the General Aptitude Test Battery which is widely used in state employment service offices, the whites made statistically significant better scores on all but one of the twelve tests in the battery even though the two groups were roughly comparable in age, educational attainment, and other personal characteristics;
- A large manufacturer of electronics equipment found that Negro college seniors scored consistently lower than white college seniors on general intelligence tests which the firm used to help select candidates for entry-level management jobs.

But for merit employers, differences in test scores are of value only to the extent that they predict differences in job performance. The central question is: Will an applicant with a low test score perform his job less satisfactorily than one with a significantly higher score? Or is it possible the low scorer can perform his work as competently as the candidate with the higher score?

Unfortunately, at the present time, only a handful of studies have addressed themselves to this key issue. But already the scattering of studies has turned up some interesting results:

- An electronics manufacturer who hired Negroes as programmers, despite their test scores, found they performed satisfactorily even though they did not score as well as the white applicants on the firm's programmer aptitude tests;
- A radio TV Appliance retailer who hired and then trained a group of Negroes deemed "unemployable" by standard aptitude and sales ability tests found that in fourteen out of the sixteen test cases the Negroes did better than had been predicted by the sales aptitude tests. Moreover, ten of the Negroes turned in actual job performances which were better than the expected performance level of all new employees;
- A study of Negro college students from culturally deprived environments revealed they did much better in college than would have been expected from their college entrance test scores;

- Of a group of sixty-six Negro students who were graduated with honors from a North Carolina college, fifty-eight would not even have been admitted to the school had the usual norms of college entrance tests been applied to them;
- A study of Negro and white highway toll collectors showed that the Negroes achieved supervisory performance ratings which were identical to those of the whites even though they had scored significantly lower on a mental-ability test used for selection.

Studies such as these—and others now underway—may well have profound implications for merit employers. True—a test may serve as an accurate predictor of job performance for an applicant who was born into and educated in the predominant, white, highly verbal culture in the United States. At the same time, it is becoming increasingly clear that these tests may not be as accurate an indicator of possible job success for an applicant who has not shared—or shared only partially—in this culture.

What is needed is more information about the relationship between test performance and cultural deprivation on the one hand and job performance on the other. This relationship must be studied both for non-white and white job applicants, and only those psychological tests used which validly predict job performance for both groups.

Right here allow me to caution against setting cutoff test scores based only on the performance of present employees. Unless this employee group includes a fair representation of minority-group workers—and unless it can be demonstrated that there is a clear relationship between test performance and job performance for these employees—there is no assurance that the test will not screen out minority-group workers in some way not truly related to their possible job performance.

The Ford Foundation currently is supporting an extensive research program to study the relationship between test performance and race both for white and non-white applicants. Meanwhile, until more of the facts are in, personnel managers may well wish to use their tests with renewed discretion, realizing that the possibility exists that applicants who have not shared in the dominant, white, middle-class verbal culture may give a significantly false impression of their real job potential. ■

EEOC ADOPTS TESTING GUIDELINES

The Commission has adopted six testing guidelines designed to help employers establish objective standards for selection, screening and promotion of workers.

These recommendations were offered in a paper on testing prepared by Dr. Phyllis Wallace, Beverly Kissinger and Betty Reynolds of EEOC's Research Division. The guidelines are:

1. Job descriptions should be examined and their critical requirements established before tests are selected for screening applicants.

2. Tests used should be those developed by reputable psychologists. Such tests should be administered by professionally qualified personnel who have had training in occupational testing in an industrial setting.

3. Rigidly inflexible minimum scores should be re-examined in light of the considerable research underway on differential selection.

4. Test scores must be considered as only one source of information and must be combined with other available information on performance, such as motivation, leadership, organizational experience, self-sufficiency and dependability.

5. Tests should be validated within the setting where they will be used. Validation should be for as many separate groups as possible in preference to one large, heterogeneous group.

6. It may be advisable for employers who deal with applicants from culturally-deprived backgrounds to offer re-tests to candidates who are unsuccessful on their first test, since these people are less familiar with the testing situation and may not do as well as they are able. ■

MRS. HERNANDEZ

Scholar, lecturer, union organizer, civil rights crusader, political scientist, traveler, and journalist is the versatile Mrs. Aileen C. Hernandez, Commissioner of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

Born in New York City, raised in Brooklyn, N. Y., where she was a salutatorian of Bay Ridge High School, Mrs. Hernandez received her AB degree magna cum laude from Howard University.

In addition to being elected to the honor society at Howard, Mrs. Hernandez edited the college newspaper.

Upon graduation from Howard, Commissioner Hernandez travelled to Norway with the International Student Exchange program and spent the summer of 1947 in graduate study of comparative government. She returned to Howard as a research assistant in the Department of Government.

Her next job was with the International Ladies Garment Workers Union, where she first served as a Pacific Coast organizer and later worked as assistant educational director during her 11 years with the union.

While with ILGWU, Commissioner Hernandez took graduate work at UCLA and USC and received her master's degree in government at Los Angeles State College.

From union work, she was appointed by Gov. Edmund G. Brown as assistant chief of the California Fair Employment Practices Commission.

President Johnson appointed Mrs. Hernandez as Commissioner of the EEOC for a full five-year term in 1965.

Mrs. Hernandez toured six Latin American countries in 1960 as a labor specialist lecturing for the U. S. State Department. She spoke in Venezuela, Colombia, Chile, Peru, Argentina and Uruguay on conditions in American trade unions, the position of minority groups in the United States and the status of women.

Mrs. Hernandez believes the only successful approach to fair employment must be through a concerted effort in many fields. She feels, for example, that housing and education problems have a significant relationship to the problems of job opportunity.

Commissioner Hernandez has a busy speaking schedule. Since her July, 1965 duties began, she has criss-crossed the nation several times speaking to audiences about the function and programs of the EEOC. ■

Conciliator Assigned To North Carolina

EEOC has assigned a conciliation officer full time to Raleigh, North Carolina, to handle employment discrimination cases in that state.

The officer, Andrew Muse, began in April with 40 individual charges against nine different employers. These are the first cases in which the Commission found reasonable cause following an intensive investigation effort begun in North Carolina early this year. The Commission will forward additional cases to Muse for conciliation. Reasonable cause has been found in more than 30 percent of the North Carolina cases.

Muse, prior to joining the Commission staff, practiced law in Danville, Va. ■

Social Science Research Conference Sets Priorities

As a part of its program of stimulating and encouraging greater interest within the social science research community in the problems of discrimination in employment, the Office of Research convened a conference on February 2, 1966.

Thirteen eminent social scientists were asked to specify the priorities in research.

Recommendations for research were in five areas: (1) the Negro's perception of himself as it relates to economic mobility; (2) how the minority worker fits into the normal functioning of the labor market; (3) exploration of the relationship between hiring criteria (especially tests) and job requirements; (4) what shapes employers attitudes toward equal employment opportunity; and (5) evaluation of present manpower development programs.

Copies of the recommendations were sent to specialists on manpower problems in a number of government agencies. The response to the Commission's role as "an idea broker" has been enthusiastic.

In fact, several of the members of the ad hoc panel urged that the Commission assume the responsibility as a clearinghouse on equal employment matters.

It is hoped that government research operations will support some of the suggested research areas. The recommendations were also made available to interested university researchers.

The conference served to help mobilize the support of the research community and to establish close, collaborative communication with this important group.

It demonstrated that the Commission could, with limited resources, attempt to "direct and shape research in equal employment opportunity in the United States." ■

COFFEE, TEA— OR MEN?

Should positions as cabin attendants on the airlines be limited to young women?

Management of the nation's largest airlines, at a hearing before the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission said: "Yes!"

Officials of unions representing more than 17,000 cabin attendants on the major airlines argued that hiring of young women to the exclusion of males is a violation of sex discrimination provisions of Title VII.

The hearing developed out of 11 cases that have been filed with the Commission charging that certain airlines had violated Title VII by requiring stewardesses to resign when they married or be grounded after they reached a certain age.

The airlines argued that they had spent millions training young women as cabin attendants and that women not only attracted passengers but served them efficiently and in a pleasing manner.

The unions argued that there are no duites of a flight attendant that a man can't perform as well as a woman. The unions also argued that the airlines are discriminating by forcing women to resign when they get married, or grounding them when they reach a certain age—without applying the same requirements to men.

The Commission has left the record open for additional statements and will rule later on the question: "Is being a young woman a bona fide occupational qualification for the job of airline cabin attendant?"

✳ NEWS BRIEF

MRS. MARY ELLEN JAMES has been named administrative assistant to EEOC's Atlanta Region Director Donald L. Hollowell. Mrs. James, for many years secretary to Benjamin E. Mays, president of Morehouse College, became the first Negro to be employed as a white collar worker in the Atlanta post office in 1962.

New Policy Stated on Help-Wanted

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission has revised its policy guidelines dealing with classified advertising.

The Commission's new policy on help-wanted ads, male and female, means:

1. That a disclaimer previously requested on help-wanted classified pages is no longer requested.

2. Ads for help may be placed in either column – male or female – and the advertiser is not requested to state specifically that both sexes may apply. However, if he asks for either sex specifically in his ad, the advertiser must be prepared to justify his preference as a bona fide occupational qualification.

The new policy, as it appears in the Federal Register, reads:

> "Help wanted advertising may not indicate a preference based on sex unless a bona fide occupational qualification makes it lawful to specify male or female.
> "Advertisers covered by the Civil Rights Act of 1964 may place advertisements for jobs open to both sexes in columns classified by publishers under 'Male' or 'Female' headings to indicate that some occupations are considered more attractive to persons of one sex than the other. In such cases, the Commission will consider only the advertising of the covered employer and not headings used by publishers." ■

Self-Enforcement In Missouri

A leading U. S. company with headquarters in Missouri has adopted a policy under which any discrimination in employment because of race, color, religion, sex, or national origin will be treated "as a firing offense." The company directive, distributed to its offices and branches throughout the U. S., was issued after three charges were filed with the Missouri Commission on Human Rights. The Commission's executive director, Peter C. Robinson, said: "Although there appeared to be no discrimination in these cases, there did appear to be some misunderstanding on the part of some company personnel concerning the terms of the Fair Employment Practices Act and the policy of the company on non-discrimination. This was the reason for the directive and this is the kind of self-enforcement by businessmen that we should like to see spread throughout the entire state of Missouri." ■

House Votes Cease & Desist

HR-10065, introduced by Rep. Augustus Hawkins (Dem. Calif.), has passed the House by a vote of 299 to 94. It provides cease and desist powers for EEOC and drops the number of employees or members of covered employers or unions to eight. The Senate is considering similar legislation.

EEOC ENDS FIRST YEAR

Geared to handle a predicted 2,000 complaints the first year, the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission was swamped by more than 8,600 charges claiming job discrimination in its first 12 months of operation.

On July 2, 1966, the Commission's coverage of employers extends to employers hiring 75 employees or more. The first year coverage included employers hiring 100 employees or more. The number of employers covered will increase from 58,000 to 73,000.

Reporting on the Commission's first birthday, July 2, 1966, Dr, Luther Holcomb, acting chairman, said:

"Those who prepared the Commission budget estimated that we would receive 2,000 complaints during our first year. As of June 30, the Commission has received 8,672.

The overwhelming response from minorities to the new law, and the vigorous processing of the charges filed, have helped to bring about new employment attitudes and practices in many areas of this nation.

"Our files disclose that new employment opportunities have unfolded in all areas of this nation's economy.

"The settlement in the Newport News Shipbuilding and Dry Dock case, affecting more than 5,000 Negro employees, stands as a comprehensive and far-reaching settlement, a milestone in the conciliation of a job discrimination case. Many other successful conciliations -- in paper mills and steel plants, in restaurants and banks -- have also charted new courses. Most encouraging has been the voluntary cooperation of businessmen and union leaders in going beyond the letter of the law to fulfill its spirit.

Of the 8,672 complaints received, 2,646 were found not to come under the jurisdiction of the Commission. Of the remaining 6,026, investigations have been completed on 1,622 complaints and 2,120 are in the process of investigation. The remaining 2,248 have been deferred to states with FEP laws, or have been returned to the complainant for additional information.

A total of 49.9 per cent (3,008) of the 6,026 complainants allege discrimination against them because they are Negroes.

Sex as a basis of discrimination is charged in 33.7 per cent, 2031, of the cases. This is a large jump from the figure of approximately 20 per cent which held constant for the first half of the year.

Only 2.1 per cent (127) of the cases cite national origin. Of these, 70 were Mexican-American complaints.

As to the nature of the discrimination charged, 22.9 per cent (1,377) of the cases deal with hiring, and 20.6 per cent (239) deal with promotions. Seniority claimed 15.8 per cent (950), benefits 13.4 per cent (806) and wage differential 11.1 per cent (668).

The year end figures show that 86.3 per cent (5,200) of the charges were filed against employers, 22.1 per cent (1,329) against unions, 1.8 per cent (101) against state and private employment agencies, and .03 per cent (2) against joint labor-management apprenticeship programs. (In some of the cases, both union and employer are jointly charged, which accounts for a total of more than 100 per cent.)

The Commission has received at least one discrimination complaint from all 50 states and the District of Columbia.

The largest number of charges from a single state were received from North Carolina (852), with Alabama (610) in second place. New Jersey (536), Kansas (534) and Tennessee (423) follow in that order. (It should be noted, however, that 475 charges were filed at one time against a single respondent in Kansas, so that it would be imprudent to equate number of charges with the degree of discrimination existing in a state.)

A total of 41.8 per cent of the complaints (2,519) were received from 12 southern states, namely, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Tennessee, Alabama, Louisiana, Kentucky. The 13 mid western states totaled 30.3 per cent (1,828) of the complaints, while the New England and middle Atlantic states comprised 17.9 per cent (1,076). From the southwest came 5.1 per cent (310) of the complaints, and from the west, 4.8 per cent (289).

The Commission has referred 10 cases where it failed to achieve a just settlement by conciliation to the Attorney General. Under Section 707 of Title VII, the Attorney General may bring suit to end a pattern or practice of discrimination.

There have also been 37 Commissioner complaints filed against employers, employment agencies and labor organizations.

The Commission has recommended that 692 charges involving 209 respondents (employers and/or unions) move into conciliation. Of these 97 have been successfully conciliated; 60 charges involving 19 respondents have been unsuccessful. Pending and in the process of conciliation are an additional 515 charges involving 144 respondents.

Those bare statistics on conciliation only tell part of the story, however, since almost every successful conciliation -- desegregating facilities or opening up promotions for women, Negroes or Mexican-Americans -- affects hundreds or even thousands of workers, not just those who formally complained. And in many instances, major accomplishments have been made in conciliation efforts which are not listed successful because one or two of perhaps a dozen issues have not been settled.

The Commission is also able to look back on other indirect but salutary developments in its first year. Passage of Title VII was undoubtedly a factor in the passage of a fair employment practice law in Kentucky, and in the budget increases secured by FEP commissions in five states with existing laws.

And the EEOC's Office of Technical Assistance has offered business, industry and labor an assortment of programs designed to accomplish compliance with Title VII and to open up new job opportunities at every level through voluntary affirmative action. For example, a manpower specialist on loan from the Department of Labor, is available to help companies secure Federal funds for training programs to qualify minority workers for available jobs.

The Commission has issued a number of guidelines interpreting Title VII, and has issued two digests of legal opinions.

CRISIS IN THE CITIES AND EQUAL EMPLOYMENT

It is not often that I am taken aback by a newspaper account of progress in the civil rights area, but a recent story in the New York Times had just that reverse effect on me. The story disclosed, a little triumphantly, I felt, the fact that the Acting Police Commissioner of Baltimore had last month directed his men to address all citizens as "Mr. or Mrs." and to "avoid the use of 'wop, nigger, boy or girl'". Any policeman who would not follow his order, he said, should resign immediately.

I was struck by this bit of news because I felt it was characteristic of so much that is wrong in urban America. Here we are in the summer of 1966, mindful of the high unemployment level and the equally high level of bitterness pervading the ghettoes of some 30 to 40 big cities, wondering which city will next be shattered by an explosion of pent-up hate, fear, resentment and despair. Baltimore, with its non-white population of 43% and a Negro unemployment rate more than double that of the white work force, is one of these cities.

Yet, two years after the 1964 Harlem riots set off a series of similar explosions in seven other cities, and less than one year after the first riot in the Watts Area of Los Angeles, the police force of Baltimore had to be ordered to treat Negro and Italian citizens with respect.

I believe this tells us more than the well-meaning Acting Police Commissioner intended for us to infer. It tells us in unmistakable terms how the police of so many cities are accustomed to deal with members of minority groups. It tells us how late -- how very late-- comes the recognition that it must be corrected. It is symbolic of the denial of dignity which the Negro and other minorities have suffered at the hands of the white establishment. And, it is symbolic of the slowness of today's cities to understand and move decisively against the ills which, taken together, constitute what we call "The Crisis in the Cities."

It is probably because of this chronic refusal to anticipate a developing crisis and then to act to avert it, that our major metropolitan areas are being shaken by problems which were being predicted and might have been headed off two decades ago.

As we look back, we can see that four inexorable developments which were becoming visible in the years immediately after World War II have created our present situation:

First: Rural Americans were moving to the cities at an increasing rate. A century ago, our country was one-fifth urban; by 1920, it had become half rural, half urban; and today, two-thirds of us live in the cities. By the year 2000, however, 85% of our population will be concentrated in metropolitan areas which by that time will have grown over into super-metropolises. Visualize the problems of interlapping jurisdictions that are certain to plague a single population mass that extends from Boston to Baltimore, for instance.

Secondly, the postwar baby boom was certainly going to intensify the cities' problems as these youngsters deluged inadequate school systems and flooded the job market.

Thirdly, it was clear to all who cared to see two decades ago that the segregation and job discrimination which met the Southern Negroes on their arrival in the big cities were certain to create a Frankenstein-monster which would haunt the nation forever. By foreclosing the Negro from all but the most menial jobs and by sentencing him and his children to live out their lives in the decaying center of each city, society prevented him from following the course which all white immigrants to the city had taken. It barred him from moving up the economic ladder and out of the congestion of the slum. Thus, we have today the problem of the growing ghetto.

The fourth development is that of the flight to the suburbs of the white middle-class families, thus removing from the hard-pressed city its major source of much-needed community leadership and tax revenue. As the people with the dollars ran off to the suburbs, business followed the dollar -- hence the trend of business and industry moving to the outlying suburban areas, industrial parks, etc. -- with the result that the preponderance of jobs will be located outside the city.

Who, then, remains in the city? Among the whites living in the cities, the percentage of aged, poor and handicapped is very high. The dominant group in most of the metropolitan areas is coming to be the Negro, of whom 60% are under 21.

Between 1940 and 1965, 3.3 million Negroes fled the South in search of a better life. (Actually, several times this number of whites left rural areas to find jobs in the cities during this period, but because no discrimination impeded their progress, they and their children are among those who today are moving into the suburbs.)

So rapid was the Negro migration from the South that today 75% of the national Negro population is in cities, where they are still awaiting the promise that America was supposed to hold out to them. Today, they nurse despair and bitterness in crowded, dilapidated, rat-infested housing units for which slumlords can extract from them, on the average, $15 more a month than he could have from white families. In 1960, 44% of all Negro dwellings, nationwide, were substandard; it is not unusual to find units in which six to ten sleep in a room. It need hardly be pointed out that the child who emerges from this cauldron the next morning is scarcely the world's most likely to succeed in school.

In 18 cities of the nation there are Negro populations of 100,000 or more. Washington, D. C. is the only major city to have a Negro majority; but if present population trends continue, it will be joined within the next 15 or 20 years by five other cities which will be predominantly Negro - Baltimore, Cleveland, Detroit, New Orleans and Philadelphia.

By the year 2000, again if present population trends continue, nearly every major city in the United States will have a Negro majority. What this may mean in terms of political power is unmistakable:

Negroes will be able to elect city administrations and Congressmen of their own choosing. They will gain control of the party machinery in the major cities and will wield great power within the national parties and within the councils of whatever administration occupies the White House.

Now there is nothing alarming in such change in itself -- any more than there was reason for alarm when power in some of the great cities passed to the Irish. What must concern us are the attitudes, being forged in today's ghetto, which will motivate tomorrow's leaders.

Throughout my lifetime I have believed in and strived for a truly integrated society. That is my conviction today. However much I may understand the factors which have led to a growth of Anti-white feeling among Negroes; however much I may recognize the reasons for their rejection of the white man's gradualism or worse, his indifference -- I am still convinced that replacing white racism with black racism would be a disaster. Instead of working unitedly toward common goals, we shall be divided into two warring camps -- one inside the city, the other on the outskirts. I cannot conceive of a more destructive way to organize a new society.

Yet, this is certain to be the outcome if we fail to take decisive measures against the hate-producing life of the Negro ghetto, where generations of youngsters grow up with a bitter resentment and fear of "whitey." In their black neighborhoods and their black schools, their only encounter with "whitey" is when he appears in the form of the oppressor -- the white policeman, the white landlord, the white interviewer, the white boss.

In discussing the crisis of the cities, therefore, we are forced to dwell on the tragic condition of our minority group citizens because the solution to the cities' problems lies in how competently and forcefully we set about righting the wrongs which have been perpetrated against these citizens -- and I am referring to Spanish-surnamed Americans no less than Negroes, because although their number is fewer, the crimes against them are as persistent and as numerous.

Former EEOC Chairman Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., recently described the Spanish-Americans as "the most neglected, the least sponsored, the most orphaned major minority group in the United States."

Every statistic on their condition bears this out:

San Antonio and Denver, each with large Spanish-surnamed populations, exemplify the misery in which these citizens - many of whose ancestors came here two hundred years ago - continue to live.

Half the population of San Antonio is Spanish-speaking. Some 28.4% - more than one in four - of the city's residents live on less than $3,000 a year. Compare this with a figure of 10.6% for Chicago or 13.4% for New York, both of which have sizeable Negro and Puerto Rican segments.

San Antonio has the highest number of functional illiterates in the United States - 107,000 - which is hardly surprising since the average Mexican-American child will not go beyond the fourth grade. San Antonio also has the dubious distinction of having one of the worst slums in the country. Called "Villa Coronado", it boasts of two-room hovels in which as many as 20 immigrants are housed.

Denver's population of Spanish-surnamed citizens suffers the same discrimination, although some of these families are descendents of men who served in Colorado's territorial legislature and helped in the formation of Colorado's statehood. Today, their unemployment rate is almost 10%, and fully 42% live in substandard dwellings. Only one-fourth of the Spanish-surnamed youngsters of Denver complete high school, and one-fifth go no further than the fourth grade. Spanish-sounding names have been enough to exclude them from virtually all employment except farming, while they have been barred from such public accommodations as restaurants, theaters, and barber shops. Needless to say, enforced poverty has resulted in their having a disproportionate share of the juvenile delinquency, tuberculosis and public welfare dependency.

Whether the victims are Spanish-surnamed or Negro, this type of decay in the cities results in what President Johnson described as " ...the tragic waste, and indeed, the chaos that threatens where children are born into the stifling air of overcrowded rooms, destined for a poor diet, inadequate schools, streets of fear and sordid temptations, joblessness and the gray anxiety of the ill-prepared."

Let us take stock of these ills in the context of our national condition: In general, our national economic indicators are at an all-time high: There are more jobs, more profits, fewer bankruptcies; greater Gross National Product, greater business expansion and greater average incomes than ever before.

It is true, also, that Negroes have partaken to some extent of this affluence: Economic growth and state, local and federal efforts to eliminate discrimination in employment have boosted the number of Negroes employed from 6.4 million to 7.7 million in the past 10 years - - faster than the growth rate for white workers.

Non-whites made exceptional progress in teaching jobs and in such white-collar occupations as postal clerks or telephone operators. Even in the traditionally-segregated crafts, non-white employment increased from 4 to 5.6%.

However, despite this progress, Negro unemployment is still twice the national rate -- 7.6% compared to the national average of 4%. Almost one out of every five Negro young people, age 16 to 21, is out of work and out of school. At the close of last year, two out of five college-trained Negroes were working, not in the professions for which they were educated, but in blue-collar or farm jobs. Viewing the situation, ghetto by ghetto, we encounter even more terrible statistics: In the Watts Area of Los Angeles, unofficial figures indicate that 25% to 35% are unemployed; in Oakland, 15% are jobless, with over 30% of the Negro youth unemployed. In Baltimore, the Negro jobless rate is 8% -- more than twice the white rate.

As bad as these figures are, they, nevertheless, grossly understate the problem. They do not include the many under-employed or the millions who, in despair, have dropped out of the job market, who have just given up. If these members of the work force were included, it is estimated that the true unemployment rate among Negroes would be 12%.

Nor do the figures indicate the real conditions of those who are classed as employed, but whose drudgery-filled jobs pay so little that they remain in poverty, often required to "moonlight" or to seek welfare assistance. While the rest of the nation was enjoying increasing affluence between 1960 and 1966, the median family income in the Watts Area actually fell $800. That segment of our big cities' population which has remained untouched by the general affluence is so substantial that half of all non-white families still live on or below the poverty line. The median income for Negro families is only 56% that of whites.

The Nation's Capital, with 63% Negro population, offers us a view in microcosm of all the problems now plaguing or soon to plague each of the big cities with expanding ghettoes.

Until very recent years, Washington was a rigidly-segregated city -- to the extent that it maintained a dual school system, one for Negroes and one for whites. Following the Supreme Court's school desegregation decision, the Washington schools were integrated, and the city "discovered" for the first time that Negro students were suffering an achievement lag of several years behind white students. This educational lag is now reflected in Negro unemployment statistics:

The District of Columbia is an area of low unemployment -- the rate is 2.1%. That percentage, however, represents 17,000 unemployed men and women - 75% of them non-white.

These constitute the hard-core unemployed -- the ones who are underskilled, unskilled, under-educated, under-trained and untrained. Many have an additional strike against them: they have arrest records. In one neighborhood center, 85% of the males and 10% of the females (among 5,100 interviewed for jobs) were found to have arrest records. Virtually all were barred from employment because no adequate distinction is made between arrest, conviction and prison records.

The requirement of a high school diploma, even for jobs which may not require this much education, hinders many non-whites, for the dropout rate is high.

Tests for employment -- which more often reflect the individual's absorption of a white culture than they do the individual's capacity to do a job -- block many other Negroes from jobs.

Like many other cities, Washington has ordinances prohibiting discrimination in housing and in hiring; but, obviously, something more aggressive is needed now.

Industry and those in charge of apprenticeship training programs need to be convinced that the situation requires more than token adherence to the law; it requires a policy of deliberate hiring, of deliberate seeking-out of the Negro; it may also require special training or a waiving of prerequisites which may not be relevant to the job.

The difficulty of finding jobs for the Negro in the center of the city is further complicated by the flight to the suburbs of industry and new business enterprises. In the Washington area, according to the Employment Service, 63.7% of the construction jobs are now in the suburbs; 52.2% of those in trade; 49.7% of the jobs in manufacturing; 49% of the jobs in finance, insurance and service, and 38.9% of those in transportation, communications and utilities. Virtually all other big cities are experiencing the same loss of jobs.

The city which produced the ghetto now must more aggressively find solutions to the evils created by the ghetto. It must eliminate the poor schooling and stunted motivation imposed on each victim of disadvantage. It must recognize that poverty and segregated housing patterns breed crime, violence, illness, dope addiction, alcoholism and hopelessness. It cannot turn away from the fact that segregated housing patterns also breed de facto school segregation and, invariably, inferior schools.

Although 17 states now have fair housing statutes, very few are seriously enforced. The NAACP last year undertook to break the pattern of discrimination in real estate selling by filing antitrust suits against the Akron, Ohio Area Board of Realtors and against the Board of Realtors in Trenton and Mercer County, New Jersey. More than 1,000 fair housing organizations have been formed, working to open up the suburbs as well as the city to minority group members.

These are problems whose solutions will require the combined efforts of private groups and government agencies. Such cooperative activity might well be mobilized around the many far-reaching recommendations adopted by the recent White House Conference "To Fulfill These Rights", as well as the Administration's trail-blazing Demonstration Cities Program.

Among these conference proposals is the establishment of Metropolitan Job Councils in each urban community with a substantial Negro population. Representatives of business, unions, all levels of Government and community organizations would work together to gather information on the characteristics and needs of minority group members and then to assign responsibility for meeting those needs.

The councils would develop a system of periodic reports for employers in the area to identify job opportunities and training possibilities for Negroes and would undertake the task of fitting the jobless for these openings.

Also proposed by the Conference were:

* A large-scale government-financed program of public works which would provide immediate jobs for Negroes at their present levels of skill.

* Year-round employment, training and counseling programs for minority youth, as well as a federalized employment service.

*Affirmative actions by private employers, labor unions and government to provide more and better jobs.

* The strengthening of all programs which protect workers' incomes, including minimum wage, unemployment compensation; and extension to farm workers and others of the protection of the right to organize.

* Establishing of national standards for public assistance programs.

* Improvement of schools and reduction of racial concentration within them.

In seeking solutions, we should add to these proposals those which would provide the broad physical and social face-lifting that the President envisages in his Demonstration Cities legislation. "I propose," he declared, "a demonstration cities program that will offer qualifying cities of all sizes the promise of a new life for their people.... I propose that we focus all the techniques and talents within our society on the crisis of the American city."

If approved by Congress, such projects would establish, not only low- and middle-income housing (replacing blighted areas) but also schools, parks, playgrounds, community centers and access to all necessary facilities including health and transportation facilities.

There will be those who will complain about the cost of total renewal and the discomfort of eliminating segregated housing, but they must be told of the cost of not taking these steps. Los Angeles, for instance, spends $1.87 in police services and $2.25 for health services in the blighted areas for each dollar it spends in the economically favored areas. Louisville, Kentucky, spends twice as much in the poor areas. The experience is the same in all large cities with the result that metropolitan areas suffered a per capita rise in expenditures of 36% in the years of 1960 to 1963 -- at a time when their tax base was shrinking.

In varying degrees, every major city is now the scene of numerous governmental and private programs designed to alleviate the problems I have mentioned. Some community leaders bring to the problem more understanding than others, however. The police department's relations with the Negro and Spanish-American communities offer a case in point:

Although incidents involving police have served as the spark which set off virtually all of the riots of the past two years, reflecting the Negroes' and in some cases the Puerto Ricans' bitterness toward the police, few big cities have accomplished very much in the way of improving this relationship.

There are now under way many efforts to alleviate the situation in the most poverty-stricken areas: California has established 12 Community State Service Centers in blighted areas where the poor can find, under one roof, access to all the services the community offers: job and family counselling; training; information about educational possibilities; job referrals; health and welfare services, etc. The Watts Center has registered over 13,000 people and has placed 1,400 in jobs thus far.

Oakland, which is likewise the scene of a large body of jobless non-whites, will have such a center when the state budget is approved. Also going forward in Oakland is the effort by local, state and federal agencies to develop industry, promote the hiring of minority group members, provide desperately-needed housing and renew the areas of blight.

In Philadelphia, attention has recently been focused on the Rev. Leon Sullivan, who has established eight Opportunities Industrialization Centers for people in need of job training. Dotting the poor neighborhoods and manned by residents of the area, the OIC project was financed by businessmen whom Rev. Sullivan inspired, as well as by a grant from the U.S. Department of Labor. No applicant is turned away, and all seem to be infused with the minister's evangelical message that success awaits each one who tries. Some 1,500 trainees have already been placed in jobs; an additional 1,700 are now in training; and 6,000 are on the waiting list. OIC trainees are now working at such companies as RCA, Philco, General Electric and Budd. Once they were called "unemployable."

Efforts to stamp out job discrimination will need to be reinforced by a strengthened Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, which requires greater enforcement power to be truly effective, and by stronger, better-financed state and local Fair Employment or Human Relations Commissions.

Sporadic, uncoordinated programs in each community to stimulate economic development, train people for existing jobs, provide decent, low-cost housing, establish good schools and a wholesome environment for every child -- all these will have to coalesce into one thorough-going plan with total renewal as the goal, if we are to succeed.

In this massive effort, no community can afford the exclusion of groups whose philosophy is at variance with "the establishment." On the contrary, it is already apparent that the college-bred social worker or government agency representative is regarded with suspicion and thus cannot establish a dialogue with those most in need of being motivated.

I am convinced that this gulf, in so many instances, can be bridged only by leaders who are themselves products of the ghetto, who speak the language of the disadvanted, who can command the confidence of the wary. Many of these leaders are volatile youngsters, themselves embittered and in search of a proud Negro identity. Their varying expressions of anti-white feeling have created a split within the civil rights movement and a greater alienation, if that is possible, from the so-called "establishment," of which human relations commisions are a part.

I believe that we shall have to gain the cooperation of these angry young men and women, and that it is incumbent on us to actively seek their cooperation. Failure to do so will close to us one of the most important avenues of communication with the poor.

We cannot afford to do less than involve every segment of the community in this effort to save our cities and reclaim lives.

To quote from the President once more:

> "If we stand passively by, while the center of each (city) becomes a hive of deprivation, crime and hopelessness; if we devour the countryside as though it were limitless, while our ruins -- millions of tenement apartments and dilapidated houses -- go unredeemed; if we become two people, the suburban affluent and the urban poor, each filled with mistrust and fear one for the other... then we shall effectively cripple each generation to come."

AFL-CIO LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS

1966 FACT SHEET NO. 4

(Second Revision)

The AFL-CIO urges approval by the House of Representatives for H.R. 13712, the bill approved by the House Education and Labor Committee on March 29, 1966 to improve the Fair Labor Standards Act.

H.R. 13712, sponsored by Congressman John Dent (D-Pa.), chairman of the House General Labor Subcommittee, was substituted for the more comprehensive Roosevelt bill, H.R. 10518, approved by the Committee in 1965. The substitution was the result of deliberations and consensus in the Subcommittee following appointment of the former Subcommittee chairman, Congressman James Roosevelt (D-Calif.) to be U.S. Representative to the United Nations Economic and Social Council, effective September 30, 1965.

Although the Dent bill, H.R. 13712, differs in some respects from the Roosevelt bill, the AFL-CIO urges that the Dent bill be promptly passed by the House of Representatives.

H.R. 13712 raises the minimum wage to $1.40 an hour in February, 1967, and $1.60 in February, 1968, and extends coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act to more than 6.5 million additional workers.

Enactment of legislation along the lines of this bill would be a tremendous step forward toward the wage-hour objectives of the AFL-CIO. It would help assure a decent minimum standard of living to America's working people and it would make a major contribution to the elimination of poverty.

Therefore, AFL-CIO affiliated organizations should urge prompt action by Congress to enact into law the FLSA improvements contained in H.R. 13712.

Coverage

At present, some 17½ million non-supervisory wage and salary earners who should be covered are excluded from FLSA protections by unduly narrow coverage definitions and by special exemptions. Excluded workers are among the most poorly paid in the nation and must endure the worst working conditions.

H.R. 13712 would extend minimum wage protections to more than 6.5 million workers in the following categories of employment:

Industry	H.R. 13712 Dent Bill (Thousands)
Retail and Service:
Retail Trade*	1,500
Restaurants	425
Hotels and Motels	275
Hospitals, nursing homes	1,471
Miscellaneous services	50
Subtotal	3,721
Other Industries:
Laundries	505
Transit	65
Processing in areas of production	90
Taxicabs	100
Logging	37
Cotton ginning	34
Construction	581
All other industries	960
Subtotal	2,372
Agriculture	485
Grand Total	6,578

* Includes: General Merchandise Stores; Limited Price Variety Stores; Food Stores; Gasoline Service Stations; Apparel and Accessory Stores; Furniture and Appliance Dealers; Drug Stores; Auto and Farm Equipment Dealers; Food Service Enterprises; Building Materials Dealers; Hardware Stores; Auto and Accessories Dealers.

 Includes: Non-profit Organizations; Professional and Educational Organizations; Wholesale Trade; Finance, Insurance and Real Estate; etc.

Enterprise Coverage

H.R. 13712 changes the Fair Labor Standards Act definition of an "enterprise engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce" to include an enterprise which has employees engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce and which has an annual gross volume of sales of $500,000 or more beginning February 1, 1967, until January 31, 1968; and an annual gross volume of sales of $250,000 or more thereafter. There is no dollar volume test for laundries, drycleaning, construction enterprises and hospitals. "Mom and pop" establishments remain excluded as do individual retail and service establishments with annual sales of less than $250,000.

$1.60 Minimum Wage

Enactment of H.R. 13712 would be a substantial step forward toward the AFL-CIO objective of assuring low-paid job-holders a standard of living above the poverty level.

The bill would raise the minimum hourly wage both for workers now covered by FLSA and for workers newly covered. Here is the step-up schedule for increasing the minimum hourly wage under H.R. 13712:

For 29.6 million presently covered employees:

(1) Beginning February 1, 1967 ..... $1.40
(2) Beginning February 1, 1968 ..... $1.60

For 6.0 million newly covered employees (nonfarm):

(1) Beginning February 1, 1967 ..... $1.00
(2) Beginning February 1, 1968 ..... $1.15
(3) Beginning February 1, 1969 ..... $1.30
(4) Beginning February 1, 1970 ..... $1.45
(5) Beginning February 1, 1971 ..... $1.60

For "tipped employees," the wage paid by an employer shall be deemed to be increased by the amount of tips received by or attributed to such employee, but not by more than 35 percent of the applicable minimum wage rate, during the period February 1, 1967-January 31, 1969; 40 percent during the period February 1, 1969-January 31, 1971; and, 45 percent thereafter.

For 485 thousand agricultural employees:

(1) Beginning February 1, 1967 ..... $1.00
(2) Beginning February 1, 1968 ..... $1.15
(3) Beginning February 1, 1969 ..... $1.30

The present minimum wage rates affecting Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands would be increased by the same percentage amounts as the minimum wage increases on the mainland, i.e. 12 percent in 1967 and 16 percent in 1968. The rate for newly covered workers in the islands would be fixed on the basis of recommendations by special industry committees.

Overtime

H.R. 13712 would extend overtime protection to many workers in the following categories of employment:

- Retailing
- Hospitals and related institutions
- Construction
- Laundering and drycleaning
- Automobile, truck and farm implement dealerships, (excluding salesmen and mechanics)
- Agricultural processing
- Gasoline service stations

These newly covered workers would get overtime protection starting July 1, 1967. For these workers, overtime pay—time-and-a-half pay—would be required after:

44 hours any workweek after February 1, 1967
42 hours any workweek after February 1, 1968
40 hours any workweek after February 1, 1969

AFL-CIO Wage-Hour Goals

H.R. 13712 is a significant step forward toward the AFL-CIO wage-hour goals. The bill's improvements in the Fair Labor Standards Act deserve the support of AFL-CIO affiliated organizations.

Opponents of wage-hour improvements are trying to convince members of Congress that H.R. 13712 will injure business and cut back job opportunities. This is not true. A 1965 U.S. Labor Department study shows that "the economy adjusted easily to the increase in the minimum wage" under the 1961 Fair Labor Standards Act amendments, and that "employment in these newly covered segments did in fact go up."

It is vitally important that Congressmen learn immediately that there is strong support in their home districts for Fair Labor Standards Act improvements contained in the 1966 wage-hour bill, H. R. 13712, as approved by the House Education and Labor Committee.

Urge your Congressman to vote for the wage-hour bill approved by the House Labor Committee, and to oppose weakening amendments.

Introduction: The State of Optimism

By most measurements, Negroes in the United States appeared to be moving from perennial poverty to relative prosperity at the beginning of the postwar era. Forces at work promised to liberate them from the imbalance that had historically characterized their position in the economy. National economic expansion, technology, and southern economic reorganization had generated new opportunities and higher incomes. There was, in fact, cause for high expectations of basic and accelerated change.

Likewise, the South* had cause to be optimistic. Historically, it had lagged behind the rest of the nation and was generally looked upon as the "nation's number one economic problem," dependent for development upon slow-growth industries and agriculture. The region, since 1940, had been shedding itself of its relative homogeneity of economic structure; it had been moving away from economic backwardness and, as a result of national expansion and reallocation of resources, had been moving toward parity with the rest of the nation.

These developments—southern economic reorganization and improvement in the economic status of Negroes—are two of the principal results of national economic expansion since World War II.

Yet, despite the gains made, both the South and the Negro remain the most depressed segments of the economy and the population. There is some cause for continued optimism about southern economic growth and progress in general. But there is, in reality, little cause for optimism regarding rapid change in the status of Negroes in the near future. Unless unforseeable, "revolutionary," changes take place in Negro manpower utilization and development, the Negro citizen will remain the "forgotten man" in America's affluent society.

The situation of southern Negroes is less favorable than that of Negroes in the rest of the nation because the South has failed to extend the benefits of economic progress to them at a rate comparable to those extended to Negroes in other sections of the country. Personal per capita income in the South has quadrupled since 1940, but it is still less than three-fourths that of the rest of the nation. The income of Negro families and individuals nationally has grown over five times since 1940, but it is still little more than one-half that of white families and individuals; and in the South Negro families have an income of less than one-half (46%) that of white families and only one-half the income of their non-southern counterparts.

Gains have been made in employment, but unemployment is twice as extensive among Negro members of the labor force as among whites. Negroes are still concentrated in jobs of the lowest categories, with limited mobility and a high vulnerability to cyclical fluctuations and adverse consequences of technological changes.

Racial discrimination in employment is still as widespread as segregation and discrimination in education. This latter practice, particularly in vocational and technical training, helps to perpetuate a relatively poor job distribution of Negroes.

Thus, while it cannot be denied that important change has occurred in the economic status of Negroes during the past 20 years, critical questions must be considered regarding the rapidity of this change. Basically, the question facing the nation, the South, and Negroes today is whether Negroes are narrowing the gaps in their economic status. The issue is not whether Negroes have been making progress, but whether it has been rapid enough to enable them to adjust to an economy whose rate of change is cumulative and intense. The issue is whether the momentum of change is great enough, and deep enough, to generate an economic base among Negroes which will guarantee their continued movement up the economic ladder.

Traditional patterns of race relations have never worked in the best interest of the economy of the South or of the nation. Indeed, poor race relations have helped to depress growth.* Thus, the manner and extent to which Negroes are absorbed into the economy will strongly determine the pace with which the South reaches parity of income and economic well-being with the nation. Economic progress of the region is increasingly influenced by its urban and racial climate. And, we may add, pressure for change in southern race relations is increasingly generated by forces imbedded in the region's industrial-urban development.

Even this brief examination of southern economic change and the economic status of Negroes will, therefore, show also why Negroes have stepped up their efforts to speed school desegregation, which, in large part, derives from efforts to secure a better break economically in the nation and in the region. Hopefully, this study may also bring into focus certain aspects of the challenge to the South, if it is to continue its progress.

*Unless otherwise indicated, throughout this report the "South" means the states of Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, and Virginia. Since Negroes make up about 97% of the nonwhites in the country, census and other data on nonwhites will be considered as applicable to Negroes.

*See William Nicholls, Southern Tradition and Regional Progress. Chapel Hill, 1960.

II

Structural Reorganization of the South

Economic progress is best evidenced by upward changes in the real per capita income of individuals (and, to a lesser extent, in the income of families). Income determines the spending and saving power of people, while at the same time it provides a measure of the earning capacity of the whole economy and an indicator of individual contributions to the production of goods and services.

On the other hand, structural changes and economic reorganization are best shown by change in industry sources of employment and income, shifts in occupational distribution of employed persons, growth in "value-added" by manufacturing, and characteristics of population change.

The South Loses Its People

Beyond the size of the population (see Table 1) two aspects of population change are of interest here: the patterns of migration between the South and the non-South; and the patterns of migration between rural-farm areas and the city, both within and outside the South.

In the 1950's, the South's population grew 14%. But Table 2 shows that —most of this gain, however, resulted from "natural increase," i.e., an excess of births over deaths.

—only in Florida and Virginia was there a migration gain.

—all other southern states had more people moving out than moving in.

—Arkansas and Mississippi exported so many people that the former actually declined in population in the 1950's and the latter was stationary.

—Negroes were leaving the area in larger numbers than whites.

Another depressing fact: the South's export of people included a high proportion of its youth and its well-educated.

For Negroes this is shown by such facts as —in 1950, 55% of Negroes with four or more years of college were in the South; in 1960, only 48%.

—in 1950, 67% of Negro professional and technical workers were in the South; in 1960, only 48%.

During the decade 1940-50, more than 1.5 million Negroes left the South, and another 1.5 million left during the decade 1950-60. These movements involved 16% and 14% of the Negroes in the region in each of the two periods respectively. In 1940, 77% of all Negroes in the United States resided in the South compared with 51% today.

The leading exporters of people were Alabama, Arkansas, Mississippi, and South Carolina.

Patterns of migration by Negroes among southern states have varied. Florida, for example, is the only state which had an excess of inmigration by Negroes over outmigration in both decades since 1940: a 3% net inmigration between 1940 and 1950 and 17% bebetween 1950 and 1960 (see Table 2). Georgia and Louisiana are the only states in which outmigration by Negroes slowed itself after 1950 and began to show a downward trend. In each of the other states, included in Table 2, the upward trend in Negro outmigration continued throughout the 1940-1960 period. Mississippi lost the largest number of Negroes, 326,000, or 30%, between 1940 and 1950, and 323,000, or 32%, between 1950 and 1960.

The movement of Negroes out of the South is both helpful and harmful. By moving out of the South in pursuit of jobs created by national economic expansion, Negroes, as well as whites, find new job opportunities. Simultaneously, the South is being relieved of a sizeable portion of the population which over the years has depended on low-income agriculture for a livelihood.

On the other hand, losses in population drain away much of the best developed and trained manpower, and these losses are from the most productive age group, which has received the benefit of substantial investment by the South in education and training. The loss of these persons from the region is a drain on the economy's human capital.

Negroes Move to the Central Cities

Another population shift is the movement of people to cities and urban areas, both within and outside the South.

By 1960, three-fourths of the Negroes of Florida were urban dwellers (see Table 3). The proportion in Kentucky and Tennessee was about as high, and in Louisiana three out of five Negroes were urban. By 1960, in only four states—Arkansas, Mississippi, North and South Carolina—did the majority of Negroes live where once they overwhelmingly had: on the land, or close to it.

The movement of people to the cities and metropolitan areas of the South symbolizes a basic change in the economic structure of the region, sealing an end to the region's traditional economy.

Negroes have also concentrated in the central cities rather than the suburbs. Charles Silberman has suggested that this ranks as one of the great population movements in modern history.* In the last decade, the twelve largest Standard Metropolitan Statistical Areas —New York, Los Angeles, Chicago, Philadelphia, Detroit, San Francisco-Oakland, Boston, Pittsburgh, St. Louis, Washington, Cleveland, and Baltimore — lost over two million white residents and gained nearly two million Negro residents, while the central cities of all Standard Metropolitan Statistical Areas in the nation had an increase of 3.5 million in the Negro population.

However, the influx of Negroes to the large cities of the North and West should not obscure the fact that Negroes have been moving into southern cities as well.

Between 1950 and 1960, the number of whites in the central cities of the South increased only 26%; the number of Negroes in the central city increased 37%. Whereas just a few years ago the large majority of Negroes lived on farms, today about 72% live in urban areas and about one-half live in the central cities of those urban areas. Table 4 shows population data for selected southern cities.

These patterns underscore the fact that Negroes are becoming more urbanized than whites, in the South as well as in the North. The trends are not as great in the South as in the North, but it is clear that Negroes and whites have been moving in opposite directions, i.e., Negroes toward the central city and whites toward the suburbs.

Population redistribution within the South and between regions reflects the momentum of economic change and opportunity. The greatest single factor underlying population migration is economic, or employment, opportunity. The denial of opportunity to Negroes within the South and the attraction of such opportunity elsewhere has been the major motivation.

Employment and Sources of Income

The principal factor determining the distribution of population over broad regions is economic opportunity and the principal dimension of economic opportunity is employment opportunity.

While farming continues to occupy a big place in southern economic life, its relative role over the past 20 years has decreased. Farm employment declined by about 45% in the South between 1940 and 1960. During the same period manufacturing employment increased 23%, and as a source of income by 27%.

These changes have not only meant more factory jobs in the South. They have also involved diversification in employment. For example, the textile industry, once the backbone of manufacturing in the South and responsible for 25% of all manufacturing employment, is now the source of only 18%. Chemicals, transportation equipment, electrical machinery, and fabricated metals have grown as sources of factory employment, and other non-agriculture industries are increasingly providing more and better jobs for southern workers.

Unquestionably, the South has reduced its poverty. Since 1940, the region has made progress toward achieving a balance between its share of the nation's income and its share of the nation's population. The South had one-fifth of the population in 1930 but received only one-tenth of the income; in 1961, although its proportion of the population had remained at about 20%, its share of personal income had advanced from 10 to 15% (see Table 5).

The figures in Table 6 show per capita personal income. Clearly, the progression in the South since 1940 has been greater than for the nation as a whole. Perhaps the most illuminating figures are those on the bottom line: in 1940, southern personal income was only 58% of the national average; by 1962, it had reached 72%.

These indices, as shown in Tables 5 and 6, indicate the economic progress of the South. A different impression is obtained, however, if dollars and cents, rather than percentages, are used.

In 1940 per capita personal income amounted to $595 in the United States as a whole, only $252 more than that of the South. By 1950 the national figure had grown to $1,494, but the South's per capita income was only $1,011, or $482 lower. By 1961, when the national figure had reached $2,263, the South had a per capita income of $1,652, or $611 lower.

In other words, the South has had large growth in personal income and has made impressive gains in the percentage relationship of its income to that of the rest of the nation. At the same time, there has been an increase in the dollar gap, a gap that is more than twice greater than two decades ago.

The South is, nevertheless, now experiencing substantial improvements in its well-being. The economic lag which kept the region at the rear of American industrialization is being eroded. But Earl Rauber and Harry Brandt, both of the Atlanta Federal Reserve Bank, placed the "new South" in its best perspective. Rauber put it this way: "for better or worse the inexorable march of economic history has abolished the South as an economic entity." Brandt said, "with the old rural-agriculture economy gone, the Mississippi Delta farmer has less in common with the Atlanta factory worker or sales representative than the latter has with his counterparts in the rest of the country."

The region can no longer be characterized by a relatively homogeneous set of basic economic characteristics and pursuits different from those of the rest of the United States. It may be assumed, therefore, that southern economic growth and organization will be constantly linked to patterns of change in the total economy. Therefore, whatever forces shape the economy as a whole will tend to shape the future of the South, particularly if the region will emancipate itself from traditional race relations, a formidable barrier to its economic progress.

III

Negro Gain Has Been Slight

The Negro population of this country has jumped from about 13 to 20 million since 1940, and it has become predominantly urban. The number of Negroes in better paying semi-skilled and white collar jobs has doubled.

These advances have been important because they represent a new beginning and provide the basis for optimism about the continuing economic improvement of the Negro population. Three aspects of the situation should be observed, however, at this point:

(1) Negroes in the South have not shared proportionately in these advances. Differentials in economic progress by Negroes in the South and the non-South persist. They reflect not only the southern lag in general, but also a substantial lag in employment and occupational opportunity for Negroes in the South in comparison with opportunity in other regions.

(2) Not only have the improvements failed to close substantially the historic gap between Negroes and others, but in dollars and cents the position of Negroes has deteriorated.

(3) There are signs which suggest that the momentum underlying improvements in the position of Negroes has not been sufficient to allow Negroes to overcome their marginal position in the work force, nor sufficient to generate change at rates significant enough to guarantee continuous progress. One of the forces which generated positive change in the position of Negroes in the immediate postwar period was technology. Today it is exerting a negative impact.

Progress appears, at present, to be occurring at a decreasing rate when compared with progress of other Americans. New forces must be vigorously brought into play if the relative gains of the past 20 years are not to be eliminated or wiped out during the immediate years ahead. These forces will have to include intensified training and development of Negro manpower. But, above all, there is a need for vigorous application of public policy in eliminating racial discrimination in education, training, and manpower utilization or employment.

Income: Negroes Running Fast to Stand Still

Income analysis suggests that Negroes are on a treadmill and time is in reality "running out" on them, as a group, in their pursuit of parity with whites. The group has to run exceptionally fast in order to stand still. And Negroes in the South have more difficulty in sustaining their relative and absolute positions than those in other sections of the country.

Undoubtedly the position of Negroes as income recipients and consumers has improved. Three times more Negroes were employed in 1960 than in 1940 in income producing, non-agriculture jobs; thus there are more Negroes with money. Change has occurred in the distribution of income among Negroes, and the huge migration of the Negro population from rural to urban areas and to the central cities has resulted in a large concentration of Negro purchasing power in these areas.

For example, Table 7 sets forth estimates of participation in retail sales by Negroes in ten cities, ranging from $26 million, or 21% of the total, in Durham to $512 million, or 15%, in Houston. In none of these cities did Negroes represent this much sales volume 20 years ago. This is not only suggestive of the impact of aggregate and concentrated purchasing power in the Negro market, but it is also indicative of the kind of economic potential to which southern race relations must adjust.

Not only are there more Negroes with income, but also, in comparison with 20 years ago, fewer of them are in the lowest income brackets and more of them are in the middle and upper income categories. Obviously, this suggests a higher participation by Negroes in the market place.

For example, Table 8 shows a tripling in the proportion of Negro families with incomes between $4,000 and $6,000 between 1945 and 1961, while the number of families with income over $6,000 has grown from 4% to 20% of the total during the same period. These gains are impressive, but —the rate of participation in the labor force of Negro women and younger people is much higher than among whites;

—60% of the Negro families in this country today still have incomes of less than $4,000 annually, compared with 28% of the white families;*

—white families are abandoning the lower income brackets at a much faster rate than Negroes (a decline of 63% for whites and 33% for Negroes);

—Negroes are reaching the higher income brackets at a slower rate than whites.

Moreover, about 75% of the Negro families in the United States have incomes less than the median income of $5,981 for white families (see Table 10).

Beginning in 1940, the income of Negroes grew at unprecedented rates. It was marked by a growth of approximately 700% in aggregate personal income between 1939 and 1961, an income which is now estimated to be well over $22 billion per year, 5% of the personal income of the nation. In direct contrast to the situation before 1940, when Negroes as income recipients, or consumers, commanded little or no respect in the national and regional economy, they have since 1945 attracted serious competitive attention in the market places of the nation. The power of the Negro market has meaning in the area of race relations, as a "new" force underlying efforts on the part of Negroes to eliminate discrimination and segregation and obtain better employment in retail trade, industry, and finance.

But, Negroes made their greatest income gains between 1940 and 1954. Since 1954, they have not progressed in income as well.

In 1939, for example, the median wage and salary income of Negro males was $460, the equivalent of 41% that of white males. Between then and 1955, Negro men substantially gained. Since 1955, Negro males have barely held on to those gains, losing, as Table 9 shows, 3.5 percentage points between 1955 and 1957 and gaining only one point between 1955 and 1960. As of 1960, the wage and salary income of Negro males was still only three-fifths that of white males, just about the same as in 1955 when progress toward closing the income gap between Negroes and whites began to level off.

Similar developments occurred regarding family income. As shown in Table 10, Negro families and unrelated individuals gained 19% on white families and individuals between 1940 and 1954, moving from a ratio of 37% to 56%. Since the beginning of 1955, the percentage relationship has just barely held its own, dropping 5.3 points between 1954 and 1959, reversing itself in 1960 and again reaching 56%, and dropping again in 1961 to 52%.

Two characteristics stand out. On the one hand, relative growth in wage and salary income of Negroes since 1940 has been greater than that of whites; on the other hand, the absolute, or dollar, difference has widened considerably.

White males have stretched the "dollar gap" between their earnings and that of Negroes over three times since 1939. White families similarly have increased the differential between their employment income and that of Negro families.

People spend and save dollars. It is this dollar difference that counts. Pronouncements regarding economic progress which are confined to acceleration concepts and percentage change obscure the real predicament—Negroes are losing ground rapidly in gaining dollar parity with whites. The "dollar gap" trend shown in Tables 9 and 10 means very simply that earnings are increasing for whites at a faster pace than for Negroes.

This is explained in two ways. First, earnings of Negroes have been low over a long period of time. Thus, a smaller gain yields a striking percentage increase. The second explanation is more serious. Notwithstanding their real gains, Negroes are not finding enough jobs in areas where wages and salaries tend to be higher and to increase faster.

Whites are acquiring the highest paying jobs in the higher occupational classifications. The benefits of general economic expansion and technology, therefore, have only "trickled down" to the Negroes, putting more of them into wage and salary jobs. These benefits automatically produced high acceleration in income change, but were restricted tightly to lower occupational classifications.

Thus, despite the unprecedented growth of income among Negroes and the percentage gains made, the fact remains that income progress of Negroes has leveled off. The percent of Negro families in lower income brackets is twice as high as whites, and the differential in earnings of whites and Negroes continues to widen, largely offsetting percentage gains. Accordingly, it is still difficult for Negroes to purchase health, education, and the amenities of life on the same level as other members of the population.

Southern Negroes at the Bottom of Economic Ladder

The individual income of Negroes in the South is only two-fifths that of comparable whites. In other regions, the income of Negro citizens is about three-fourths and that of whites (see Table 11).

The table also shows that southern Negroes have incomes of about two-fifths that of non-southern Negroes (females in the South, incidentally, do slightly better). On the other hand, white persons in the South have incomes close to four-fifths that of white persons in the non-South.

The family income situation is slightly better for Negroes. But here, also, the non-southern Negro family enjoys an income at least 50% greater than that of its southern counterpart (see Table 12 and, for more detail, Table 13).

Table 14 shows that in 1960 there was $1,522 separating the median incomes of whites and non-white persons in this country; in 1950, the difference had been only $1,080. Negroes had fallen farther behind. In the South, the 1960 median income of Negroes was $1,478 below that of whites; in 1950, the difference had been only $908. Negroes had fallen farther behind.

In only one southern state, Florida, have the earnings of Negro male workers gained in relation to those of white male workers (see Table 15). In each of the other ten states, not only did the dollar gap increase, but Negroes also lost percentage ground, ranging from a 6% negative change in Virginia to a 25% negative change in Arkansas for male workers; and a negative change in the income of all persons (see Table 14) ranging from a low 7% in Georgia to 21% in Tennessee. In other words, although Negro income between 1950-60 increased sharply, the gap between white and Negro income was growing.

It seems clear that Negroes in the South have not kept pace with the income progress of the region, and that little change is occurring in their income position visa-vis non-southern Negroes.

One may conclude, therefore, that unless greater efforts are vigorously applied to absorb Negroes into the industrial-commercial life of the urban South these trends will continue. They suggest that, in the absence of better economic opportunity, loss through the migration of Negro manpower will continue.

Employment, Occupations, and Manpower Utilization

Four other factors exert a marked influence on the position of Negroes in the non-agriculture labor market. They are:

—technology;

—the degree of competition from whites;

—the quality and kind of education received as part of manpower development; and —public policy regarding the elimination of racial discrimination in education, employment, and occupations.

The last factor is assuming a more important function as a result of court decisions to desegregate education and increases in "fair employment practices" programs at local, state, and federal levels.

Change in technology and manpower requirements and the changing patterns of industry expansion suggest that Negroes can no longer depend upon the forces of national economic expansion and technology to generate improvements in employment opportunity. Technology alone has drastically changed the kind of manpower needed by manufacturing industries. The need for unskilled workers has declined, whereas the demand for workers with skills and training has increased. This trend, coupled with a relatively slow pace of manpower development among Negroes, places them in an unfavorable position when it comes to supplying persons with skills who can compete favorably in today's labor markets.

Between 1947 and 1961, the number of employees in mining, manufacturing, contract construction, and agriculture decreased, while the number of employees absorbed by wholesaling and retailing, insurance, finance, the so-called services, and government increased. Noteworthy is the fact that the industries with a declining rate of employment are the industries which have absorbed Negroes. Actually, the source of improvement in the economic status of Negroes during past years has been their movement out of agriculture into mining, manufacturing, and construction where they found unskilled and semi-skilled jobs as laborers and operatives. These are the industries which since 1957 have had either declining employment or relatively little growth in employment. Excluding government, the areas of growth in employment are not the areas in which Negroes have traditionally found employment.

The second general development involves a shift in employment from plant to office in manufacturing industries. Between 1950 and 1961, the number of persons employed in manufacturing increased by more than one million while the number of production workers declined by almost one-half million. This means that increases in manufacturing employment were in nonplant and non-production jobs, a shift, in other words, to office work and white collar jobs, areas of employment which have never absorbed many Negroes.

Increased use of labor saving devices—"automation"—means that employment opportunity in semi-skilled and unskilled work will continue to decline. It will, therefore, become increasingly difficult for Negroes to attain higher or even retain previous levels of employment in those occupations and industries which they had penetrated during the 1940's and 1950's.

Unemployment among Negroes today amounts to more than 10%, twice that of whites. In heavily industrialized areas such as Chicago and Detroit, the differential is even more striking. Furthermore, the duration of unemployment is longer for Negroes than for whites.

In September 1958 the average duration of unemployment for Negroes was 17.8 weeks and for white workers 13.3 weeks. The average length of unemployment in September 1962 for Negroes was 18.0 weeks while that for whites had dropped to 13.0 weeks. Negroes accounted for about one-fourth of all the long term unemployed, but for only about 11% of the labor force. About 29% of the very long term unemployed in September 1962 were Negroes compared with 21% in September 1961. Long term joblessness among Negroes results from discrimination in hiring and inadequate training and inadequate manpower development.

Since 1940, white collar employment among Negro males has gone up 144% and blue collar skilled and semi-skilled employment by 101% in contrast to 31% and 14% among whites in the respective groups. In the same period, Negro females employed in white collar positions increased by 169% and in blue collar positions by 132% in comparison with a white increase of 18% in white collar jobs and a decline of 23% in the number represented in blue collar occupations.

These percentage gains are impressive, but the fact remains that Negroes have penetrated only to a limited extent job categories above semi-skilled levels.

For example (see Table 16), Negro females make up 74% of the total females employed, but they comprise almost one-half, 48%, of all the domestic servants in the economy and only 2% of all the sales workers; this is not substantially different from the situation in 1940. Negro males comprise slightly in excess of 9% of the employed males in the economy, but they are only 2% of the total number of men employed as nonfarm managers, proprietors, and officials, only four-tenths of a percentage point better than the situation in 1940. Yet they are 28% of the laborers.

Table 17 shows similar data for the South only. There has not been a large penetration by Negroes into the growth sectors of employment. Those industries and occupations where Negroes have gained in employment represent the slow growth areas of the economy and labor market.

It has already been suggested that regional differences in employment account in large measure for differences between the income of Negroes in the South and in the rest of the nation, as well as for high rates of migration by Negroes from southern states. Indeed, in none of the major industry categories shown in Table 17 do Negroes in the South keep pace with Negroes in the non-South. Study the last column of Table 18. In every category except "government" Negroes had a smaller share of the jobs in 1960 than in 1950 in the South. Of course there were fewer Negroes living in the South in 1960. But this is a chicken and the egg question. Fewer jobs because of fewer people? Or did people leave because jobs were not there?

But the fact is, Negroes make up only slightly less of the southern labor force today, 19%, than they did a decade ago, when they were 21% of the labor force. In each area of industry employment, the decline in Negro employment exceeds the decline in the Negro labor force.

Table 19 shows how Negroes are represented in various job categories. These tables reveal important contrasts between the percent of the total labor force and the percent of occupations held by Negroes.

We see, for example, in Table 19 that —in the non-South, 6% of the employed Negroes are in professional and technical positions; —of all professional and technical positions, Negroes hold only 3%;

—in the South, the percentages are 5 and 9.

We also see that Negroes of the South have almost all the household jobs and nearly half of the laborers jobs, both on and off the farm. We see that very few of the clerical and sales jobs are held by Negroes either in or out of the South. In the non-South, however, a good percentage of employed Negroes (10%) are in clerical spots, whereas only 3% of the employed Negroes in the South are so employed.

In sum, it appears that penertation of higher echelons of the occupational scale by Negroes has been relatively limited, and much more so in the South than outside the region. Negroes have entered the mainstream of industrial and civil employment in non-southern communities to a greater degree than in the South. In so doing, they have filled jobs which make possible upgrading, training opportunity, and increased earning power on the basis of personal job qualifications. In the South, Negroes have not shared equitably in the rapid industrial expansion of the past two decades.

IV

What Price Discrimination?

An attempt has been made to show the position of Negroes in the economy of the nation and the South. Emerging from the presentation are several implications, a few of which will be dealt with as a conclusion to this report.

Education

Employment determines income; the level of income is related to the kind of job one is able to obtain; and jobs are related to education and training. Thus, to a great degree, the ability of Negroes to pass from poverty and deprivation to parity with the rest of the population depends not only upon removing barriers to employment and occupational mobility. It also depends upon better education through increased school desegregation and upon rapid adjustments and improvements in the process of Negro manpower development (see Table 20).

Not all present underemployment of Negroes can be attributed to discriminatory employment practices; limited opportunities are sometimes available to Negroes for which few exhibit any interest or can qualify. Nevertheless, Negroes face a two-pronged problem: discrimination in employment on one hand and, on the other, an inadequate flow of manpower to meet such limited opportunities as there are. This inadequacy is a cumulative product of segregation in education and manpower development and utilization. This is nowhere more true than in vocational and technical training.

Generally, vocational training available to Negroes is limited mainly to those occupations in which they have traditionally found employment: in the industrial trades, some of which are becoming obsolete, and in those areas where Negroes provide services to Negroes, such as barbering. Technical courses in electronics and tool design, the apprenticeable trades such as plumbing, steamfitting, and sheet metal work, and courses in blueprint reading and welding, are usually not available to Negroes.

Contrast between programs to develop white and Negro manpower can be seen by the course offerings of three southern metropolitan school systems: Atlanta, Houston, and Nashville.

Houston

In the only vocational and technical high school in the Houston Independent School System, an all white school, full three year courses are offered in: air conditioning and refrigeration mechanics, automobile mechanics, drafting, machine shop, photography, radio and television, and welding. None of these courses is taught in the five Negro schools.

Negroes are offered two years of training in commercial cooking and baking, cleaning and pressing, and trade dressmaking, courses which are not taught in white schools.

Nashville

The only vocational and technical high school in Nashville is an all-white institution. Full courses are offered in commercial art, drafting, auto mechanics, electricity, general clerical, industrial chemistry, machine shop, refrigeration, secretarial training, and office machines; adult evening courses are taught in such areas as sheet metal layout, pipe-fitting, machine shop, welding, aircraft blueprint reading, electronics for office machines, and advanced projection.

Courses offered to Negroes (in only one of the four high schools) throughout the county are auto mechanics, commerce, cosmetology, tailoring, trowel trades, and woodworking. Evening courses are taught in sewing, millinery, auto mechanics, cosmetology, tailoring, trowel trades, and electronics.

Atlanta

The white vocational and technical school in Atlanta is the Smith-Hughes School.* Courses are offered in electronics, tool and die design, instrumentation, machine shop, refrigeration and air conditioning, electricity, iron-working, steam-fitting, plumbing, sheet metal, tool and die making, blueprint reading and drafting, gas fitting, and welding.

Negroes are offered at Carver Vocational School radio and television, industrial sewing, commercial cooking, short order cooking, shoe repairing, auto mechanics, tailoring, bricklaying, drycleaning, practical nursing, and catering.

The contrasts are obvious. Ninety percent of the Negro youth and 80% of the white youth do not go to college. Vocational and technical training at pre-college levels is a real concern. Neglecting the education of the majority of youth who do not go to college will reflect itself most seriously among Negroes, the group most vulnerable to unemployment and automation, because of the imbalance in job development and preparation. We do not need poor quality vocational and technical training programs which serve as dumping grounds for problem students, nor programs that prepare Negro youth for "traditional Negro jobs." We need vocational programs that give sound background in mathematics, science, and other academic subjects, as well as developing marketable skills.

Jobs for laborers and unskilled workers will undoubtedly be considerably reduced by 1970. On the other hand, the economy may well demand, according to some estimates,

—80% more managers
—25% more clerical personnel
—25% more sales personnel
—25% more banking, finance, and insurance personnel
—more blueprint readers, computer operators, metallurgical technicians, machine tool operators, industrial chemists, key punch and machine operators, and other highly skilled people.

But

—no increase is expected in the demand for laborers, and the demand for semi-skilled workers is not expected to rise above 15%.

Restricted vocational and technical training for Negroes is justified by southern school boards on the grounds that jobs in the crafts and technical areas as well as in sales, clerical, and other white collar positions are not generally open to Negroes; therefore, training would be costly and useless. This argument is invalid on its face. School systems have the moral and legal obligation to give all persons the best training and education possible. Moreover, changes in employment opportunity for Negroes in industry, commerce, and government further invalidate the position. President Kennedy's Executive Order 10925 forbidding racial discrimination in federal employment as well as in industries having government contracts has opened new areas of employment opportunity for Negroes. Negroes themselves are using economic and political pressures to achieve improvement in job opportunity. Rapid adjustments in the education of Negroes to meet the demands of new employment opportunity are both urgent and necessary.

Costs of Discrimination

The President's Council of Economic Advisers asserted in 1962 that losses to the economy through racial discrimination result from two factors: (1) inefficiencies in the use of the labor force resulting from failure to utilize fully the existing skills of our population; and (2) failure to develop potential skills fully. The Council estimated that the nation's economy is losing between $13 billion and $17 billion per year in national income and product as result of these two factors.

Fifty percent of the nation's Negroes are concentrated in the South, and the South receives approximately 20% of the nation's total income. A conservative estimate is that the South loses from $5 to $6 billion annually because of racial discrimination.

The South can no longer afford the luxury of wast-

*This school was desegregated on January 28, 1963, but only a token number of Negroes has been accepted for training.

ing a valuable human resource. It cannot continue to deny itself better markets for goods and services by failing to provide a climate of equal economic opportunity for all its citizens. It is equally clear that the nation can ill afford to lose $17 billion per year in income and product. To achieve full equality with other regions of the nation, the South must achieve full utilization of its manpower. For the nation as a whole, the continuing struggle of the cold war makes the full use of America's human resources imperative.

Race Relations and Economic Growth

Despite the relatively low income per person of Negroes, there are twice as many with income as there were a decade or so ago. Negroes have moved ahead educationally. More of them are concentrated in the cities. They are acquiring greater political strength in the urban areas, and they are more sensitive to their role in the politics and market place of the city and the state.

Political strength and purchasing power among urban Negroes can scarcely be ignored by government officials, city planners, business, and industry. With a new industrial-urban orientation, Negroes will increasingly apply political and economic pressures to bring about changes in southern race relations, to step up the momentum of school desegregation, to obtain better employment opportunity, and to obtain access to public facilities.

Rapid racial adjustments by the "new South" are vitally important to the economic health of the region. Tensions generated by poor race relations are not conducive to economic growth. Chaos over school desegregation, boycotts to achieve employment opportunity, sit-in demonstrations, and picket lines, all are simply and tragically inimical to the economic life of the region. Positive steps toward good race relations, the full absorption of Negroes into the mainstream of the region —these are imperative to leadership seeking a healthy South.

Public Policy

Clearly involved in the whole question of improving the economic position of Negroes is the influence of public policy on school desegregation, employment opportunity, and the elimination of segregation in housing and public places.

Low income Negroes and whites in large numbers are relocating themselves in the urban centers of the South just as they are in the North. Without extraordinary economic expansion and rapid improvement in the distribution of income, without swift changes in southern race relations, it is apparent that in the next decade the bulk of southern poverty will complete its shift from the country to the city.

Negro poverty will take its place in the urban slums of the South as a substitute for the traditional rural poverty—which, at least, was relatively self-sufficient. This concentration of low-income people in urban areas raises critical questions for southern city planners and officials.

The national expansion of the economy and technology, which began 20 years ago to alter the position of Negroes cannot be relied upon exclusively to bring about the level of improvement necessary in the future. Public policy will have to play an increased role. This means the expansion and strengthening of programs at local, state,* and federal levels to promote "fair employment practices"; the expansion of minimum wage coverage; more extensive area redevelopment programs; more extensive and inclusive programs of adult education and adult training and retraining programs. All these policies and programs must be advanced along with school desegregation. They will serve to reinforce change generated by normal economic forces.

That Negroes need improved economic opportunity is clear. That poverty among Negroes is being transferred from the rural South to the urban South is equally clear. Welfare dependency in urban areas will not solve the problem. Basically, the solution rests with full opportunity for the development of manpower potential and for employment and occupational mobility.

Employers, government officials, southern educators, southern school boards, and local communities must recognize what continued failure to meet the demands of Negro manpower development will mean. Not only will uneducated and inexperienced Negro manpower continue to contribute to labor surpluses, the very heart of the South's problem, but also the drain on urban economies in supporting undeveloped manpower will continue to impede the progress of both southern and national economic growth.

*On March 17, 1963 Kentucky Governor Bert Combs signed a code of fair practices, making Kentucky the first southern state to adopt such a measure. The code prohibits discrimination in employment and job opportunity, financial assistance, icensing, training programs, parks, and hospitals.

CIVIL RIGHTS and UNION RIGHTS

They go together

Mr. Mitchell: The following statement represents the position of Mr. Roy Wilkins, executive director of the NAACP; Mr. A. Philip Randolph, president of the American Negro Labor Council; the Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr., president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference; and Mr. James Farmer, national director of the Congress of Racial Equality.

We support H.R. 77 and urge swift action to repeal Section 14(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended.

The simple truth is that the slogan "Right to Work" is nothing more than the old phrase "open shop" which the powerful industrialists of America used in the early days of the 20th century to prevent trade union organization. At that time the open shop was the ideological weapon which was used to justify violence and terror in the attack against trade unionism, and which for a period resulted in a kind of industrial barbarism associated with the tragic names of Ludlow, Colo.; Homestead, Pa.; Harlan County, Ky.; and the infamous 1938 Memorial Day massacre of steelworkers in Chicago when Negro citizens as well as white workers lost their lives. The issue then was the right of unions to exist and function in American society and the right of workers to secure collective-bargaining agents of their own choosing.

Much time has passed. Trade unionism is now an established institution in American life, but there is still a sizable group of recalcitrant employers who persist in their efforts to destroy unionism or to make it entirely ineffective. They refurbished the old discredited "open shop" concept and, employing the techniques of Madison Avenue hucksters, are now selling the new slogan "Right To Work."

Do these laws provide American workers with any guarantee of employment? They do not. Do any of these right-to-work laws embody a code of fair employment practices? They do not. Do these laws attempt to determine fair wages, provide decent hours of labor or other terms and conditions of employment? They do not. Do they provide for equitable distribution of work or guarantee that layoffs shall be in inverse order of seniority? They do not. Do they provide for vacations with pay, disability benefits, and retirement pensions? They do not.

What, then, do they do? In their commonest form they prohibit any kind of union security. They make it impossible for a labor-management agreement to provide for any form of union security.

The need to develop a firm and secure economic base within the Negro community is of the greatest importance, not for Negroes alone but for the stability and order of the American community. The growing disparity in economic status between Negro and white workers and the vulnerability of colored wage earners to long-term economic distress are clearly indicated by the cruel facts on unemployment and economic distribution. We believe that Negro workers, as do other Americans, need a strong, vigorous, and democratic labor movement.

On the other hand, we have worked with the leaders of the AFL-CIO and its civil rights department, and with the leaders of many affiliated unions of the AFL-CIO, on civil rights matters. They have marched with us in Washington, D. C., and in Montgomery, Ala. They fought valiantly for what is now Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964; and we freely acknowledge that without their help that Title would not have been included in the law.

We know after many long years of experience that so-called right-to-work laws do not give Negro workers the right to work. These laws are of no value in ending discrimination. We shall proceed, as we have in the past, in our efforts to eliminate discrimination by some employers and by certain labor unions, but we also wish to assist in helping to build a truly democratic American labor movement that is based upon the principles of racial and economic justice.

The NAACP welcomes the support of organized labor in the battle for full civil rights for all American citizens and is proud of its long years of cooperation with trade union organizations. We join with them in urging the repeal of Section 14(b) of the National Labor Relations Act because we believe that such action is in the best interests of all wage earners as well as in the interest of our country.

Rep. Glenn Andrews, who asked the following question is a Goldwater Republican from Alabama with a consistent record of opposing all civil rights legislation. His district includes Selma. Thus the "mutual astonishment" of Mitchell at Andrews' sudden concern for Negro rights.

Mr. Andrews: Mr. Mitchell, I am frankly astonished that you, Dr. King, Mr. Randolph, and a group of your young people should be committed to the repeal of 14(b).

Mr. Mitchell: I do not know whether I could answer your question in a word but if you would indulge me to preface my reply by saying that our astonishment is mutual, I am equally astonished that you are defending the right of the colored people and I am happy that you are in that position, Mr. Andrews, and because we need all the help we can get.

I would say that I fear you have misunderstood the history of the American labor movement in relation to the colored people. This organization, the AFL-CIO and the constituent unions represent people who have worked with us for desegregation of public schools. They have assisted us in passage of the 1964 Civil Rights Act which has brought desegregation to the Senate of Alabama and they have helped us in trying to improve working conditions.

I would say that we are allies. We have not had from the employers as an organized group the kind of assistance in making America a better place for colored and white people as well as everyone else that we have had from organized labor groups.

Now I would say if anybody has a bona fide amendment or language which has a true purpose of correcting discrimination and which is really going to do the job, of course, all of us support it.

I am past the stage in my life when I am deceived by things that are done up in pretty ribbons and fancy paper because all too often when we open the box there is nothing inside.

WE IN THE AFL-CIO have always contended that union rights and civil rights go hand in hand.

For 20 years the backers of so-called "right-to-work" laws have been peddling the false notion that wiping out the union shop would increase job openings for Negroes.

This has been very selective peddling. They didn't (and still don't) use the argument among white southerners, whose votes put most of the present "right-to-work" laws on the books. (There is still a South Carolina statute forbidding integrated work forces in textile mills.)

But they did and still do peddle this poison among Negroes and other minorities, despite the fact that practically all racial discrimination, past or present, has been originated and enforced by employers. And practically all anti-discrimination provisions, by law or by contract, have been originated by unions.

As Clarence Mitchell, speaking for four major civil rights organizations—the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the American Negro Labor Council, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference and the Congress of Racial Equality—makes clear in these pages, civil rights and union rights go hand in hand.

This Is Your War . . .

The Crusade Against Poverty

by HUBERT H. HUMPHREY

Vice President of the United States

SUPPLEMENTARY UNEMPLOYMENT AND SEVERANCE BENEFITS

When garment shops go out of business workers pay the heavy price in unemployment and the end of earnings. They may have given years of loyal service; their skills may have helped to build the business and its profits. Yet, when that business ends and through no fault of their own they are left without jobs, all of the long years and the precious skills have meant nothing.

By October 1960, responsible employers in the garment industry had joined with the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union in recognizing that the problem of what happens to workers when their shops closed permanently was one of special importance to the continued welfare of the garment industry and its workers. The National Supplementary Unemployment-Severance Benefit Fund was then established and is now embodied in the agreements between the union and the employers.

For eligible workers left unemployed through the permanent closing of their shops, it provides two kinds of benefits: one is a lump sum benefit for the worker severed from his job by the closing; the other is a weekly unemployment benefit which is paid in addition to the unemployment insurance benefit received from the government. Those who meet the eligibility requirements may receive either a lump-sum severance benefit or the supplementary unemployment benefit or both and in amounts depending on average weekly earnings and length of employment by the firm going out of business. Here are the highlights of this benefit plan. A complete set of the rules and regulations of the fund is available at your local union severance department.

You May Receive a Lump-Sum Severance Benefit If—

1. Your employer made contributions to the fund for at least 8 quarters, and

2. Your employer has been declared terminated according to the rules and regulations of the fund by the board of trustees of the fund, and

3. You were in the permanent employ of the terminated employer at the time of termination, and

4. You have received wages from the terminated employer for at least 2 quarters before the termination quarter.

You May Receive BOTH a Lump-Sum Severance Benefit and Weekly Supplementary Unemployment Benefits If—

1. You are eligible to receive the lump-sum severance benefit, and

2. You are out of work, and

3. You have received a state unemployment benefit for a full week of unemployment—or you were ineligible to receive such benefit because:

   a) Such a week is a waiting week under the state system, or

   b) You did not have sufficient employment or earnings required for eligibility under the state system, or

   c) You had exhausted your state system unemployment benefits,

HOW TO APPLY FOR BENEFITS

1. If your shop permanently goes out of business get in touch with your local union severance department. The department will arrange for you to fill out the application necessary to determine if you are eligible to receive the benefit.

2. Then, when you are told to report to the local union severance department, bring with you your union book.

3. Also, bring your unemployment insurance book or card if you are receiving unemployment insurance benefits. Or bring your last unemployment insurance record and the application card that was issued to you by the state employment office when you registered there for work.

4. Also, bring all decisions and rulings issued by the state employment office relating to your claim and referring to eligibility, disqualification, suspension, etc.

5. Also, bring any information that would show you were employed by the employer at the time he terminated his business: for example—payroll envelopes or W2 (withholding tax) forms.

VERIFICATION

In order to make sure that you receive the correct amount of benefit if you are eligible, information is gathered from federal and state government agencies and other sources. This often takes a long time so that even if you are found to be eligible to receive the benefits you may have to wait several months after the closing of the shop for your first check.

DECISION AND APPEAL

Your application will be reviewed by a local benefits committee and its recommendations will then be forwarded to the administrator of the fund by your local union severance department. His decision is final and binding unless it is appealed. A worker may file such an appeal with the appeals committee of the fund. The appeal must be made in writing within 15 days after the written notice of the administrator's decision is mailed to the applicant. Your local union severance department will help you prepare the appeal.

Prepared by the Supplementary Unemployment-Severance Benefits Fund, International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union.

d) You were eligible for and claiming benefits under a state disability benefits law, or under a disability benefits plan established under the terms of a union agreement, and

4. You registered with and reported to a state employment office.

5. But you may NOT be eligible if

a) You failed or refused to accept employment deemed suitable, or

b) You received retirement benefits from the ILGWU National Retirement Fund.

You May Receive ONLY Weekly Supplementary Unemployment Benefits If—

You were out of work because your employer terminated but—

1. You then return and continue to work at the same premises with a different firm but where any of the previous owners or management personnel of your previous employer are connected with the different firm, or

2. You then return and continue to work at the same premises with a different firm but on the same or similar product, or

3. You then return and continue to work at different premises with a different firm but where any of the owners or management personnel of your previous employer are connected with the different firm and where you continue to work on the same or similar product.

4. Where in conjunction with the termination of your employer the union has arranged for your reemployment at an establishment related to the firm of your original employer.

How Much Severance Benefit?

The amount of your severance benefit is related to your average weekly wage and the number of consecutive years you were employed by the terminated employer.

An employee who has completed the following consecutive years of continuous employment with a terminated employer shall be entitled to receive the following severance benefit if his average weekly wage is:

	under $55.00	$55.00 to $64.99	$65.00 to $74.99	$75.00 to $84.99	$85.00 to $94.99	$95.00 and over

Benefits for Extended Unemployment

If your employer terminated on or after May 1, 1963, and you had been credited with at least nine (9) years of continuous employment then:

(a) For each benefit payment after the 26th week you are eligible to receive an "extended" benefit of 50% of your regular supplementary unemployment benefit until your eligibility is exhausted, and in addition:

(b) If you were continuously unemployed for one (1) year following the date the shop was terminated, you are eligible to receive an amount equivalent to the severance benefit previously authorized.

SOUTHERN REGIONAL COUNCIL

THIS ADDRESS is Dr. Thompson's side of a debate on integration with Attorney Felix LaPeyre of the Citizens Council of South Louisiana held in August, 1960, at St. Louis Cathedral School in New Orleans. College students of the school arranged the debate which attracted a big audience of both segregation and integration partisans and extensive publicity. The Southern Regional Council regards Dr. Thompson's "The Case for Integration" as a clear and explicit statement of Negro aims and an excellent expression by a man long and fervently attached to American ideals.

THE CASE FOR INTEGRATION

by

DANIEL C. THOMPSON

Chairman of the Division of Social Sciences, Dillard University, New Orleans, La.

INTRODUCTION

THE FOUNDERS of our Republic attempted to translate the principles of personal freedom and equality, as enunciated by our Judaeo-Christian tradition, into practical, political reality. According to them the ultimate reason for the institution of a state is to secure the equal rights of every citizen. They would have regarded as unChristian and undemocratic any attempt on the part of a government to guarantee any group of citizens rights and privileges withheld from any other group.

Because equal citizenship is the most essential element of our Republic and the most sacred tradition in American society, leaders in American life have always recognized the fundamental importance of equal educational opportunities. This is so because it is a long established fact that whenever any group has access to superior educational opportunities, that group will also have the best opportunities to achieve high economic, social, and political status. Consequently, in order to keep a race or nation perpetually enslaved or oppressed, the oppressor must withhold from them educational equality. This is such a well known principle that Negro and white liberals have always argued that equal educational opportunities are absolutely essential if we are to achieve the democratic goals to which our nation is dedicated.

THE INTEGRATIONISTS' ARGUMENT

The segregationists use many arguments in order to rationalize the inequalities which have always existed in the educational opportunities in the United States. I shall point up several of their fallacies and attempt to give what seems to me to be the integrationists' point of view.

The Question of States Rights The main argument of the states righters is legalistic. According to them, the 10th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States upholds the right of every state to set up any educational system it sees fit or to abolish at will any system it has.

Several things about the state righters' argument render it untenable. In the first place, segregationists who do most of the talking about states rights never mention them except when they try to find some legal justification for racial discrimination. The truth is, they are often precisely those who would depend heavily upon the federal government for economic support. They never invoke the states rights position when money is needed for highways, bridges, dams, price support, drought relief, or welfare.

Second, it overlooks entirely the fact that every American citizen, no matter in which state he resides, is first and foremost a citizen of the United States and as such is guaranteed by our federal government all the rights and privileges appertaining thereto. Moreover, the federal courts have persistently held that it is illegal for a local or state government to withhold from any citizen rights and privileges accorded by it to other citizens of equal qualification. This is a logical requirement, because the federal government recognizes equal citizenship responsibilities. Thus, during times of war or any other national crisis any citizen, in any state, may be called upon to perform whatever duty the federal government sees fit to impose upon him.

A third fallacy inherent in the states righters' argument is the tendency to overlook the fact that each state is an integral part of the union. This has been a well established legal fact since the adoption of the Constitution of the United States which required every commonwealth, or state, to give up its individual sovereignty to the federal government. Consequently, no state can make any law that is in contradiction to federal constitutional law. This principle was dramatically validated by our Civil War, bitterly fought to establish the facts that a state may not secede from the Union and that sovereignty in the United States is centered in the federal government. Recently, on March 20, 1961 the United States Supreme Court held that the "Doctrine of Interposition" is "without substance."

To deny the supremacy of the federal government is a shortsighted and dangerous teaching. It overlooks years of fruitful cooperation among the several states which has made the United States the most prosperous, powerful, and respected nation in the world. This could not have been done if every state had remained sovereign.

The Question of Southern Tradition A second frequently heard argument on the part of the segregationists is that racial integration will destroy "sacred southern traditions." It might be pointed out that all traditions are not necessarily sacred. One could hardly call scalping, cannibalism, slavery, lynching, the disfranchisement of women, polygamy, the lily-white primary, sutteeism, and war "sacred"; yet each of these has been regarded as "sacred" at some time in history.

All thinking people know that when any tradition becomes outworn and inimical to the welfare of a race or nation, that tradition must be set aside and relegated to the memoirs of the passing generations and to the pages of history. Racial segregation is such a tradition. Respected Americans from every walk of life have borne testimony to the fact that racial segregation, as it exists in the United States, and particularly in the South, causes domestic disunity and endangers our international strength and prestige. This is so because throughout the world racism is a thoroughly discredited political ideology. Therefore, either the United States must give substance to its avowed belief in the principles of democracy or risk alienating its traditional allies and incurring the distrust of freedom-seeking emergent nations.

The Question of Time There are those who readily agree that segregation is an evil that sooner or later must be removed from our national life, but they insist that the time is not yet right.

First, some insist that Negroes are not yet ready for freedom and the responsibilities of full citizenship. Fair-minded people know that this is an overstatement; yet they will agree that no race, nation, or people can ever be altogether ready for freedom until they have first received freedom. The integrationists would like to remind the South that for almost 100 years the segregationists have argued that Negroes are not yet ready to receive the benefits of first-class citizenship. Yet these same segregationists have done everything in their power, legally, extra-legally, and often illegally, to prevent Negroes from attaining the education which they know to be the prerequisite of effective citizenship. Thus, even now in some southern states, such as Louisiana, Alabama, South Carolina, and Mississippi, there is not a single school in which Negro physicians, engineers or administrative experts may be trained. These are precisely the areas in which we will need a much larger number of highly trained persons, if we are to continue our leadership in the world of nations. There are in the whole South not more than 500 Negro engineers instead of the 30,000 or more this section of the United States should, in fact, produce.

Furthermore, it is regrettable that in the South where we have had recurring racial crisis for almost 100 years the political, economic and social leaders of the South flatly refuse, over and over again, to draw upon the leadership resources in the Negro community, even when the problem in question primarily affects Negroes. Thus, insofar as community, state and national affairs are concerned, segregationists would prevent Negroes from ever getting ready to participate fully in the citizenship process.

It must be pointed out, however, that despite limited opportunities and all kinds of legal barriers, Negro leaders are proud of the fact that among them some have managed to become as well prepared to assume even the most exacting demands of full citizenship as have any other people. Therefore, all but the blind, the misguided or the grossly uninformed must realize by now that unless Negroes are given the opportunity to enjoy equal freedom and assume responsibilities of citizenship incumbent upon every other citizen, our Republic "cannot long endure."

Are Negroes, then, ready for the integration for which they fight? The answer is twofold. Many are ready; many must be made ready. This is the real challenge to our educational system.

Second, some insist that white people are not yet ready. To some extent this could be true, because segregationists have done everything in their power to prevent white people from coming to know Negro people. They have confiscated books, ostracized leading citizens who dared to tell the truth about Negroes, passed numerous laws designed to prevent Negro and white people from getting to know one another and have brought pressure to bear upon all forms of mass media in an effort to prevent them from presenting Negroes in any role except that of servant or criminal. As a result, Negroes and whites tend to see each other in terms of stereotypes that foster suspicion, fear, distrust and hate. Therefore, whites, like Negroes, will never be ready for the assumption of full, responsible citizenship until they, too, are allowed freedom of human association unrestricted by laws and so-called "sacred" traditions.

The Question of Communist Inspiration One of the most objectionable suggestions made by segregationists is that the Negro's fight for freedom and equality is Communist inspired. They tend to overlook the fact that the very foundation of our government presupposes freedom and equality for all people. To deny this borders on treason, because every one of our legal documents, from the Mayflower Compact to the Bill of Rights of the Constitution of the United States, has as its central theme the essential equality of all citizens. Not only that, but America's defense of individual dignity and freedom has been the bulwark by which we have distinguished our country from every other nation in history. It would take hours, perhaps days, to quote all of the statements in defense of freedom and equality made by outstanding Americans from Thomas Jefferson to John F. Kennedy. The fact is, all leading American citizens, even the segregationists, have expressed a willingness to sacrifice everything on the altar of freedom and equality. Why then must an American citizen read Karl Marx or the speeches of Nikita Khrushchev in order to get the idea that freedom is a good thing and equality essential to human dignity!

The Question of Necessity Most segregationists would escape the challenge of a democratic education by pointing out that the only responsibility a society has is to provide "equal" education. They insist that this equality can take place on a segregated basis. They overlook the fact that even in 1896, when we were predominantly agrarian and when distance separated us from most other nations, there were leading Americans who said that the doctrine of "separate but equal" was undemocratic and an evil. Now that we are predominantly urban, and playing with intercontinental ballistic missiles with the same ease with which children play with toys, such a doctrine is not only unworkable domestically, but is unrealistic and dangerous in the world of nations.

There are many serious objections to the "separate but equal" doctrine. We need cite only three:

First, the South has made little or no attempt to make educational opportunities for Negroes equal to that provided for whites. The truth is, segregationists did not even give lip service to this doctrine until the May 17, 1954 Supreme Court decision was imminent.

Second, segregation, which presupposes inferiority, often has caused it, Negro children brought up in a segregated system of education have great difficulty in overcoming the "badge" of inferiority implied by such a system.

Third, it gives a false sense of superiority to the segregating group. Psychologists and psychiatrists are still not sure which group of children is most damaged by the system of segregation perpetuated in the South. Where Negro children are likely to develop feelings of inferiority, white children are often infected with delusions of grandeur. This feeling gives rise to the unmodest, unreligious ond undemocratic statements that otherwise intelligent white people frequently make when they say unashamedly that they belong to a "superior race."

The Question of Mental Ability It has never been proven that any one race is inherently superior to any other race. Of course, there have been many "logical" arguments for and against the superior race theory. Some segregationists still feign a belief in this pseudo-scientific racist "doctrine" in order to justify their prejudices and validate their anti-Negro, anti-democratic contentions. They have parroted this "doctrine" for so long and their arguments for white supremacy are worn so thin that they hardly convince even their most loyal and emotionally disturbed followers. In fact, the Negroes' achievements over the past two decades in many fields—including the most mentally exacting occupations—have been so notable that even the arch segregationist, Herman Talmadge of Georgia, admitted on a nationwide broadcast that he no longer believed that Negroes, as a race, are mentally inferior to whites.

It is generally agreed among reputable psychologists and sociologists that at the present time there is no "culture free" intelligence test in use. This means that "intelligence" tests measure not only "native" ability, but also learning. Examples of this are legion. The following are typical:

Rural children consistently make lower scores on "intelligence" tests than do children reared in cities.

Children selected at random from higher income or professional families as a rule make a considerably better showing on "intelligence" tests than do children who are economically and culturally deprived.

United States children, who have been trained to compete, always make higher scores than children from relatively non-competitive cultures such as we find in non-industrial societies.

Among twins, even identical twins, who are reared apart, we find that those reared in culturally "favorable" homes score much higher on "intelligence" tests than their counterparts who are reared in culturally "unfavorable" homes.

Northern whites consistently make higher "intelligence" scores than do southern whites.

Northern Negroes have always done markedly better on "intelligence" tests than have southern Negroes.

Negro soldiers from New York made higher average scores on the Army Alpha test than did white soldiers from certain southern states.

Perhaps the soundest conclusion on this issue was that of Dr. Otto Klineberg of Columbia University, one of the most respected psychologists in the world. He says that "there can be no doubt that an improvement in environment, with everything that this implies, can do a great deal to raise the intelligence-test scores."

Negroes, then, who have the largest proportion of their people in impoverished social and cultural environments, can be expected to make considerably lower scores, as a group, than members of the white race. Yet in both races we have both idiots and geniuses.

The Question of Academic Standards Because the South has traditionally provided inferior academic opportunities for Negro children, some Negro children are behind white children in academic development. Nobody denies this. As a matter of fact, this is the main reason why segregated education must go. The great fallacy in the segregationists' argument is this: They insist that because some Negro children do not measure up to the level of achievement of some white children, Negro children must continue to be subjected to lower educational standards. This is, of course, circular reasoning. There will always be inferior academic products so long as we tolerate inferior or segregated educational systems.

The basic consideration should not be a question of race, but of academic planning, because Negro parents are as anxious as are white parents that their children receive the best education available. This might mean the setting up of three school systems: one for superior students, one for mediocre or average students and one for slow learners. Or it might mean three different groupings within a single grade within the same school. But, whatever the system, it should have nothing to do with race.

Evidence bears out one definite fact: segregationists are not primarily interested in preserving academic standards. For example, if that were so, then they would have no objections to the enrollment of the several Negro students now qaulified for the Benjamin Franklin School for superior students in New Orleans.

The Question of Moral Standards Some segregationists attempt to frighten white parents by predicting that, when Negro children are permitted to attend schools with white children, moral standards will be lowered as a result. Negro leaders readily admit that juvenile delinquency is a serious problem in the Negro community, but they resent the suggestion that Negro youth have a monopoly in this regard. Every informed citizen knows that juvenile delinquency is a national problem of the first magnitude. It is not confined to any one section of the United States or to any one race. "Blackboard jungles" are not peculiar to the Negro community.

The Question of Health Standards It is likely that children who are born and reared in impoverished homes may have, on the whole, more days of sickness than do children from more fortunate environments. If this is so, then the problem of health should not be confused with that of segregation, because illness is a ubiquitous problem not confined to any racial group.

No parent wants his child to be exposed to contagious diseases. When children become infected with contagious diseases, we must necessarily find some way to isolate them, whether they are Negro or white. It is just as unfair to allow a Negro student to become infected by a Negro student as it is to allow a white student to become infected by Negro students. The problem is not one of race but of health regulations. These two issues must not be confused. Negro parents, therefore, join wholeheartedly with white parents in encouraging school officials to take every necessary precaution to prevent any child, regardless of race, from needless exposure to contagious diseases.

The Question of Negro-White Student Ratio One vocal member of the Orleans Parish School Board insists that, if integration of the public schools of New Orleans becomes a reality, every school in the city will eventually have more Negro students than white students enrolled. This statement is obviously intended to frighten white parents into believing that eventually they will have to send their children to "Negro schools."

I am sure that this distinguished citizen knows that this is a gross exaggeration. However, if this eventuality does become a reality, integrationists insist that the principle of equal educational opportunities not be compromised, and that white students who attend a school where the majority are Negroes not suffer academically. Besides, there is every reason to believe that white students have as much ability to adjust to new social situations as do Negro students. And, over the years, Negro students have attended, without noticeable ill effects, schools where they have often been outnumbered by white students a thousand to one. So, if we sincerely desire to equalize educational opportunities for our youth, it will make little difference whether the majority in a given school is made up of whites or Negroes.

The Question of Violence Segregationists seem to delight in frightening parents into believing that racial integration in our schools must necessarily lead to violence. This has been their most unfair and demagogic argument. This argument has been used to discourage desegregation in interstate transportation, street cars and buses, recreational facilities and even professional societies. The truth is, violence has never occurred except when a few white segregationists have deliberately inspired it. This was certainly the case when public schools were desegregated in New Orleans on November 14, 1960.

In the first place, five- and six-year olds hardly feel so strongly about "sacred" southern traditions that they are willing to become bloody about them.

In the second place, this argument is unfair to the ethical and moral teachings of our churches and parents. It suggests that little real effort has been made to instill in our youth the love for fellow men and the impracticality of violence which Jesus Christ demonstrated in both His teachings and death.

A third indication that this argument is fallacious is that one of the most heroic pages in the history of our country is the story of the bravery, courage and tolerance manifested by Negro children in their fight for freedom during the last six years. Some of them have been spit upon, insulted, beaten and jailed, but they did not retaliate. There is reason to believe that there is the same potential courage, tolerance and morality among white youth.

The Question of the Legality of the May 17, 1954 United States Supreme Court Decision On May 17, 1954 the United States Supreme Court in Brown v. Topeka unanimously decided that segregation in public education deprives Negroes of the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the 14th Amendment. Furthermore, the Justices quoted with approval a lower court holding:

> Segregation of white and colored children in public schools has a detrimental effect upon the colored children. The impact is greater when it has the sanction of the law; for the policy of separating the races is usually interpreted as denoting the inferiority of the Negro group. A sense of inferiority affects the motivation of a child to learn. Segregation with the sanction of law, therefore, has a tendency to [retard] the education and mental development of Negro children and to deprive them of some of the benefits they would receive in a racial[ly] integrated school system.

Segregationists are loud in denunciation of this decision. Most of them insist that it is not the "Law of the Land." Some even advocate open defiance. Public officials have been known to encourage white people to defy all court orders designed to implement this decision. They have lauded the "character and courage" of those who participate in riots calculated to frustrate federal court integration orders. Even the most "liberal" elected officials representing the South advocate the use of all "legal" means to circumvent this decision. Indeed, this was the intent of the "Southern Manifesto," signed by 96 southern congressmen, and has been the theme, in recent years, in all southern legislatures, where hundreds of anti-integration laws have been passed.

Segregationists give many reasons for defying the 1954 decision. Some of their denunciations are pretty farfetched. They claim that the 14th Amendment itself is unconstitutional because it has not been properly ratified; that Brown v. Topeka was a "political decision"; that it was more legislative than judicial; that it was Communist-inspired and, above all, that psychological and sociological interpretations overshadowed strictly legal precedents.

The integrationists do not minimize the "psychological and sociological" overtones of this decision. Indeed, they contend that all laws should be based upon such facts, that when any law is devoid of humanistic and scientific considerations it is likely to be unjust or, at best, sterile. All laws in a democratic society should reflect the enlightened national social consciousness. Only in this way can a government ensure the psychic health of individual citizens and the general welfare. This is precisely the basis upon which new laws are justified and old laws are modified or repealed. This is the genius of the flexible constitution under which our government operates: Orderly changes can be made when they are deemed necessary and right without total revolution.

The cardinal principle of Americanism is this: Laws in themselves are not sacred, but are designed to protect sacred principles—freedom, equality and individual dignity. Therefore, laws may be repealed when necessary, but these principles must be preserved at all costs.

Although segregationists deny the propriety of the court's consideration of psychological and sociological principles when civil rights of Negroes are concerned, they quickly invoke them when their own privileges are challenged. For example, in each of the questions raised in this paper, except the question of "states rights," the basic arguments against racial integration presented by the white supremacists are inherently psychological and sociological. The segregationists are caught in a strange dilemma, dramatically highlighted in a statement made by Attorney Wade Heaton. In his argument begging the U. S. Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals to preserve segregation in the public schools of East Baton Rouge and St. Helena Parishes and in the six Louisiana trade schools, he pleaded that the court should "take into consideration psychological and sociological" factors.

The Question of Interracial Marriage It is not easy to understand or analyze the emotional content which the concept of interracial marriage has for white supremacists. There are, however, some suggestive explanations:

1. Some scholars hold that there are white people who actually believe in the myths of "racial purity" and "racial superiority." These beliefs persist despite the fact that racial "mixing" has been going on for thousands of years, and all races are "mixed." There is no "pure" race. Furthermore, there is no scientific evidence that biological or cultural ill effects have accrued from it.

2. Another plausible explanation is that white supremacists have ironically "over-advertised" the virility of the Negro man. Their own fabricated image of a super-sexed Negro male has been so thoroughly propagandized that, like a Frankenstein monster, it functions to threaten the security of its white creators. Thus, it is not uncommon for apparently logical white men to fall victims to an obviously illogical system of contradictions. On the one hand, they argue that the "big, black, burly Negro" is little more than a "beast," and completely undesirable. On the other hand, they hold, just as strongly, that if white women are allowed to come into social contact with Negro men, a dangerously large number of them will willingly choose Negro mates in preference to white mates.

3. Because southern white men have historically exploited the Negro female, some scholars have suggested that white males have developed an unconscious sense of guilt. They reason that this guilt feeling has become the center of a fear complex in which some white men actually imagine that somehow the Negro male will get revenge by marrying their daughters.

Whatever may be the explanation, white supremacists tend to react violently and illogically when interracial marriage is discussed. All of the unfounded fears associated with race relations come to focus in this concept. Their avowed fear that there will be wholesale marriages between Negro men and white women is so real to them that it is used to defend the most drastic measures to keep Negroes in their so-called "place." It is the basis upon which they justify economic discrimination, inadequate housing, the barring of Negroes from public-supported facilities, discrimination in public transportation, inequalities in educational opportunities, disfranchisement and the withholding of the right to equal communication facilities.

Perhaps the basic fact overlooked is this: according to Western tradition, particularly in the United States, every individual is free to choose his own mate. Therefore, when an individual is willing to risk the inconveniences and social ostracism that may be attendant upon interracial marriage, he has the right to do so. Nevertheless, this fact is clear: So long as race is regarded as an important value, as it is today in our society, there will continue to be very little cause for alarm over the number of interracial marriages that will take place. Conversely, when race ceases to have this enhanced social value or to carry special privileges and special disadvantages, then it will really make little difference whether one marries a Negro or white person of his own choosing.

WHAT, THEREFORE, IS THE CASE FOR INTEGRATION? Stated simply, it is this: No people, regardless of race, can develop their fullest potentials in social isolation. All great civilizations, all rich cultures and all truly great men have achieved their greatness as a result of maximum exposure to the cultures and achievements of other peoples and individuals. They have developed at the "crossroads" of history, where varied traditions, customs and ideas are blended.

The system of racial segregation in American society is specifically designed to isolate Negroes from contacts with other racial groups. This racial apartheid restricts the social, cultural and psychological development of Negroes. Yet even a superficial knowledge of southern history reveals that white people also suffer. Their humanistic outlook and psychological development have been blunted by the doctrine and practices of social separation. This is convincingly evidenced by southern traditions that condone oppressive legislation, differential administration of justice and outright mob rule.

CONCLUSION

The Negro realizes that if he is to develop to full measure his several talents, it is necessary that he, like members of other racial groups, have an opportunity to grow in all directions, unrestricted by so-called "sacred" southern traditions, "black codes" or psychological restraints. In other words, he must be able to enter the main stream of world culture with the same protection, opportunities and incentives as other free individuals with whom he must inevitably compete. He knows full well that with the transcendence of geographical barriers, he is, whether he desires it or not, a citizen of the world. He claims, therefore, the heritage bequeathed to men everywhere—the right to "LIFE, LIBERTY, AND THE PURSUIT OF HAPPINESS." Not only does the Negro need freedom in order to develop his fullest potential, but his talents are desperately needed by our country today in its struggle for political, economic and ideological leadership in the world of nations. The fact was given focus in 1954 when the Supreme Court of the United States unanimously held that education "is required in the performance of our most basic public responsibilities, even service in the Armed Forces . . . . It is the very foundation of good citizenship."

When, therefore, is the time to end oppression, degradation, segregation, discrimination and the withholding of inalienable rights? History, sound government and conscience all testify that THE TIME IS NOW. Justice is not a commodity whose attainment can be postponed. Right cannot be silenced by expediency. Evil cannot be given the sanction of legitimacy. And, finally, one sure fact of history should guide the United States and each individual citizen in whatever deliberations are undertaken: "Righteousness exalteth a nation, but sin is a reproach to any people."

YOUR RIGHTS

Federal Labor Management Law specifically gives you the right to organize into a Union. It also gives you the right to operate the union without interference from the employer. These rights are further enforced by your CWA contract. Because of the law and the contract, we have the machinery through which to organize. We can:

1. Appoint stewards as required to carry on organizing activities.
2. Talk union on the job on the same terms as you would talk about anything else, provided that we do not interfere with the work operation or violate accepted company rules.
3. Pass out handbills to people whom our Union represents.
4. Use bulletin boards for organizing activities within the limits permitted by our contract.
5. Sign up nonmembers on nonwork time, on company property, in nonwork areas, provided that we do not interfere with work operations.

These are our rights and when properly exercised, make it possible for us to carry out our Union obligation to sign the nonmembers into CWA.

How to analyze the nonmember's attitude

1. Get his or her background.
2. Get his or her relationship with the Union and fellow workers.
3. Get his or her relationship with the Company.

Based on this information we can fit the facts together and analyze for ourselves the nonmember's attitude. From this analysis we can then devise a proper approach for each individual in an attempt to change their attitude.

APPROACH

Based on facts about the individual's personality and should be personal, friendly and courteous.

There should be no arguments with nonmembers. No matter what reception may be obtained from any individual nonmember, the Union representative should remain friendly. What we want to do is contact as many nonmembers as possible and urge them to sign. Many will sign just because we have contacted them. If any want to discuss the matter, take time out for friendly discussion.

SAMPLE CASE

Betty Jones is an operator. She has been with the Company for one year. She worked for the Company five years ago for a short period. She said, "I didn't belong to the Union then; why should I belong now?" She goes on to tell you that she doesn't see any point in paying dues, that you don't get anything for your money, and besides she came to work to make money to help support her family and she would rather spend the money on something for her family than on Union dues. She says, "I don't have anything against the Union, some of my best friends are members," and that her husband is a member of another Union. "But I don't see any reason why I should join, and besides my immediate supervisor is very nice to me, and also that all the girls seem to like me."

1. What is her background? _____

2. What is her relationship with the Union (fellow workers)? _____

3. What is her relationship with the Company? _____

APPROACH _____

REAL CASE

HOW TO ANALYZE THE NONMEMBER'S ATTITUDE

1. What is his or her background?

2. What is his or her relationship with the Union (fellow workers)?

REAL CASE

2. What is his or her relationship with the Union (fellow workers)?

APPROACH

STEWARD'S SYSTEM

The basic machinery for signing up the nonmember is and must be the steward system. There are, however, special situations in which other methods must be employed. These special methods must be viewed as supplementary to the steward system and not a substitute for it.

ORGANIZING GUIDES

1. Keep a record of the nonmembers in your group.
2. New employees should be contacted immediately upon coming to work.
3. Contact each nonmember as often as possible.
4. Be friendly and courteous. Never argue, but discuss ways he or she should join.
5. Be informed about CWA. If a person asks you a question that you cannot answer, do not try to bluff. Be honest and say you don't know, but then make it your business to get the answer and report back to the person.
6. Talk the Union up on the Job. Have an adequate supply of CWA literature.
7. Follow up your contacts. If a person wants to think it over, go back for his or her decision.
8. Seek assistance. Pass your problem nonmembers on to the Organizing Committee or local officers for further contact.
9. Examine all anti-union attitudes. Use the analyzing technique you have been trained in and develop a proper approach for each individual nonmember.
10. To organize effectively you must be well informed about CWA and believe in CWA. Remember that your personal convictions are the most effective way of convincing other employees to become members.

Tell them why you belong, and what CWA means to you!

Help yourself and your fellow workers by building CWA

From the Offices of:

SENATOR JACOB K. JAVITS (R-N.Y.)
SENATOR CLIFFORD P. CASE (R-N.J.)
SENATOR HUGH SCOTT (R-PA.)

FOR RELEASE FRIDAY AMs
DECEMBER 31, 1965

3 REPUBLICAN SENATORS URGE PRESIDENTIAL DECREE ON HOUSING DISCRIMINATIONS

Three Republican Senators today called upon President Johnson to issue a new Executive Order Against Discimination which would broaden its impact to all Federally-assisted housing. At the same time, they deplored reported Adminstration plans to send to Congress a bill to broaden the 1962 Executive Order Against Discrimination in Housing, instead of issuing a new executive order. They called the reported request for legislation "wholly unnecessary" and said it would "needlessly delay" an effective Federal policy against racial prejudice in housing.

The three Senators -- Senator Jacob K. Javits of New York, Senator Clifford P. Case of New Jersey and Senator Hugh Scott of Pennsylvania -- issued this statement:

"We are deeply concerned about the recent published reports that Attorney General Katzenbach has recommended to the President that he should not issue an Executive Order expanding the coverage of the 1962 Executive Order Against Discrimination in Housing, and that the Administration is now considering instead sending a bill to Congress for this purpose. In our view, such legislation is wholly unnecessary since the President has constitutional power to amend the Executive Order already in effect. A request to Congress for such legislation would needlessly delay the development of an effective Federal policy against racial discimination in housing.

"Despite all our efforts up to now, racial ghettos continue undeniably to be a higher corrosive influence in our cities and towns and are to a significant extent the result of a racially disciminatory housing market. President Kennedy's 1962 Housing Order was a valuable first step forward, but because it covered only FHA-and VA-financed housing, built or contracted for after November 20, 1962, it presently reaches only approximately twenty-five percent of the Nation's Federally-assisted housing supply and only about eighteen percent of the total new housing supply; the remainder includes a large percentage of conventional mortgages issued by lending institutions whose deposits are guaranteed by United States Government agencies.

"A newly expanded housing order would have a significant impact only if it covered all housing assisted by the Federal Government, including housing conventionally financed through lending institutions whose accounts are guaranteed by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation or the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation or which are supervised by the Federal Home Loan Bank System. Such a broadened order should also cover all Federally-aided housing built or contracted prior to the November 20, 1962 cut-off date in the present Order.

"The constitutional basis for reaching all Federal funding and support in housing by Executive Order is the same as in the case of the existing Executive Order. The moral and constitutional bases for doing so are an integral part of the great civil rights reform of the last decade. It would be tragic to delay further the effectiveness of the Federal anti-discrimination policy in housing."

MISSISSIPPI POWER STRUCTURE -- THE POWER OF THE DIXIECRATS

Introduction: Let's see what we have learned so far. We know that Negroes and whites live differently in both the South and the North and that Negroes are not given equal treatment in housing, education, etc. We know that although it seems that white people have better schools, for instance, that they pay for it by learning lies, and by learning to "hate" and be afraid. We know that we are misled by these lies too--that the myths have taught us to believe that we are inferior and dumb and that we have made no contributions to our society.

Now we want to find out why the schools tell these lies and find out who is helped by these lies.

Idea: That the myths serve a purpose by:
1. Keeping Negroes down and teaching whites to feel superior.
2. Providing an excuse for race relations in this country.

Question: Why do the schools tell these lies?
Who hears and believes them? What do they believe?
How does it make them feel to believe these things?
Do the lies give them excuses? What kinds of excuses do the lies provide:
If a white man kills a Negro?
If a policeman beats a Negro for demonstrating?
If a policeman beats a white demonstrator?
If a Negro is refused the vote?
If Negroes try to integrate a school?
If Negroes are paid less money for the same work?
If white workers want to start a union?

Now who profits by these lies? Let's start here in your town.

Idea: That same people profit by the telling of myths (make money, gain power, build up their egos, etc.).

Ask students about plantations near where they live; about factories near where they live.

Question: Who makes money when Negroes are paid less than white people?

Example: A cotton farmer's profit is the price he gets for his cotton minus what he pays for labor. Does the farmer make more money if the workers he hires are Negro? Why? Is it profitable for the farmer to keep Negro labor cheap? How does he do it? Do the myths help him do it? How?

Example: Why does northern industry come to Mississippi? They come from the North because Mississippi has cheaper labor and they can make more money. Why does Mississippi have cheaper labor? Because there are no unions? Because then there are white workers in Mississippi who are told that unions believe in integration. Where there are no unions, the workers are paid less and the businessman makes more money. Do the myths help to keep the salaries low for whites too? (Caution: many unions maintain segregationist practices.)

QUESTION: Why don't white people want the Negro to vote?

Example: The same farmer is able to pay Negroes less money than white people are paid because the state laws of Mississippi support segregation and inequality. Who makes these laws? How do they get their jobs? Who elects them? What would happen to these men and these laws if Negroes voted? Would you vote for a man who made laws that paid you less? Does the farmer vote for them? Does the business man? Do white workers? Why?

Idea: That poor whites suffer from the myths, too.

QUESTIONS: If there was a union, the white workers would make more money too. Why, then, do they vote for policicians who are against unions? Are they more afraid of something else? Why are they so afraid of integration? What have the myths and lies that they have learned done to them? Who profits by this? The rich farmer? The rich businessman? How?

Idea: That the police work for the power structure and enforce the status quo.

Example: The following is an excerpt from one of Franklin D. Roosevelt's press conferences in 1938, when he unsuccessfully attempted to purge Southern reactionaries from the Democratic Party. Roosevelt described the experience of union organizers in a Southern town in a way that makes one think of the Movement today:

> They got in town about ten o'clock in the morning. They had a list of eight or ten of the operators. They were going to see them at the noon hour.
> So they went to the factory and they asked, "Where is so and so? Where can I find so and so?"
> They were engaged in asking questions, when one of the mill police tapped him on the shoulder and showed his badge and said, "Come with me."
> He said, "We have not done anything; we are outside and on the street and just asking to see some fellows."
> "Oh, we know; come with me."
> They were taken to the police station and locked up in a cell on the charge of vagrancy. Both of them had, oh, fifteen or twenty dollars apiece in their clothes.
> They said, "We are not vagrants; we come down here from such and such a city."
> "But you are organizers."
> "Of course we are organizers."
> "Well, you are in a bad place."

They were kept in jail until five o'clock, just before dark, and the judge came in and said, "What are you doing here?"

"We are down here to try to start an organization of the textile workers of this mill."

"That is what you think," he said, "Ten dollars fine and out of town before six o'clock, and do not come back."

They did not know what they were fined for, but they paid the fine, and as they went out of the courtroom, one of the marshalls, or policemen, went up to them and said, "Which way are you boys going"? They said, "We have got to get out of town and we thought we would go to such and such a town, ten miles away."

They rode with him and he said, "This is where I turn off." They went about a quarter of a mile out of a clump of bushes came some men with blackjacks and they got the worst beating up that any two people could get without getting killed.

QUESTION: Who helps to keep the Negro from voting and the union from starting? Who helps the farmer and businessman make money by enforcing the segregation laws? Who pays the police? Who gives them their orders? Why? What would happen to a policeman who didn't obey orders? Why do the police follow orders? Important to bring out:

1. for pay
2. for illicit gains in graft, etc.
3. because they have learned the myths too, and "hate" "fear".

What is a power structure? That is the name we give to groups of men who make the myths, who profit from them like the farmer and the businessman, who pay the police and give them their orders, who make the laws and decide what laws they want, who make decisions about who gets paid and how much they get, about who votes and who doesn't vote, about what is taught in the schools, and what gets printed in the newspapers, etc.

Can you name some of these men in your town? (Suggestion: look for the mayor, big plantation owners, businessmen, plant managers, mill owners, etc.)

Suggestion: With the information you get from either students, parents or COFO staff research, construct an organizational chart of the power structure on the blackboard or large paper.

Show how a decision made on the upper level gets passed down through the chain of command and finally carried out.

Dramatize if possible.

Example: A Negro tries to register. The registrar of voters fails him, and calls the Mayor. The next day the plantation owner fires him and orders him off the land, and his name is published in the newspaper. The bank forecloses on his car, and the store refuses him any more credit and the county welfare department says he must get three references from white people before he is eligible for relief. His wife is fired from her job as a cook for a white family. When they move in with relatives, the house is shot up one night and the Negro man arrested on "suspicion."

Idea: That the Power Structure is a connecting and interlocking series of groups that goes from local towns and cities up the highest levels of the national government.

Case study: The Power of the Dixiecrats

We have seen that there is what we call a power structure in this town--a small group of men that make the decisions in this town--they run it, they decide when schools are built and what is taught. They decide, as much as they can, who votes and who doesn't, they decide who gets a loan from the bank, they make the laws. In every other town and county of this state, there are other men who do the same things--who make the plans and decide what will happen for all the rest of us. They decide who will run for the United States Congress, they decide who will run for the Mississippi Legislature; they pay for the campaigns, they decide what laws will be made, and they help to make the myths that all learn.

Southern representatives in Congress, acting on behalf of the Southern power structure, obstruct progress not only in the South but in the whole nation. Because of the one-party system in the South these representatives serve in the House and Senate over and over again. Their seniority enables them to become chairmen of key committees. Example: Senator Eastland of Mississippi is the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee influences the appointment of judges to the Federal courts in which civil rights demonstrators are tried.

Natchez Political Handbook

By Alexander Shimkin

QUITE A LOT OF PEOPLE HAVE REGISTERED TO VOTE. NOW WE MUST KNOW HOW TO BEST USE THOSE BALLOTS. WE ALSO MUST BE ABLE TO PARTICIPATE IN POLITICS AT ALL LEVELS. LET US TAKE A LOOK AT THE POLITICAL STRUCTURE THAT AFFECTS US.

The Federal Government and Mississippi

The federal government is important in several ways:

1. Congress provides almost all the funds for welfare services in the state.

2. The federal courts decide on most of the cases involving demonstrations (such as picketing and parading without a permit), school desegregation, and voting. They also decide how the state will be divided up for purposes of representation.

3. The Justice Department is supposed to bring the cases to the federal courts whenever federal laws are involved. The Federal Bureau of Investigation is supposed to investigate crimes to see if civil rights are involved. The attorney general sends federal voter registrars into counties where he thinks they are needed.

4. The Office of Economic Opportunity manages the funds for the poverty program.

Over 75 per cent of the money the state gets for welfare programs like aid to dependent children and old age assistance comes from the federal government. The funds are given out by the U.S. Congress. School districts also receive federal funds, but first they must sign a compliance pledge which says they promise to desegregate their schools. Under the 1964 Civil Rights Act, school districts must sign these pledges to continue receiving money from the federal government. However, only token integration has followed these pledges in many places.

THE PEOPLE WHO REPRESENT MISSISSIPPI DON'T REPRESENT US!!!!!!

The U.S. Congress includes two Senators from Mississippi and five Congressmen. The two Senators are James O. Eastland and John C. Stennis. The city of Natchez is in the 3rd Congressional District, which also includes Jackson, McComb and Vicksburg. John Bell Williams is the Congressman from the 3rd district. He is an extreme conservative and segregationist and has opposed all welfare, poverty, labor and civil rights programs.

Williams has been in the House of Representatives since 1946 and has been very active in blocking HOME RULE for the District of Columbia--which has a Negro majority. Thus by getting rid of him, Negroes in other parts of the country can also be freed. Next year Senator Eastland and Rep. Williams come up for re-election. BOTH ARE ENEMIES OF BLACK PEOPLE AND POOR PEOPLE AND SHOULD BE DEFEATED AND REPLACED BY GOOD CANDIDATES.

Judge Cox is the federal judge for the Southern District of Mississippi. He is very conservative and has only half-heartedly supported the law. The 5th Circuit Court of Appeals in next above Judge Cox. Fortunately the judges on this court are much better. The president appoints judges to please the Senators. That is why J.P. Coleman, a former governor of Mississippi, was appointed to the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals this year although he is a segregationist.

But the federal courts have time and again (after people have been arrested) upheld the right of people to march two by two on the sidewalk, to picket, to hand out leaflets and so forth. Therefore it is clear that the various laws and ordinances forbidding this or saying that you must have a permit are no good and no attention should be paid to them--EVEN IF YOU HAVE TO GO TO JAIL TO GET THEM THROWN OUT.

The attorney general of the United States is Nicholas Katzenbach. He has been rather slow appointing federal registrars to Mississippi, although he did send a letter to all registrars saying that illiterate people should be registered. John Doar is head of the Civil Rights Division and and Wiley Branton is in charge of voting rights. Under the 1965 Voting Rights Act, the attorney general has the power to send a federal registrar into a county to register people if he (the attorney general) receives 20 complaints and judges it necessary.

The State Government

The government of Mississippi is very old-fashioned and complicated. Therefore we will talk about only three officials, two agencies and the legislature.

The governor of Mississippi is Paul B. Johnson. He is a lawyer from Hattiesburg and was Ross Barnett's lieutenant governor. The governor is elected through the Democratic primary. However, the Republican Party has become much stronger and this may change. The first primary is held on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in August every four years. The last election was in 1963 so the next one will be in 1967. If no candidate gets a majority in the first election, then a second primary is held three weeks later. The general election is held the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November and is just a courtesy vote.

GOVERNOR JOHNSON IS A RACIST WHO WAS ELECTED ON THE BASIS OF DEFIANCE OF FEDERAL AUTHORITY. LATELY HE HAS TRIED TO PROJECT A "MODERATE" LAW-ABIDING IMAGE WHILE DOING EVERYTHING IN HIS POWER TO KEEP NEGROES DOWN. The lieutenant governor is Carroll Gartin. The other important official is Joseph T. Patterson who is the attorney general. Patterson recently sent a letter to all county registrars telling them not to register illiterate people under the 1965 Mississippi voting legislation. He did this to keep Negroes from becoming registered voters.

The most important agency of the state is the Agriculture and Industry Board. Almost all the important industry in the state is owned by stockholders in the North. Therefore it is necessary to attract Northern companies by various schemes. The A.& I. Board is responsible for this. Local communities can issue bonds to build factories and lease them to Northern industry upon approval of the Board and the voters. THE BOARD HAS BEEN RESPONSIBLE FOR MUCH OF THE ECONOMIC POLICY OF THE STATE, WHICH IS TO KEEP WAGES LOW, KEEP UNIONS OUT AND GIVE ALL SORTS OF TAX BREAKS TO INDUSTRY. Important businessmen and state officials make up the Board.

The legislature of Mississippi consists of a Senate with 52 members and a House of 122. The members are elected for four year terms at the same time as the governor. The legislature meets in regular session in even-numbered years from January until about June. Each House is the judge of the qualifications and election of its members. A member of the House must be 21, a registered voter, and have lived in the state four years and in his county two years. A member of the Senate must have been a registered voter for four years and a member of the district from which he was elected for two years. Natchez has one representative all to itself. He is John R. Junkin. Adams County has one from outside of Natchez. He is Adrian Lee. Adams County also elects Senator Marion Smith. Although all are supposed to be Democrats, at least two (Smith and Lee) actively supported Goldwater in 1964.

The Mississippi legislature is very confusing. Many members are only there for one term, and in recent years the only activity has been fighting integration. A great many legislators are members of the Citizens' Council, including the presiding officer of the Senate, Senator Yarbrough. The governor may call a special session to consider only such matter as he specifies in his proclamation calling for the session. A special session was held this year to get around the 1965 Voting Rights Act. It resulted in the six-question form for voter registration. No one said they were in favor of Negroes voting; rather it was a question what would be the best way to keep Negroes from voting. All bills must be referred to a committee of each House and returned from there with a recommendation in writing before they can be passed into law. There are many committees. State legislators are mostly lawyers or farmers and the present lot is pretty hopeless. The legislature is only in session about a quarter of the time, so the governor and other state officers run things the rest of the time, both through the laws and through the medium of addresses and press conferences which are very important in forming public opinion.

THE GOVERNOR HAS CHARGE OF THE NATIONAL GUARD AND ALSO OF THE 475-MAN HIGHWAY PATROL, WHICH HE USES TO TRY TO STOP DEMONSTRATIONS WHEN HE FEELS IT IS NECESSARY.

Party Organization in Mississippi

Many states have their party organization only by custom. In Mississippi the law is rather definite about the matter. The party organization is important because it is the means by which delegates to the presidential convention are selected. It judges whether candidates have qualified to run in the primaries and whether they have won. It also adopts statements of principle or party platforms which are supposed to be followed by party members.

In Presidential election years, the whole apparatus is involved. The lowest level is the precinct convention. The electors of each precinct meet at 10 a.m. at the usual voting place on the date fixed by the state executive committee or chairman. They elect delegates to the county convention by secret ballot. The county executive committee fixes the mumber of delegates to be elected to the county convention.

Democratic National Convention

The county convention meets at the county seat on a day fixed by the state executive committee or chairman to select a county executive committee and elect delegates to the state convention. The 1964 county convention elected 25 delegates to the state convention.

State Convention

(Although in theory ordinary people are allowed to participate, let's look who went from Adams County: The chancery clerk, sheriff, circuit clerk, tax assessor, four members of the board of supervisors, the J.P. for the 4th district, the state senator and two state representatives, the city attorney, an alderman, five attorneys, the director of the Natchez-Adams Co. Port Commission, a cattleman, a doctor, an insurance man and a businessman. All were white men.)

District Caucuses

Delegates to the state convention hold district caucuses by congressional district either before or during the state convention. The delegates elect the party's state executive committee and the congressional district delegates to the national convention.

County Conventions

The state convention meets at the Capitol on a date fixed by the state executive committee or chairman to select delegates to the party's national convention, adopt a platform, nominate presidential electors and elect a national committeeman and committeewoman to represent Mississippi in national party affairs.

Precinct Meetings

The county executive committee consists of three members from each supervisors district of which there are five in each county. The committee may also add three at large if it wants to. In the regular Democratic Party, this organization does not have much importance outside of elections.

In order to be a candidate, you file with the committee at least 60 days before the date of the first primary (except in municipal election, where you file 30 days before) and pay a filing fee fixed by the party committee. When only one candidate has filed for the primary within the time limit, the party executive committee may declare the nominee elected without a primary.

NEGROES IN MISSISSIPPI IN 1964 WERE NOT ALLOWED TO TAKE PART IN THIS PROCESS. THEREFORE AT ATLANTIC CITY AT THE NATIONAL DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION, THEY CHALLENGED THE REGULAR DEMOCRATIC DELEGATION ON THE GROUNDS THAT NEGROES WERE NOT ALLOWED TO PARTICIPATE. THE WHOLE SYSTEM, IF FACT, IS DESIGNED FOR WHITES ONLY. HOWEVER, IN 1968 THE DELEGATION FROM MISSISSIPPI MUST HAVE SOME NEGROES. At the 1964 presidential convention in Atlantic City, only a handful of delegates supported President Johnson. During the campaign, local attorney Fred C. Berger argued for LBJ by saying Goldwater was an integrationist. In November, the vote was 5,900 for Goldwater and 1,093 for Johnson.

Local Government

The government of Adams County is basically controlled by five supervisors. There is one supervisor elected from each beat or district of the county. The supervisors must own $300 in real property (like a house and land). They set local taxes, are in charge of road maintenance and repair, appoint certain officials, and pass various rules. The powers of the supervisors are very wide, but supervisors are not very well known to the community. The board members usually are in office for many years. They are elected at the same time as the governor.

Manchester Guardian
"Well what do you know, it does say something about Race, Color or Creed."

IT WOULD BE VERY GOOD IF ONE OR TWO NEGROES COULD BE ELECTED SUPERVISORS. THE BOARD MEETS AT THE COUNTY COURTHOUSE ON THE FIRST MONDAY OF EVERY MONTH. IT MIGHT BE A GOOD IDEA TO ATTEND THE MEETING SOMETIME. The sheriff is the chief officer of the board. He collects taxes and also enforces the law. Sheriffs can only serve one term of office. They are usually very rich. Some have incomes of over $50,000 a year. The sheriffs want to change the law so they can stay in office for as long as they can.

Each beat also elects a constable and a J.P. The constable ranks as a deputy sheriff and is the lowest law enforcement officer in the county system.

The municipal or city government of Natchez is the one which we know best. Basically it consists of a mayor and six aldermen. Mayor Nosser was elected last year (1964) for a four year term in a very close race. He received 2,097 votes to 1,819 for John T. Green. The vote was as follows:

	Nosser	Green
1st Ward	273	185
2nd Ward	361	189
3rd Ward	265	222
4th Ward	336	320
5th Ward	421	420

NOSSER WON THE ELECTION WITH THE HELP OF NEGRO VOTERS. WHAT DID NEGROES GET IN RETURN? YOU CAN ANSWER THAT YOURSELF!!!

The aldermen and their jobs are as follows:

1st - Randall Ferguson, salesman for Armstrong Tire Company
2nd - Otis C. Montgomery, owner of J.N. Ratliff & Son Monuments
3rd - Ralph Sayers, retired
4th - Thomas J. Reed, industrial relations manager for Johns-Manville Corp.
5th - Louis Willard, Natchez Gravel Corp.
6th - Hall Wilson, Wilson and O'Farrell realtors

They can be said to represent the business interests of the city.

In the municipal separate district type of educational organization, the governing authorities of the city appoint the trustees. R. Brent Forman is the chairman of the Board of Education. He is also a dirctor of City Bank and Trust Company. The school board accepted the loss of federal funds rather than desegregate. The matter is in the courts.

The Chief of Police is elected. However, the policemen in the department are under civil service. This has both advantages and disadvantages. While it is harder for racist police to be removed, it should make them more professional.

Discussion Questions

This is only a bare outline of the government of Mississippi. As Negroes begin to have the power of the vote, we must ask how to use it, and how to participate. Only whites who are at least in public segregationists hold public positions. Although "moderate" whites want compliance with the law in order to obtain federal funds and to attract more Northern industry to Mississippi, few Mississippians have taken a firm stand for equality. Because of the emergence of the Negro vote and of the popularity in Mississippi of Goldwater Republicanism, the future of the Democratic Party in the state is an open question.

What should Negroes do?

RUN THEIR OWN CANDIDATES?

FORM A COALITION? WITH WHOM?

USE A SWING VOTE?

13. WORKSHOPS ARE SCHEDULED AND PLANNED FOR ADULTS. CHILDREN DO NOT ATTEND WORKSHOP SESSIONS. THEY ARE WELCOME, HOWEVER, AT EVENING PROGRAMS.

14. VISITORS AT DORCHESTER FOLLOW THE DAILY WORKSHOP SCHEDULE AND ARE ASKED TO OBSERVE THE REGULATIONS WHICH APPLY TO WORKSHOP PARTICIPANTS.

RESPONSIBILITIES OF TEACHERS AND SUPERVISORS

THE RESPONSIBILITIES OF THE TEACHER ARE:

1. To teach the class;
2. To decide (with the help of the supervisor) what kinds and what quantities of educational material are needed;
3. To assist his students in the community activities which will be carried on throughout the year;
4. To assist the supervisor in recruiting (if necessary).

THE RESPONSIBILITIES OF THE SUPERVISOR ARE:

1. To recruit students for classes;
2. To arrange places for schools to meet;
3. To organize the schools in his area;
4. To help the teacher decide upon material and equipment, and the quantities needed;
5. To advise teachers on class programs and community activities;
6. To visit classes and supervise the work of teachers;
7. To coordinate the work of the area;
8. To plan the time of the year with the teacher (seasons when students are least busy on jobs).

The supervisor will be expected to attend, with the teachers in his area, a one-week training workshop and a weekend refresher workshop, the latter being scheduled within a reasonable length of time after his Citizenship Schools are underway.

HELPFUL HINTS IN TEACHING CITIZENSHIP CLASS

1. Read carefully material you received at workshop entitled: Suggestions for Teachers:

2. The following materials can be used for lessons in Reading and Citizenship:

   a. Your voter registration form.
      Members learn words from this form, meanings, spelling, etc., as well as how to fill them out.

   b. The Citizenship School Workbook
      Use as a guide in reading and writing lessons.

   c. Why Vote pamphlet
      Use in basic political education lessons.

   d. Newspapers
      Have members bring papers to class.
      Select articles to read and evaluate.
      Have class decide whether article is fairly written or gives a prejudiced view.
      Help class learn to determine editorial policy: (Is the paper generally prejudiced? What and where is the editorial page?)

   e. Magazine articles of importance

   f. The Constitution
      Study amendments relevant to the present condition and work of our people: 14th Amendment, 1st Amendment, the 15th Amendment. Make copies for class or order from S.C.L.C. Citizenship School Staff.

   g. Pamphlets and brochures from social service agencies:
      Tax office
      Social Security Office
      Public Health Department: Have class find out what free services are available and where and when.
      (These offices will provide staff to come to your class for a talk on their department.)

   h. Government
      Get structure of government and those in office from properplace, probably the Court House.

Citizenship Education Material
Negro History

In order to appreciate ourselves and look hopefully to the future we need to know and understand our past. To love our country and feel at home we must know and appreciate the fact that we helped to build it.

As a beginning let us come to know a few of the many people of color who made significant contributions to the development of America. This is merely an introduction to some of them. Every Citizenship SchoolTeacher and student will want to pursue them further using school and public libraries and any other source they can find.

WILLIAM EDWARD BURGHARDT DUBOIS

W.E.B. DuBois was born three years after the Civil War on February 23, 1868 in Great Barrington, Massachusetts. He became a great Negro educator being the first of his race to earn the doctoral degree. He attended Fisk University in Nashville, Howard University studied in Europe and worked at Atlanta University. Dr.DuBois studied intensely about Africa and the slave trade; criticized Booker T. Washington; fought to outlaw discrimination in public places; fought for an anti-lynch law and to wipe out illiteracy; and campaigned for civil rights. Dr. DuBois along with being a great scholar wrote many books of renown and with great implications for the race problem in America. Some of them are listed here:

The Suppression of the African Slave Trade to the United States of America
The Philadelphia Negro
The Soul of Black Folk
John Brown
The Quest of the Silver Fleece
The Negro
Dark Warter
The Gift of Black Folk
Black Reconstruction
Color and Democracy
In Battle For Peace
The Black Flame
Black Folk Then and Now

RALPH J. BUNCHE

Dr. Bunche was born in Detroit, Michigan on August 7, 1904 of very poor parents. His parents died by the time he was twelve years old and his grandmother was responsible for his upbringing. She instilled within him a philosophy that has proved invaluable for his life's work. "Your color has nothing to do with your worth," she counseled, "You are potentially as good as anyone. How good you may prove to be will have no relation to your color, but what is in your heart and head."

Ralph Bunche was an excellent student graduating with high honors from high school, the University of California and Harvard. Dr. Bunche as a college student and teacher participated in picketing, boycotts and demonstrations for Negro equality. He gained renown as a historian. Working with the United Nations, Ralph Bunche made a name for himself as a peacemaker especially when he effected the Arab-Jewish Armistice. He also served as peacemaker for the U. N. in the Congo Crisis. He holds a position for the United States in the U. N. as Under-Secretary for special political affairs.

DANIEL HALE WILLIAMS

Dr. Williams was born in Pennsylvania in 1856. He worked and lived on steamships and became a barber where he talked with many famous persons including doctors. Daniel Hale's father had impressed upon him the importance of an education. He finally knew that his deepest hope was to become a doctor. He studied very hard attending Chicago Medical College.

Dr. Williams became famous as a surgeon performing his first operation on a kitchen table. He gained greatest fame after operating on the heart of a man who had been stabbed. Medical journals reported that this was the first successful operation of its kind. Dr. Williams made another notable contribution to medicine and the country when he established Provident Hospital especially in order to provide training and experience for Negro doctors and nurses. He died in 1926.

CHARLES RICHARD DREW

Dr. Charles Drew made an outstanding contribution to the field of medicine through his discovery of blood plasma. He was born in Washington, D.C. in 1904 and studied medicine at McGill University in Canada. Later he became very much interested in blood typing and transfusion and worked night and day in order to perfect the preservation of blood. For this work Dr. Drew became known as the "father of blood plasma," and Columbia University awarded him the doctorate degree in 1940.

The world benefited from Dr. Drew's discovery of ways to give blood to patients who needed it when the blood was several days old. Dr. Drew lost his job when he took a stand against some white citizens position that Negro and white blood should be separated. There was no scientific basis for this, he contended. Dr. Drew died from injuries received in an automobile accident near Burlington, N.C. was enroute to a doctors' conference at Tuskeegee Institute. It is reported that had it not been for segregated medical facilities Dr. Drew would have survived.

HELPFUL HINTS IN TEACHING CITIZENSHIP CLASS

1. Read carefully material you received at workshop entitled: Suggestions for Teachers:

2. The following materials can be used for lessons in Reading and Citizenship:

   a. Your voter registration form.
   Members learn words from this form, meanings, spelling, etc., as well as how to fill them out.

   b. The Citizenship School Workbook
   Use as a guide in reading and writing lessons.

   c. Why Vote pamphlet
   Use in basic political education lessons.

   d. Newspapers
   Have members bring papers to class.
   Select articles to read and evaluate.
   Have class decide whether article is fairly written or gives a prejudiced view.
   Help class learn to determine editorial policy: (Is the paper generally prejudiced? What and where is the editorial page?)

   e. Magazine articles of importance

   f. The Constitution
   Study amendments relevant to the present condition and work of our people: 14th Amendment, 1st Amendment, the 15th Amendment. Make copies for class or order from S.C.L.C. Citizenship School Staff.

   g. Pamphlets and brochures from social service agencies:
   Tax office
   Social Security Office
   Public Health Department: Have class find out what free services are available and where and when.
   (These offices will provide staff to come to your class for a talk on their department.)

   h. Government
   Get structure of government and those in office from properplace, probably the Court House.

RESPONSIBILITIES OF TEACHERS AND SUPERVISORS

THE RESPONSIBILITIES OF THE TEACHER ARE:

1. To teach the class;
2. To decide (with the help of the supervisor) what kinds and what quantities of educational material are needed;
3. To assist his students in the community activities which will be carried on throughout the year;
4. To assist the supervisor in recruiting (if necessary).

THE RESPONSIBILITIES OF THE SUPERVISOR ARE:

1. To recruit students for classes;
2. To arrange places for schools to meet;
3. To organize the schools in his area;
4. To help the teacher decide upon material and equipment, and the quantities needed;
5. To advise teachers on class programs and community activities;
6. To visit classes and supervise the work of teachers;
7. To coordinate the work of the area;
8. To plan the time of the year with the teacher (seasons when students are least busy on jobs).

The supervisor will be expected to attend, with the teachers in his area, a one-week training workshop and a weekend refresher workshop, the latter being scheduled within a reasonable length of time after his Citizenship Schools are underway.

SELECTION OF TEACHERS FOR CITIZENSHIP SCHOOLS

Persons selected as teachers can be ministers, business men or women, teachers, beauticians, or college students by profession. If persons with the following qualifications cannot be found within a community, someone with these qualifications should be selected from a near-by area who can go in to teach classes.

The teacher must be:

1. A man or woman 21 years of age or more who has had some high school education, or a college student;
2. A person who is able to read well aloud;
3. One who is able to write legibly on the blackboard.

The teacher must know or be able to find out:

1. The location of the registration board;
2. Days and hours that the board is open for registration;
3. Who are the local officials that are elected to office;
4. Time of year for elections;
5. Health services available;
6. Location of the social security office;
7. Location of the welfare department.

PRECINCT CONVENTIONS

What is a precinct?
It is the smallest political unit.
Everyone lives in a precinct.

What is a precinct convention?
A precinct convention is a meeting in the precinct.

Who can go?
Any registered voter. People who are not registered can go, although they may not be allowed to come in the meeting.

When is a precinct convention held?
A precinct convention is held every two years.

Where is it held?
It is held at the place where you vote.

What do people do at a precinct convention?
They elect delegates to go to other meetings. These delegates go to a county meeting where they elect other delegates to go to a District and a State Convention. These people select delegates to go to a National Convention where they decide who will run for President of the United States.

Who runs the precinct convention?
A temporary chairman opens the meeting and then the people select a chairman to run the meeting.

Why are we going to these meetings?
We are going to these meetings to show we want to be full citizens. The people who run these meetings have been the same people who keep Negroes from being able to vote. We want to see democracy work for all the people.

Will the people running the meeting let us in to their meeting?
We don't know. But we want to show that we want to go, even if they won't let us in.

What should we do after the meeting?
We should call S.C.L.C. and let them know what happened at the meeting so they can help us tell everyone that Negroes want to be free.

SUGGESTIONS FOR TEACHING

The best teacher does not tell-but asks.
Ask questions of the class, even though you may have the answer already.
This makes the students more interested if they are helped to think through a situation.

The Art of Questioning:

1. Kind of words used in stating the question.

2. The purpose of the question.

   a. Should it lead to an answer of facts?

   b. Do you want a comparision?

   c. Do you need a description?

   d. Should the answer be an analysis?

   e. Will a mystery be solved?

   f. Will it lead to a polite ending?

   g. Will it suggest a challenge?

   h. Will a projection into the future be the thing needed at this time?

Select a Topic For The Evening: (This may be a subject of interest, a community problem or situation, a candidate for public office, a recent newspaper article, a TV Show)

How To Lead a Discussion:

1. Motivation (pictures, known experiences etc. always help from participating group.)

2. Introduction (title, clarification of words in the participants frame of thinking, use of authorities, unsolved thinking)

3. Procedure (toss out challenging statements or questions, put small groups to work)

4. Expect outcomes (write on blackboard at end of group discussions or draw out outline of outcomes from entire group)

5. Follow-up (watch for bench-mark facts as session progresses).

USE OF WORDS

Take a meaningful word for a reading lesson.

Help class pronounce it (use sound chart)

Help class learn to spell it.

Discuss its meaning and uses - use dictionary last.

Example:

1. Citizen

   What makes a citizen?

   Who is a citizen?

   What does dictionary say?

   What does 14th Amendment say?

   (Have someone read difinition and some one read 14th Amendment)

   DISCUSS

2. Legislature

   What is it?

   Do we have one in our state?

   How are the members selected?

   From what area do they come?

   When do they meet? Where?

   What do they do?

   Do you know any names,

   What positions do they take?

LETTER WRITING

1. Discuss reasons for knowing how to write a letter.

   (Take care of business matters, stay in touch with friends, etc.)

   ---It is more effective if your letter says exactly what you mean and if it looks good.

2. Make teachers aware of where the five parts are placed.

   a. business letter

   b. friendly letter

3. Have pupils bring in letter showing forms used.

   a. discuss these.

   b. get students reactions.

   c. turn to authorities in English as a last resort.

   d. observe punctuation in both forms.

   e. write a letter that you have been wanting to write.

LESSON PLAN

CONSUMER EDUCATION

PURPOSE

The purpose of this lesson is to prepare the trainees to help their class members develop attitudes and habits which will insure that they will spend their money in the most beneficial and economical manner.

THE METHOD

The method used will be that of question and discussion with the leader raising questions whose answers will define the terms consumer, income, overspending, budget, credit, compensation, "Madison Avenue," and others which help us to look objectively at the average American's preoccupation with material things and their consumption. Some attention will be given to the various income levels: national average, national average for whites, national average for Negroes, and average for the southern white and the southern Negro. Contrasting the image of affluence and the resulting furor made by the advertisers who compete for the consumer's patronage unceasingly with the low income of the Southerners with whom the trainees will work, we see a great need for consumer education. The discussion which will be highly informal and unstructured because of its appeal (according to our past experiences) should produce the following learnings:

1. Ability to prepare a budget (See sample)

2. Awareness of factors which influence the amount of a family's income

   a. education

   b. job opportunities

   c. trends and conditions of the national economy

   d. automation and cybernation

3. Awareness of negative influences which relate to spending

   a. special "sales" and other advertising tricks, schemes and techniques

   b. keeping up with the Jones

   c. materialistic outlook and philosophy

4. Awareness of resources which aim to alleviate conditions of poverty

   a. Economic Opportunity Programs

   b. Civil Rights Act - Titles Vl and Vll

   c. public and private social welfare agencies

   d. discount buying

e. enlightened shopping methods

1) nutritious vs "economical" foods

2) supermarket vs corner grocery

3) clearance vs special purchase sales

4) bank loans vs loan sharks (suggested resources open when bank discriminates)

5. Suggested treatment of related family problems

a. family planning - birth control

b. allowances for children, teaching of thrift, budgeting appropriate values regarding money

c. savings - suggest keeping at least one month's income

d. debts - try not to owe more than one month's income

The following is sample monthly budget for family with income of $250.00:

Rent	$ 50.00 *
Food	80.00 *
Clothing
Utilities
Medicines
Insurance
Allowances for children Travel
Entertainment
Savings Charities
Miscellaneous
TOTAL	$250.00	$250.00

* Our suggested figures. For other items, we suggest no amount, but leave it to the individual "family" to complete the allocations up to the total amount of $250.00.

LESSON PLAN

BANKING

PURPOSE

The purpose of this lesson is to prepare the trainees to teach simple banking techniques and practices.

THE METHOD

A. Question - Discussion

The teacher starts by asking the group to recall memories of experiences they have had with money and banking to give reasons why they feel it important to teach banking in the classes which they will set up. At the end of this session, the following reasons will have been identified or crystallized:

1. To make practical use of numbers
2. To promote safety in handling of money
3. To encourage business-like handling of affairs
4. To encourage and support independence in handling money
5. To enable people to build credit ratings
6. To familiarize people with the services a bank offers in a community

B. Theory and Practice

The next part of the class will be concerned with the reading of short stories about using a bank - "Depositing Money In The Bank" and "Writing A Check". (Enclosed copies)

1. Depositing money in the bank

The method used asks that the story be read over completely to the class. Then the story is read by the trainees sentence by sentence in rotation order by a person next to the former reader taking his turn when it is time for their table to read again, and so forth. Attention is given to audibility of the reader, to all groups keeping up with the story, and to seeing that the story is understood. Once it is determined that all people understand the story, all questions are answered, we will proceed to test our learnings by reconstructing the story. This calls for completing the sentences which contain blank spaces at the bottom of the pages. The rotation-participation technique is used here again. Lessons drawn from this work include:

a. writing practice

b. reading

c. word study

d. procedure for depositing money in the bank

Following this work the trainees actually fill out a deposit slip using data suggested by the teacher - the amount of currency is given, the amount of silver is given and it is suggested that they also "deposit" the amount of their first month's operational expense check from the Citizenship Program. The work will be checked and necessary corrections will be made when errors are found.

2. Writing a check

The same procedure as that for depositing money. Reading the story, testing our learnings through completing sentences by filling blank spaces with correct information taken from the stories, and this time actually writing a check is used in this part of the lesson. Students complete a blank check for practice.

C. Materials

1. Questions from the people regarding banking. (These may be taken up a day before the lesson in order to build around the needs of the trainees.)

2. Sample deposit slips and blank checks

3. Mimeographed stories on making deposits and writing checks

4. Sample savings deposit and withdrawals forms from a variety of banks

5. Bank managers and other resource people who may visit classes

6. Films, pamphlets, and related brochures

DEPOSITING MONEY IN THE BANK

When I get a check I put it in the bank.

I make a deposit slip.

I write my name on the deposit slip.

I write my address on the slip, too.

I then write the date on the deposit slip.

Next I write the bank named on the check.

Then I write the amount of the check.

If I have two checks I write the bank named on each.

I write the amount of money named in each check.

I then write the total amount of both checks.

Then I endorse each check.

I write my name on the back of the check to endorse it.

Every check must be endorsed.

I keep my_____in the bank.

I deposit the money in the_____.

First I write my_____on the deposit slip.

My address is the place where I_____.

I then write the_____named on each check.

Next I write_____date on the slip.

I also write the_____of each check.

Then I _____the total.

I then_____the check.

WRITING A CHECK

Sometimes I need to get some money from the bank.

I get a blank check at the desk in the bank.

Then I write a check for the money.

I write the month, the day of the month, and the year.

Then I write the name of the person who gets the check

Then I write the amount of the check in figures.

Next I spell out the amount of the check.

Then I sign my name at the bottom of the check.

Sometimes I write a check at home.

Sometimes Mary writes checks.

Mary signes her name to the checks she writes.

I sign my name to the ones I write.

Sometimes I get my money out of the _____.

I _____ a check for the money I need.

I get a _____ check at the desk in the bank.

I write the _____ on the check.

I write the amount of _____ in figures.

I also spell out the _____ of money.

Then I _____ my name.

TECHNIQUES FOR VOTER REGISTRATION FIELD WORK

Safety

1. Know all roads in and out of town.
2. Know location of safe places and homes in the county.
3. Make arrangements for regular checks with the Jackson FDP office (WATS line) and/or the county office.

Canvassing

1. Take pen and paper to record any important information.
2. Try to present yourself to people in a way that will make them want to take their time to talk with you.
3. If a person closes the door in your face or will not talk with you, try to find out elsewhere why he did it. Everybody can be approached, but it may take much time and patience to reach some people.
4. Don't talk about too many things on the same visit, especially at first. Go back another day to explain more. When you both feel comfortable in the conversation, you can build a relationship, and the person will gain confidence in you.
5. Ask questions as well as give information in order to keep up a person's interest. If his attention wanders, try talking about other things and eventually work back to your program.
6. If a person seems interested, try to give them something to do to keep up their interest. Have them contact others.
7. If a person already knows what you are telling him, find out how he knows it. Perhaps there is already a group in existence that nothing is known about. Perhaps there are channels of communication that could be valuable in the future.

Workshops

1. Arrange materials you'll need (pencils, paper, application blanks, etc.) beforehand so things can go on as planned.
2. Emphasize that any question is a good question. Encourage people to speak up, ask questions, bring out their own ideas.
3. Whenever possible, use the local residents to lead workshops. As an organizer, you need to help them do things more and more on their own, without depending on you.
4. Go slowly enough to include everyone - taking part and understanding what is being said and done. Using questions and discussion and sometimes writing a little will help keep you all at about the best speed and everybody caught up with the ideas being put forth.
5. Many times people like to open and close workshops and meetings with a song and a prayer.
6. Praise people freely. Compliment them for any small thing. This business is new to most people and they are easily intimidated.

Taking People to the Registrar's Office

1. Help get transportation arranged for all who want to go.
2. Encourage people to go at least by twos. There is strength in numbers.
3. Accompany people to the door of the office if you can. At least go as far as local authorities will allow. After a while, community leaders should be going with other people instead of organizers.
4. Get people to write out and sign complaints if they are not allowed to register. People DO NOT have to read and write to register. Send complaints to John Doar, Justice Department, Washington, D.C., and a copy to the Jackson office. When 20 complaints are gathered from a county, the government should send in a federal registrar. Complaints should be sent also if people are segregated at all in the courthouse or if officials are unfair or rude.

To Do Justice in Alabama

On August 20, 1965, Jonathan Daniels, a white seminary student, was gunned down in front of a grocery store in Hayneville, Alabama, by a local Deputy Sheriff. In a little more than a month later, the assailant, Tom Coleman, was acquitted of a first degree murder charge by a jury of his peers.

This is not an isolated incident. To the contrary, it is symptomatic of the climate of lawlessness and violence which pervades the entire state of Alabama. Negro and white civil rights workers have been shotgunned, clubbed, stoned, and dynamited by local whites who have no need to fear judicial retribution from state or local authorities. For these crimes the state exercises two standards of justice, a "black" and a "white" justice. The following eighteen lives are a grim memorial to the black justice of Alabama.

MRS. VIOLA LIUZZO — The Detroit woman went to Selma to help in the march on Montgomery. She was killed the day the march ended as she drove through Lowndes County on her way to Montgomery to pick up a second load of marchers and ferry them back to Selma.

Her assailant's trial resulted in one mistrial and finally, acquittal.

THE REV. JAMES REEB — The Boston minister was beaten on a Selma street and died two days later. Four Selma whites were arrested and three have been indicted on murder charges. They will come up for trial sometime later this year.

JIMMIE LEE JACKSON — A Negro youth, he was killed in a voter demonstration at Marion, Ala. Officials said later that a state trooper did it. No arrest was made.

ADDIE MAE COLLINS, CYNTHIA WESLEY, CAROL ROBERTSON, DENIS McNAIR — The four Negro girls were at Sunday School in Birmingham when killed by an exploding bomb. No arrests.

JOHNNY ROBINSON — The Negro was killed in rioting that followed the church bombing. No arrests were made.

VIRGIL WARE — He was killed the same day by a pistol-toting white lad riding with a buddy on a motor-scooter. One of the white boys was convicted of manslaughter, and the other pleaded guilty. After a stern lecture, the judge sentenced them to seven months in the county jail, but then probated the sentence and set them free.

JOHN L. COLEY — A Birmingham Negro, he was shot dead in rioting that followed another bombing of a home two weeks earlier than the one at the church. No arrests were made.

WILLIAM MOORE — A Baltimore mailman making a lone protest march across Alabama, he was killed by a bullet from a passing car. A white man was arrested, but not indicted.

Though the next names are not as celebrated as those which precede them, they are to no less an extent representative of the evil of Alabama law enforcement.

REV. C. H. BALDWIN was stoned to death in Huntsville. His assailant was convicted of a second degree manslaughter charge.

WILLIE BREWSTER was shotgunned while returning home from work. There has been one indictment, but no trial yet.

THAD CHRISTIAN was killed in Anniston. No trial results yet.

FRANK ANDREWS was killed in Lisman No arrests were made.

WILLIE DUNIGAN was killed in Lomax. No arrests were made.

BESSIE McDOWEL was killed in Andalusia. One indictment was returned but never came to trial.

In a nation which is dedicated to the sanctity of the human spirit, this wanton disregard for human life must not continue. The state of Alabama has neglected its responsibility to enforce equal justice. This DEMANDS a national outcry if we are to be true to what our nation stands for.

THINGS THAT YOU CAN DO

1. Call upon your local newspaper and ask them to do more in the way of causing the nation to understand the seriousness of the problem.

2. Write letters to the editors as to how you feel about the problem.

3. Get together small delegations of people to call upon public officials and ask them to speak out on the problem.

4. Get organizations to distribute literature that they prepare or that they obtain from other organizations that relate to the problem.

5. Hold yourself in readiness to join with others that elect to protest the existence of the problem.

6. Keep informed as to what SCLC is doing about the problem, and keep SCLC informed as to what you are doing.

HISTORIC WORDS OF FREEDOM

I have sworn upon the altar of God eternal hostility against every form of tyranny over the mind of man.

—Thomas Jefferson

Equal and exact justice to all men, freedom of religion, freedom of the press, freedom of person under the protection of the habeas corpus; and trial by juries impartially selected—these principles form the bright constellation which has gone before us. —Ibid.

Some men look at constitutions with sanctimonious reverence, and deem them like the ark of the covenant, to sacred to be touched. They ascribe to the men of the preceding age a wisdom more than human, and suppose what they did to be beyond amendment. . . . Laws and institutions must go hand in hand with the progress of the human mind. . . . We might as well require a man to wear the coat that fitted him as a boy, as civilized society to remain ever under the regime of their ancestors. —Ibid.

If the book be false in its facts, disprove them; if false in its reasoning, refute it. But, for God's sake, let us freely hear both sides. —Ibid.

Error of opinion may be tolerated where reason is left free to combat it. —Ibid.

Tyranny, like hell, is not easily conquered; yet we have this consolation within us, that the harder the conflict, the more glorious the triumph. What we obtain too cheap, we esteem too lightly. . . . It would be strange indeed if so celestial an article as freedom should not be highly rated.

—Thomas Paine

Every age and generation must be free to act for itself in all cases as the ages and generations which preceded it. The vanity and presumption of governing beyond the grave is the most ridiculous and insolent of all tyrannies. . . . Every generation is, and must be, competent to all the purposes which its occasions require. It is the living, and not the dead, that are to be accommodated. —Ibid.

It has been thought a considerable advance towards establishing the principles of freedom to say, that government is a compact between those who govern and those who are governed: but this can not be true, because it is putting the effect before the cause; for as man must have existed before governments existed, there necessarily was a time when governments did not exist, and consequently there could originally exist no governors to form such a compact with.

The fact therefore must be that the individuals themselves, each in his own personal and sovereign right, entered into a compact with each other to produce a government; and this is the only mode in which governments have a right to exist. Ibid.

Those who expect to reap the blessings of freedom must, like men, undergo the fatigues of supporting it. —Ibid.

We want a state of things which allows every man the largest liberty compatible with the liberty of every other man.

—Ralph Waldo Emerson

And ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free.

—John 8:32

This country, with its institutions, belongs to the people who inhabit it. Whenever they shall grow weary of the existing government, they can exercise their constitutional right of amending it, or their revolutionary right to dismember or overthrow it.

—Abraham Lincoln

As I would not be a slave, so I would not be a master. This expresses my idea of democracy. Whatever differs from this, to the extent of the difference, is no democracy. —Ibid.

A house divided against itself cannot stand—I believe this government cannot endure permanently half-slave and half-free. —Ibid.

The world will little note, nor long remember what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us the living, rather, to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us—that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion—that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain—that this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom—and that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth. —Ibid.

What constitutes the bulwark of our own liberty and independence? It is not our frowning battlements, our bristling sea coasts, our army and our navy. These are not our reliance against tyranny. All of those may be turned against us without making us weaker for the struggle. Our reliance is in the spirit which prized liberty as the heritage of all men, in all lands everywhere. Destroy this spirit and you have planted the seeds of despotism at your own doors. Familiarize yourselves with the chains of bondage and you prepare your own limbs to wear them. Accustomed to trample on the rights of others, you have lost the genius of your own independence and become the fit subjects of the first cunning tyrant who rises among you. —Ibid.

After all, there is but one race—humanity.
—George Moore

I do not know the method of drawing up an indictment against a whole people.
—Edmund Burke

Power may justly be compared to a great river. While kept within its bounds, it is both beautiful and useful, but when it overflows its banks, it is then too impetuous to be stemmed; it bears down all before it, and brings destruction and desolation wherever it comes. If, then, this be the nature of power, let us at least do our duty, and, like wise men who value freedom, use our utmost to support liberty, the only bulwalk against lawless power, which, in all ages, has sacrificed to its wild lust and boundless ambition the blood of the best men that ever lived. . . .

It is the best cause; the cause of liberty; and I make no doubt but your upright conduct, this day, will not only entitle you to the love and esteem of your fellow citizen, but every man who prefers freedom to a life of slavery will bless and honor you as men who have baffled the attempt of tyranny, and, by an impartial and uncorrupt verdict, have laid a noble foundation for securing to ourselves, our posterity, and our neighbors that to which Nature and the laws of our country have given us a right—the liberty of both exposing and opposing arbitrary power (in these parts of the world at least) by speaking and writing truth.
—Andrew Hamilton on Freedom of the Press

There is only one cure for evils which newly acquired freedom produces, and that cure is freedom. When a prisoner first leaves his cell, he cannot bear the light of day, he is unable to discriminate colors, or recognize faces. The remedy is, to accustom him to the rays of the sun.

—Thomas B. Macauley

If we wish to be free—if we mean to preserve inviolate those inestimable privileges for which we have been so long contending—if we mean not basely to abandon the noble struggle in which we have been so long engaged and which we have pledged ourselves never to abandon until the glorious object of our contest shall be obtained—we must fight! I repeat it, sir, we must fight! An appeal to arms and to the God of Hosts is all that is left us! . . . Is life so dear, or peace so sweet, as to be purchased at the price of chains and slavery? Forbid it, Almighty God! I know not what course others may take, but as for me, give me liberty or give me death!

—Patrick Henry

They that can give up essential liberty to obtain a little temporary safety deserve neither liberty nor safety.

—Benjamin Franklin

Liberty will not descend to a people, a people must raise themselves to liberty; it is a blessing that must be earned before it can be enjoyed.

—Charles Caleb Colton

No matter whose the lips that would speak, they must be free and ungagged. Let us believe that the whole of truth can never do harm to the whole of virtue; and remember that in order to get the whole of truth you must allow every man, right or wrong, freely to utter his conscience, and protect him in so doing.

—Wendell Phillips

I do not agree with a word you say, but I will defend to the death your right to say it.

—Francois Voltaire

Abuses of the freedom of speech ought to be repressed, but to whom dare we commit the power of doing it?

—Benjamin Franklin

Freedom is the one purport, wisely aimed at, or unwisely, of all man's struggles, toilings and sufferings, in this earth.

—Thomas Carlyle

All men are by nature equal.

—Plato

The real democratic American idea is, not that every man shall be on a level with every other, but that every one shall have liberty, without hindrance, to be what God made him.

—Henry Ward Beecher

Without free speech no search for truth is possible; without free speech no discovery of truth is useful; and the nations no longer march forward toward the nobler life which the future holds for man. Better a thousandfold abuse of free speech than denial of free speech. The abuse dies in a day, but the denial slays the life of the people, and entombs the hope of the race.

—Charles Bradlaugh

Implicit faith, blind submission to authority, timid fear, a distrust of our own powers, an inattention to our own importance and the good purposes we are able to effect, these are the chief obstacles to human improvement. Democracy restores to man a consciousness of his value, teaches him by the removal of authority and oppression to listen only to the dictates of reason, gives him confidence to treat all other men as his fellow beings, and induces him to regard them no longer as enemies against whom to be upon his guard, but as brethren whom it becomes him to assist.

—William Godwin

Who can be at rest, who can enjoy anything in this world with contentment, who hath not liberty to serve God and to save his own soul according to the best light which God hath planted in him to that purpose?

—John Milton

The love of liberty is the love of others; the love of power is the love of ourselves.

—William Hazlitt

You can not possibly have a broader basis for any government than that which includes all the people, with all their rights in their hands, and with an equal power to maintain their rights.

With reasonable men, I will reason; with humane men I will plead; but to tyrants I will give no quarter, nor waste arguments where they will certainly be lost.

—William Lloyd Garrison

It is the common fate of the indolent to see their rights become a prey to the active. The condition upon which God has given liberty to man is eternal vigilance.

—John Philpot Curran

As the happiness of the people is the sole end of government, so the consent of the people is the only foundation of it.

—John Adams

Our country, right or wrong! When right, to be kept right; when wrong, to be put right!

—Carl Schurz

We believe that this country will not be a permanently good place for any of us to live in unless we make it a reasonably good place for all of us to live in. . . . Our cause is the cause of justice for all in the interest of all.

—Theodore Roosevelt

I have always been among those who believed that the greatest freedom of speech was the greatest safety, because if a man is a fool, the best thing to do is to encourage him to advertise the fact by speaking.

—Woodrow Wilson

The world must be made safe for democracy. Only free peoples can hold their purpose and their honor steady to a common end, and prefer the interests of mankind to any narrow interest of their own.

But the right is more precious than peace, and we shall fight for the things we have always carried nearest our hearts—for democracy, for the rights of those who submit to authority to have a voice in their own governments, for the rights and liberties of small nations, for the universal dominion of right by such a concert of free peoples as shall bring peace and safety to all nations and make the world itself at last free. —Ibid.

The greatest aid that I know of that any man could give the world today would be a correct definition of "liberty." Everybody is running around in a circle announcing that somebody has pinched their "liberty." . . . So the question arises "how much liberty can I get and get away with it?" Well, you can get no more than you give. That's my definition, but you got perfect "liberty" to work out your own, so get in.

—Will Rogers

To save society from overreaching and impoverishing itself by any arbitrary interference and at the same time to uphold the public right as supreme, to secure the benefits of collective effort while wisely safeguarding individual opportunity and initiative, is the patriotic and difficult task which should enlist the best thought and unselfish endeavor of every citizen who appreciates the advantages and the dangers of the Republic.

—Charles Evans Hughes

Selfishness and demagoguery take advantage of liberty. . . . Free speech voices the appeals of hate and envy as well as those of justice and charity. A free press is made the instrument of cunning, greed, and ambition, as well as the agency of enlightened and independent opinion. How shall we preserve the supremacy of virtue and the soundness of the common judgment? How shall we buttress Democracy? The peril of this Nation is not in any foreign foe! We, the people, are its power, its peril, and its hope! —Ibid.

You tell me that law is above freedom of utterance. And I reply that you can have no wise laws nor free enforcement of wise laws unless there is free expression of the wisdom of the people—and, alas, their folly with it. But if there is freedom, folly will die of its own poison, and the wisdom will survive. That is the history of the race. It is the proof of man's kinship with God.

—William Allen White

Liberty means responsibility. That is why most men dread it.

—George Bernard Shaw

Our way of living together in America is a strong but delicate fabric. It is made up of many threads. It has been woven over many centuries by the patience and sacrifice of countless liberty-loving men and women. It serves as a cloak for the protection of poor and rich, of black and white, of Jew and Gentile, of foreign and native born. Let us not tear it asunder. For no man knows, once it is destroyed, where or when man will find its protective warmth again.

—Wendell L. Willkie.

In the future days, which we seek to make secure, we look forward to a world founded upon four essential human freedoms. The first is freedom of speech and expression—everywhere in the world. The second is freedom of every person to worship God in his own way—everywhere in the world. The third is freedom from want—which, translated into world terms, means economic understandings which will secure to every nation a healthy peacetime life for its inhabitants—everywhere in the world. The fourth is freedom from fear—which, translated into world terms, means a world-wide reduction of armaments to such a point and in such a thorough fashion that no nation will be in a position to commit an act of physical aggression against any neighbor—anywhere in the world.

—Franklin D. Roosevelt

If democracy is to survive, it is the task of men of thought, as well as men of action, to put aside pride and prejudice; and with courage and single-minded devotion—and above all with humility—to find the truth and teach the truth that shall keep men free. —Ibid.

Liberty lies in the hearts of men and women. When it dies there, no constitution, no law, no court can save it. No constitution, no law, no court can even do much to help it. . . . The spirit of liberty is the spirit which is not too sure that it is right. The spirit of liberty is the spirit which seeks to understand the minds of other men and women. The spirit of liberty is the spirit which weighs their interests alongside its own without bias. The spirit of liberty remembers that not even a sparrow falls to earth unheeded. The spirit of liberty is the spirit of Him who, near two thousand years ago, taught mankind that lesson it has never learned, but has never quite forgotten; that there may be a kingdom where the least shall be heard and considered side by side with the greatest.

—Learned Hand

Making allowances for human imperfections, I do feel that in America the most valuable thing in life is possible, the development of the individual and his creative powers. There may be men who can live without political rights and without opportunity of free individual development. But I think that this is intolerable for most Americans. Here, for generations, men have never been under the humiliating necessity of unquestioning obedience. Here human dignity has been developed to such a point that it would be impossible for people to endure life under a system in which the individual is only a slave of the state and has no voice in his government and no decision on his own way of life.

—Albert Einstein

Liberty is a thing of the spirit—to be free to worship, to think, to hold opinions, and to speak without fear—free to challenge wrong and oppression with surety of justice. Liberty conceives that the mind and spirit of men can be free only if the individual is free to choose his own calling, to develop his talents, to win and to keep a home sacred from intrusion, to rear children in ordered security.

—Herbert Hoover

Personal freedom, a wide range of individual expression, a complete respect for a human mind and the human personality—this is the ideal of the democratic system. In all the literature, the documents of democracy, you find this respect, this hope, this attitude of reverence toward the fullest possible flowering of each human personality. President Lincoln enjoyed quoting the Irishman who said, "In this country every man is as good as the next one and for the matter of that a little better." We are men, not angels—that is sure. Also we hope we are men and not mice. And sometimes we feel like worms of the dust, doing the best we can, moving a little soil of the earth from where it was to where it will be.

—Carl Sandburg

The unexamined life, said Socrates, is unfit to be lived by man. This is the virtue of liberty, and the ground on which we may best justify our belief in it, that it tolerates error in order to serve the truth. When men are brought face to face with their opponents, forced to listen and learn and mend their ideas, they cease to be children and savages and begin to live like civilized men. Then only is freedom a reality, when men may voice their opinions because they must examine their opinions.

—Walter Lippmann

We must be willing, individually and as a nation, to accept whatever sacrifices may be required of us. A people that values its privileges above its principles soon loses both. These basic precepts are not lofty abstractions, far removed from matters of daily living. They are laws of spiritual strength that generate and define our material strength. Patriotism means equipped forces and a prepared citizenry. Moral stamina means more energy and more productivity, on the farm and in the factory. Love of liberty means the guarding of every resource that makes freedom possible—from the sanctity of our families and the wealth of our soil to the genius of our scientists. . . . No person, no home, no community can be beyond the reach of this call. We are summoned to act in wisdom and in conscience, to work with industry, to teach with persuasion, to preach with conviction, to weigh our every deed with care and with compassion. For this truth must be clear before us: whatever America hopes to bring to pass in the world must first come to pass in the heart of America.

—Dwight D. Eisenhower

Democracy . . . is a condition where people believe that other people are as good as they are.

—Stuart Chase

The phrase civil rights means a number of concrete things. It means the right to be treated equally before the law. It means the right to equal opportunity for education, employment and decent living conditions. It means that none of these rights shall be denied because of race or color or creed. The history of freedom in our country has been the history of knocking down the barriers to equal rights.

—Adlai E. Stevenson

Democracy is a process of growth. . . .
Freedom is power.
Freedom breeds freedom. Ibid.

Liberty is not license. It not only bestows a privilege; it imposes an obligation. A man's home is his castle, but he is not free to burn it down. A man may be the head of his family, but he may not willfully starve his children. . . .

Liberty is described for us in undying documents—the Magna Charta, the Declaration of Independence, the Bill of Rights. It is symbolized by a cracked bell in Independence Hall, by a statue on a small island in New York harbor. It is a priceless value, to be won again and again, until all men are free."

—Robert P. Patterson

Freedom is not the absence of discipline, but it calls for discipline by internal constraint in contrast with the external police control of totalitarianism. When you throw a man in the water, his freedom does not express itself by merely splashing around. He can be free in the water only because he has learned to swim; that is to say, only because he subjects himself to a form of discipline, and a blend of self-suppression and self-assertion. The discipline of free men is not submission of one person's will to that of another, but it is anchored in a strategy of learning to balance the tensions within yourself. The ideas of freedom, self-control, and balance are inextricably interwoven.

—Harry D. Gideonse

Lincoln, who told us that no generation can escape history, used the word "responsibility" as often as he used the word "freedom." Referring to that link between freedom and responsibility in Lincoln's usage, Carl Sandburg has recently reminded us that free men might well ask themselves every day, almost as a ritual: "Who paid for my freedom, and what is the price, and am I somehow beholden?" —Ibid.

Implicit in the decision by the highest tribunal in the land against segregation in the public schools is a new and reassuring confirmation that in the American way of life, under our democratic creed, what is right will, in the end, always be done. The process may be slow, it may be halting, and it may encounter formidable obstacles and determined if misguided opposition; but in the end, under American democracy, right and decency and fairness always prevail. . . . Our democracy moves steadily toward fulfillment of its promise for all of its citizens, whatever their color or creed; it never fails in the end to reward the faith of its adherents. Its unceasing concern is for the people whose well-being it is designed to serve. Its trends are forward. It does not permit fear of change to stand in the way of progress. It is dynamic. This is why democracy is sturdy and solidly anchored in the minds and hearts of most Americans.

—Ralph J. Bunche

A DECLARATION OF FREEDOM

Written for Freedom House by a committee of distinguished Americans under the chairmanship of Archibald MacLeish.

Free men must re-dedicate themselves to the cause of freedom. They must understand with a new certainty of conviction that the cause of freedom is the cause of the human individual.

Human individuality is the basis of every value —spiritual, moral, intellectual, creative—in human life. To preserve it in a world of expanding and aggressive authoritarianism there must be a determination that freedom shall be defended wherever it is attacked and under whatever color or excuse. Those who attack freedom in the name of freedom are no less dangerous than those who attack it in the name of authority and discipline. Those who profess a belief in freedom but shirk the obligations it imposes, share the guilt of its enemies.

What is freedom? Freedom is the right to choose: the right to create for oneself the alternatives of choice. Without the possibility of choice and the exercise of choice a man is not a man but a member, an instrument, a thing.

Freedom is the right to one's soul: the right of each man to approach God in his own way and by his own means. It is a man's right to possess his mind and conscience for himself. To those who put their trust in freedom, the State can have no sovereignty over the mind or soul—must be the servant of man's reason, not the master.

Freedom is the right to one's dignity as a man. In a free society no individual, no group is entitled to diminish the human dignity of any man regardless of his race, his creed, or his color.

How shall freedom be defended?

By arms when it is attacked by arms; by truth when it is attacked by lies; by democratic faith when it is attacked by authoritarian dogma. Always, and in the final act, by dedication and faith.

On what faith does the defense of freedom rest?

On faith in man; faith in the fundamental decency of man; faith in the capacity of man to make his way by his own means to the truth which is true for him.

How can the faith in man survive in a time of human cruelty and treachery and wickedness beyond all precedent? How can it survive in a time of vast impersonal mechanisms—political and social and material—when individual human beings often feel, and sometimes say, that man has lost control of his destiny?

Faith in man can survive even in our time, because the conscience of mankind has survived and still protests. As long as the conscience of mankind survives—as long as mankind knows the "unwritten and undying laws of God"—man can believe in man.

Why should men believe in freedom now? Why should the exploited populations believe in freedom? Why should the poor believe in freedom?—the victims of economic greed?—the persecuted races? Why should those who crave an answer believe in freedom which is not, itself, an answer but a means of finding answers; which is not itself an end but a means to ends?

Men, whatever their situation, whatever their anxiety, should believe in freedom now precisely because freedom is not a preconceived answer, a predetermined end. What counts in a world of men is the beginning and the opportunity, not merely the end and the answer.

This age of ours is big with a future of infinite possibilities. Prophets of darkened vision have invoked its horrors for us. But it contains also an emerging promise of a richer, more humane and more abundant life which will not be realized unless the human mind is free. Only freedom keeps the future open.

But how can freedom stand against the monsters of unbridled authority?

Individual freedom can prevail and triumph, even against the enemies which beset it now, because the cause of freedom is the cause of man. Against that cause no enemy has prevailed for long.

Freedom is a noble thing! . . .
He lives at ease that freely lives. . . .
A noble heart may have no ease,
Nor aught beside that may him please
If Freedom fail.

God speed the hour, the glorious hour,
When none on earth
Shall exercise a lordly power,
Nor in a tyrant's presence cower,
But all to Manhood's stature tower,
By equal birth!

—William Lloyd Garrison

So long as faith with freedom reigns
And loyal hope survives,
And gracious charity remains
To leaven lowly lives;
While there is one untrodden tract
For intellect or will,
And men are free to think and act,
Life is worth living still.

For what avail the plow or sail,
Or land, or life, if freedom fail?

—Ralph Waldo Emerson

The breaking waves dashed high
On a stern and rock-bound coast;
And the woods against a stormy sky,
Their giant branches tossed;
And the heavy night hung dark
The hills and waters o'er—
When a band of exiles moored their bark
On a wild New England shore. . . .

What sought they thus afar?
Bright jewels of the mine?
The wealth of seas? the spoils of war?—
They sought a faith's pure shrine!
Aye, call it holy ground
The soil where first they trod!
They left unstained what there they found—
Freedom to worship God!

And whatever is done or said returns at last

When liberty goes out of a place, it is not the first to go,
Nor the second or third to go.
It waits for all the rest to go—it is the last.

All we have of freedom,
All we use and know,
This our fathers bought
For us, long and long ago.

Ancient rights unnoticed
As the breath we draw—
Leave to live by no man's leave
Underneath the law.

—Rudyard Kipling

Men! whose boast it is that ye
Come of fathers brave and free,
If there breathe on earth a slave,
Are ye truly free and brave?
If ye do not feel the chain,
When it works a brother's pain,
Are ye not base slaves indeed,
Slaves unworthy to be freed? . . .

Is true Freedom but to break
Fetters for our own dear sake,
And, with leathern hearts, forget
That we owe mankind a debt?
No! True Freedom is to share
All the chains our brothers wear,
And, with heart and hand, to be
Earnest to make others free!

To a great chief at Washington and to a chief of peoples across the waters, Hiamovi spoke:
"There are birds of many colors—red, blue,
green, yellow,
Yet it is all one bird.
There are horses of many colors—brown, black,
yellow, white,
Yet it is all one horse.
So cattle, so all living things, animals, flowers, trees.
So men in this land, where once were only Indians, are now men of many colors—white, black, yellow, red,
Yet all one people."

ON DOCUMENTS OF FREEDOM

Be it enacted by the General Assembly, That no man shall be compelled to frequent or support any religious worship, place, or ministry whatsoever, nor shall be enforced, restrained, molested, or burdened in his body or goods, nor shall otherwise suffer on account of his religious opinions or belief; but that all men shall be free to profess, and by argument to maintain, their opinion in matters of religion; and that the same shall in no wise diminish, enlarge, or affect their civil capacities.

—The Virginia Statute for Religious Freedom

I admit that special writs of assistance, to search special places, may be granted to certain persons under oath; but I deny that the writ now prayed may be granted. In the first place, the writ is universal. . . . Everyone with this writ may be a tyrant; if this commission be legal, a tyrant in a legal manner, may control, imprison, or murder anyone within the realm. In the next place, it is perpetual; there is no return. A man is accountable to no person for his doings. . . .

Now, one of the most essential branches of English liberty is the freedom of one's house. A man's house is his castle; and whilst he is quiet, he is as well guarded as a prince in his castle.

—James Otis, on Writs of Assistance

We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness. That to secure these Rights, Governments are instituted among Men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that whenever any Form of Government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the Right of the People to alter or to abolish it, and to institute a new Government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their Safety and Happiness. . . .

—Declaration of Independence

We the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution of the United States of America.

—The Constitution of the United States

Congress shall make no laws respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press, or of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the government for a redress of grievances.

—First Amendment to the Constitution

The basic premise on which the Declaration of Independence rests is that men are "endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights." That means that the source of these rights of man is God, not government. When the state adopts measures protective of civil liberties, it does not confer rights. It merely confirms rights that belong to man as the son of God.

The Declaration of Independence states, "That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among Men. . . ." The preamble of the Constitution says, "We the People of the United States, in Order to . . . secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution. . . ."

Therein lies the basic difference between democratic and totalitarian governments. In fascist, communist, and monarchical states, government is the source of rights: government grants rights; government withdraws rights. In our scheme of things, the rights of man are unalienable. They come from the Creator, not from a president, a legislature, or a court.

—William O. Douglas

We not only praise individual liberty, but our constitutional system has the unique distinction of insuring it. Our guaranties of fair trials, of due process in the protection of life, liberty, and property—which stands between the citizen and arbitrary power—of religious freedom, of free speech, free press and free assembly, are the safeguards which have been erected against the abuses threatened by gusts of passion and prejudice which in misguided zeal would destroy the basic interests of democracy. We protect the fundamental right of minorities, in order to save democratic government from destroying itself by the excesses of its own power. The firmest ground for confidence in the future is that more than ever we realize that, while democracy must have its organization and controls, its vital breath is individual liberty.

—Charles Evans Hughes

. . . The question in every case is whether the words used are in such circumstances and are of such a nature as to create a clear and present danger that they will bring about the substantive evils that Congress has a right to prevent. It is a question of proximity and degree. When a nation is at war many things that might be said in time of peace are such a hindrance to its effort that their utterance will not be endured so long as men fight and that no Court could regard them as protected by any constitutional right. . . .

. . . Only the emergency that makes it immediately dangerous to leave the correction of evil counsels to time, warrants making any exception to the sweeping command, "Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech. . . ."

—Oliver Wendell Holmes

. . . To courageous, self-reliant men, with confidence in the power of free and fearless reasoning applied through the processes of popular government, no danger flowing from speech can be deemed clear and present, unless the incidence of the evil apprehended is so imminent that it may befall before there is opportunity for full discussion. . . . Only an emergency can justify repression. Such must be the rule if authority is to be reconciled with freedom. Such, in my opinion, is the command of the Constitution. It is, therefore, always open to Americans to challenge a law abridging free speech and assembly by showing that there was no emergency justifying it.

—Louis D. Brandeis

. . . Government may not interfere with organized or individual expression of belief or disbelief. Propagation of belief—or even disbelief—in the supernatural is protected, whether in church or chapel, mosque or synagogue, tabernacle or meeting-house. Likewise the Constitution assures generous immunity to the individual from imposition of penalties for offending, in the course of his own religious activities, the religious views of others, be they a minority or those who are dominant in government. . . .

—Felix Frankfurter

The requirement of "due process" is not a fair-weather or timid assurance. It must be respected in periods of calm and in times of trouble; it protects aliens as well as citizens. But "due process," unlike some legal rules, is not a technical concept with a fixed content unrelated to time, place and circumstances. . . . —Ibid.

. . . Activity here charged to be criminal is conspiracy—that defendants conspired to teach and advocate, and to organize the Communist Party to teach and advocate overthrow and destruction of the Government by force and violence. . . . The authors of the clear and present danger test never applied it to a case like this, nor would I. If applied as it is proposed here, it means that the Communist plotting is protected during its period of incubation; its preliminary stages of organization and preparation are immune from the law; the Government can move only after imminent action is manifest, when it would, of course, be too late. . . .

—Robert D. Jackson

. . . There can be no doubt as to the power of Congress, by itself or through its committees, to investigate matters and conditions relating to contemplated legislation. This power, deeply rooted in American and English institutions, is indeed co-extensive with the power to legislate. Without the power to investigate—including of course the authority to compel testimony, either through its own processes or through judicial trial —Congress could be seriously handicapped in its efforts to exercise its constitutional function wisely and effectively.

But the power to investigate, broad as it may be, is also subject to recognized limitations. It cannot be used to inquire into private affairs unrelated to a valid legislative purpose. Nor does it extend to an area in which Congress is forbidden to legislate. Similarly, the power to investigate must not be confused with any of the powers of law enforcement; those powers are assigned under our Constitution to the Executive and the Judiciary. Still further limitations on the power to investigate are found in the specific individual guarantees of the Bill of Rights, such as the Fifth Amendment's privilege against self-incrimination. . . .

—Earl Warren

. . . The Bill of Rights represents democracy's imposition of discipline upon itself. History records many occasions when emergencies have so inflamed popular passions that the masses have demanded sudden folly. Therefore, in times when heads are cool, provision has to be made against the hour when judgment may falter. Even "the people" must not be left free to deprive themselves of their essential rights as individuals. . . .

—Frank Kingdon

To the mind of our Western world it is natural to think of men being equal in God—not only before God, in the eyes of God, but equal in God, in the divine spark which gives abiding value to the individual soul. . . . A whole set of political systems has arisen in the effort to make real this idea of equality which man, in the Western world, has always desired. . . . And America seems in a special way to be the guardian of the idea, because in the preamble to her first state document she already dared to talk of truths and privileges which were applicable to "all men."

—Herbert Agar

Traditionally democracy has been an affirmative doctrine rather than merely a negative one.

I believe—and I conceive the Constitution of the United States to rest upon, as does religion—the fundamental proposition of the integrity of the individual; and that all government and all private institutions must be designed to promote and protect and defend the integrity and the dignity of the individual; that that is the essential meaning of the Constitution and the Bill of Rights, as it is essentially the meaning of religion.

Any form of government, therefore, and any other institutions which make men means rather than ends, which exalt the state or any other institutions above the importance of men, which place arbitrary power over men as a fundamental tenet of the government, are contrary to that conception, and, therefore, I am deeply opposed to them.

IMMIGRATION & CITIZENSHIP

BACKGROUND

With the exception of Indians and Eskimos every American is an immigrant, a child of an immigrant, or the descendant of immigrants. And scientists now suspect that even the Indians came from Asia some centuries before the Mayflower arrived.

America is a dynamic composite of men and women from many countries and many races. What holds them and their country together are the rights and privileges and duties of American citizenship—rights, privileges and duties granted by the Constitution to naturalized and native born Americans alike.

This fact makes the process of naturalization as well as our immigration policies a matter of grave concern to all Americans.

In his message to Congress vetoing the restrictive McCarran Immigration and Naturalization law former President Harry S. Truman said on June 25, 1952:

> "In recent years our immigration policy has become a matter of major national concern. Long dormant questions about the effect of our immigration laws now assume first rate importance. What we do in the field of immigration and naturalization is vital to the continued growth and internal development of the United States—to the economic and social strength of our country—which is the core of the defense of the free world. Our immigration policy is equally, if not more important, to the conduct of our foreign relations and to our responsibilities of moral leadership in the struggle for world peace."

The McCarran Act gave the country a bad immigration policy —harmful to the rights of our naturalized citizens and detrimental to our prestige abroad. Both major parties during the 1952 campaign urged repeal of this bad law.

But here is another broken campaign promise. The McCarran Act is still on the books. Citizenship and naturalization are still a major concern to millions of foreign born Americans.

TALKING POINTS

- Immigrants need America.

  Every day a number of people from behind the Iron Curtain crawl, creep, swim, stow away, tunnel, bluff, or force their way to freedom. Thousands such refugees from Communism still dwell dismally in Germany and Austria. Only "resettlement" in the new world can give them the free life they seek.

  Thousands of people in practically every country of the world are anxiously waiting—sometimes for years and years—to join their children, parents, brothers, sisters in the United States. Others, without relatives here, are anxious to come to these shores, start a new life in our rich land. Their "old country" often has more people than its economy can support. Mounting population pressures abroad are a potential threat to peace.

  Those who wish to come to the U. S. are inspired by the inscription beneath the Statue of Liberty proclaiming to all nations: "Give me your tired, your poor, your huddled masses yearning to breathe free."

- . . . but America also needs immigrants.

  To welcome immigrants and to give them the opportunity to become American citizens is one of the basic ideals of our government, a foundation stone of our democracy. It is not a humanitarian gesture but an economic necessity—vital for the continued growth and expansion of our country—even in days of recession and creeping unemployment.

- Immigrants have made America great and prosperous.

  Way back in 1787, during the Constitutional Convention, James Madison said: "That part of America which has encouraged them [the foreigners] has advanced more rapidly in population, agriculture, and the 'art.'" History has proven him right.

Our rapid population growth from 4 million to nearly 168 million during the last 175 years was largely the result of immigration. In 1940 it was estimated that of the total white population of 118.2 million, 67.9 million were of later immigrant stock—descendants of persons coming to the United States after 1789.

Madison couldn't know about the tremendous help "foreigners" would give to the building of our industries. The great transcontinental railroads were built in the 19th century with the sweat and toil of tens of thousands of Irish and Chinese immigrants. The farms of the middle west which have become the granary of the nation and a hungry world were hewn from the wilderness by German and Scandinavian immigrants. Our great workshops and industries are manned in considerable part by immigrants or the sons of immigrants—Italians, and Slavs and men of many races and national origins—Americans all.

Immigration has given us an Andrew Carnegie, who promoted progress in steel making; a David Sarnoff, who pioneered in radio manufacture; and a William S. Knudsen, to increase automobile production. It has given us men like Enrico Fermi from Italy and Albert Einstein from Germany without whom the development of atomic energy would have been impossible. It has given us Arturo Toscanini, Fritz Kreisler . . . Irving Berlin and Victor Herbert . . . and literally thousands of others who have helped mold and enrich the American way of life.

- Immigration helps provide jobs and business opportunities.

Immigration has helped to expand the American economy. In fact many immigrants create more jobs for others.

Careful investigations, cited by Edward Corsi, New York State Industrial Commissioner, in his pamphlet "Path to the New World" (1953), concluded that there is no correlation between the percentage of foreign born in individual states and the percentage of unemployed workers at various periods for which such calculations were made. In fact the more immigrants live in a given area the higher the per capita income there. Nor is this surprising:

Immigrants are consumers as well as producers. Half of the immigrants are women and children who do not go into the labor force. When an adult immigrant arrives he adds to the economy the equivalent of a capital investment of perhaps $10,000 which the country of emigration has invested in raising and educating him from childhood. Many bring with them skills and experience which enable them to give employment to others.

- There is plenty of room in this country.

In 1950 the United States had 51 persons per square mile. Compare this with 480 in Great Britain and 807 persons per square mile in Belgium.

The fact is, there is plenty of room and plenty of need for new immigrants. Only those who would take the small and narrow view of America, who are afraid of an expanding economy such as the 20 years of the New and Fair Deal have given us, will dispute this.

Said Representative Harrison Gray Otis of Massachusetts: "When this country was new it might have been good policy to admit all. But it is no longer." Otis spoke in 1797. Those who speak so today are as wide of the mark as he was.

- Since 1917 our lawmakers have become increasingly intolerant of new immigration.

Until 1882, immigration to this country was largely free and unregulated. Anyone who could pay or borrow the money for passage could come.

In 1882 the first legislation was enacted to exclude paupers, criminals, diseased persons, and—for deplorable racist reasons—Chinese. This provision was later extended to prohibit other Orientals as well.

It was not until 1921 that quantitative restrictions on immigration were enacted. The 1921 law, made worse in 1924 in a wave of anti-foreign isolationist emotion, limited the number of admissible immigrants to equal three percent of the foreign born persons of a given nationality living in the United States in 1910. (The 1924 Act changed the base year for quota calculations to 1890 and reduced the number to 2%.) Since then minor changes in the quota system allowed a few more people to enter, but under the basic law we still only permit 154,657 immigrants a year.

- The National Origins Quota System discriminates against some nationalities in favor of others.

The National Origins Quota System is the heart of our present immigration policy and was retained in the Immigration Act of 1952, better known as the McCarran-Walter Act.

The system divides the quota for immigrants among the various nations on the basis of the national origins of the entire American population as shown by the 1920 census. The census estimated, for example, that Americans of Greek origin constituted about one-fifth of 1% of the population. Therefore Greece is allowed a quota of approximately one-fifth of 1% of the annual admissible total. Accordingly 310 Greeks are allowed to enter. Under the same formula the British quota is set at 65,000. As the lawmakers well know, however, few Britishers—and others from Northern and Western Europe where the pressure to migrate is slight—desire to settle here. The result is that a large part of the overall quota is wasted.

As Senator Herbert Lehman (D., N. Y.) put it in a speech on May 7, 1954: "The system presupposes that persons born in one country are better suited to immigrate here and become American citizens than persons born in another. As reflected in our immigration quotas, an individual born in Britain is presumed to be thirteen times more acceptable to America than one born in Italy and two hundred times more acceptable than one born in Greece.

"This assumption is not only utterly false on the face of it; it is basically repulsive to the very spirit and tradition—to the meaning—of America."

- The Displaced Persons Act of 1948 admitted 341,000 war victims.

On President Truman's insistence Congress, on June 25, 1948, passed the Displaced Persons Act under which 341,000 displaced persons were admitted to the U. S. It was not a good law, primarily because, as President Truman said, it "discriminated in callous fashion against persons of the Jewish faith." It did serve, however, to help many people who were the innocent victims of fascist and communist totalitarianism and had been lingering in DP camps for years. It also added many skilled and outstanding citizens to our community.

The trouble with the DP law was that it left the quota system unchanged. By mortgaging quotas, the displaced persons law served to cut down opportunities for immigration under certain quotas for many years to come. For example the number of visas for many East European countries with small quotas are cut in half well into the next century, while the German quota remains unchanged at 25,814. The quota for Poland will remain at 3,244 until the year 1999; that of Latvia is "mortgaged" until A.D. 2274.

- The McCarran Act is racist and unjust.

The Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, known as the McCarran-Walter Act, passed Congress on June 27, 1952, over President Truman's veto.

This law wrapped all the unfortunate and restrictive immigration enactments of the past 25 years in one single package and added many new and more severe restrictions and injustices under the guise of national security.

President Truman in his veto message of June 25, 1952, said the law "discriminates, deliberately and intentionally, against many peoples of the world."

President Truman's Commission on Immigration, headed by former Solicitor General Philip B. Perlman found: ". . . our present immigration laws flout fundamental American traditions and ideals, display a lack of faith in America's future, damage American prestige and position among other nations and ignore the lessons of the American way of life."

The bill was introduced by Senator Pat McCarran (D., Nev.) and Representative Francis E. Walter (D., Pa.). The House originally passed the measure on April 25 by a standing vote, 206-68. The Senate passed it May 22, 1952, by a voice vote after opponents fought it vigorously in seven days of debate.

The House overrode the President's veto (two-thirds, or 261 "yeas" required) 278 to 113 on June 26, 1952. The Senate overrode the veto 57 to 26 (two-thirds majority or 56 "yeas" required). 23 Southern Democrats voted with 34 Republicans to uphold the "anti-immigration law."

- The McCarran Act introduced new forms of racial discrimination.

In addition to perpetuating the unrealistic and unfair National Origins Quota System, the McCarran Act introduced a new form of racial discrimination. While taking a few halting steps toward abolition of racial barriers against Asiatics, the McCarran Act at the same time erects other and actually more formidable ones. It establishes the principle that ancestry and not the place of origin determines eligibility for admission—if the immigrant is an Oriental. Thus if a person is 50% Asian he is charged against the insultingly tiny quota—100 persons per year—of Asian countries. Other persons are charged to the country of their birth.

Negroes are similarly discriminated against.

- The McCarran Act fails to help the victims of Communism.

Said President Truman in his veto message of June 25, 1952:

". . . we have entered into an alliance, the North Atlantic Treaty, with Italy, Greece, and Turkey against one of the most terrible threats mankind has ever faced. We are asking them to join with us in protecting the peace of the world. We are helping them to build their defenses, and train their men, in the common cause. But, through this bill we say to their people: You are less worthy to come to this country than Englishmen or Irishmen; you Italians, who need to find homes abroad in the hundreds of thousands—you shall have a quota of 5,645; you Greeks, struggling to assist the helpless victims of a communist civil war—you should have a quota of 308; and you Turks, you are brave defenders of the Eastern flank, but you shall have a quota of only 225!

- The McCarran-Walter Act set up two classes of U.S. citizens.

Once an immigrant has entered the country and become a citizen he is still under special jeopardy under the McCarran-Walter Act.

Naturalization is not only hard to get, but hard to keep. The act permits the deportation of citizens for reasons that would not affect native born Americans.

Under the act a person can be deported or threatened with deportation

- because he is confined to a public mental institution and can not prove to the satisfaction of the Attorney General that he developed his sickness here and didn't have it when he arrived.
- because at some time in his past, within five years of his entry to the U. S., he went on relief and the Attorney General believes—it's purely a matter of belief —he went on relief for causes which existed when he arrived.
- because it has been discovered—10, 20, or 30 years after his arrival—that he stole a loaf of bread or violated one of Hitler's or Stalin's police state rules.
- because he joined some association which perhaps years later came under Communist control.
- because he neglected to notify the Attorney General of a change in address within ten days and the Attorney General doesn't consider this excusable.

In addition the law permits immigration officials, without warrant, to question an alien as to his right to remain in the United States. It also permits the immigration authorities to examine social security files which have been otherwise confidential.

- The Republicans fail to revise or repeal the McCarran Act despite campaign promises.

During the 1952 Presidential campaign a number of leading Republicans, including Vice-President Nixon who as a Senator voted for the Act, expressed their distaste for the McCarran-Walter Immigration Act.

Candidate Eisenhower on Oct. 17, 1952, said at New ark, N. J.: "And now we come to another glaring example of failure of our national leadership to live up to high ideals. I refer to the McCarran Immigration Law, which was passed over the President's veto at the last session of Congress. A new immigration law was certainly needed. But with leadership rather than vetoes we should have had, and we must get, a better law than this McCarran Act."

President Eisenhower's "leadership . . . to get a better law" was confined to asking Congress in his first State of the Union message (February 2, 1953) to enact another immigration law "which will at one and the same time guard our legitimate national interests and be faithful to our basic ideas of freedom and fairness to all." That was the last heard on the subject for three full years.

- President Eisenhower's Refugee Relief Act was poorly conceived . . .

The President asked, April 22, 1953, that Congress admit 240,000 special immigrants. He got, on July 31, 1953, a law which theoretically would admit 214,000 emergency immigrants over a period of three years and eight months, or about 58,000 a year.

Upon signing the bill, on August 1953, President Eisenhower said: "We are giving a new chance in life to 214,000 fellow humans. . . . This action demonstrates again America's traditional concern for the homeless, the persecuted, and the less fortunate in other lands."

But into the law were built such barricades and barriers to make admission to the U. S. extremely difficult.

. . . and worse administered.

The Refugee Relief Act was administered by W. R. Scott McLeod, a former administrative assistant of Sen. Styles Bridges (R., N. H.), friend of Senator McCarthy (R., Wisc.), and Security Chief of the Department of State.

Nine months after the act was passed exactly eight (8) persons had arrived in the U. S. under its provisions. By contrast, the first boatload under the Displaced Persons Act of 1948 arrived in New York with 1,070 immigrants on October 30, 1948, 53 days after the act passed. By July, 1954, almost a year after President Eisenhower signed the act, 5,000 visas had at last been issued.

On March 6, 1956, the State Department acknowledged that the Refugee Relief Act would "fall considerably short" of its goal of actually admitting 214,000 refugees by Dec. 31, 1956.

Said Senator Lehman (D., N. Y.) on May 7, 1954: "In the panic of concern lest we admit a single immigrant who would not be personally satisfactory to Mr. McLeod, Senator McCarran and Senator McCarthy, we have given the Communists abroad a chance to make a laughing stock of us. We have paralyzed the program, and dashed the hopes of thousands, both here and abroad, who had expected to realize from this program the answer to their dreams and prayers."

- The Corsi Affair made the Administration and the program ridiculous.

Things became ridiculous during the Corsi Affair—when Edmund Corsi, a distinguished New York Republican, was hired by John Foster Dulles to "expedite" the Refugee Relief program and left within four months after being fired on April 6, 1955, without being allowed to do his job.

Corsi was "redbaited" by Rep. Frances Walter (D-Pa.), co-author of the McCarran Act, without defense from the White House or Dulles. He was dropped because he won the enmity of what he later called the "security gang" in the State Department headed by McLeod. He wanted to "expedite," but when the political pressures were applied by McLeod's friends in Congress, including the powerful Sen. Styles Bridges (R-N. H.), he was left friendless and deserted by those who had called him to serve.

THE EISENHOWER RECORD

In his first State of the Union message on 1953, President Eisenhower referred vaguely to "certain injustices" in the McCarran-Walter Act and told Congress that the law "does in fact discriminate."

In 1954, after the first session of the 83rd Congress failed to do anything, the President dropped the subject.

In 1955 he asked some changes in the Refugee Relief Act—but he didn't push for action and Congress took no action.

Not until Feb. 8, 1956—more than three years after he had been in office—did the President present detailed recommendations for revision of the basic McCarran-Walter Act. Even thereafter, the White House did not push for action.

The President again proposed changes in the Refugee Relief Act, again failed to push for them, and again Congress failed to act.

On July 27, 1956, the last day of the 84th Congress, Senate Majority Leader Lyndon Johnson (Tex.) managed to push through on a voice vote a series of substantial compromise amendments to the McCarran-Walter Act. The device was a House-passed bill—the same familiar bill that comes up regularly to admit, over and above quotas, a few hundred "Basque sheepherders," for the special benefit of the wool interests.

A substitute text offered by Sen. Everett Dirksen (R., Ill.) would have relaxed fingerprinting requirements for foreign visitors, and wiped out the "mortgages" on future quotas of Greece, Latvia and other countries. The substitute would also have "'pooled" unused quotas, so that Southern and Eastern European nationals could apply for quotas not used by the British, for example.

It would also have allowed unused quotas to be used in 1957 by refugees unable to get into this country before the 1953 "emergency" law expires December 31, 1956.

This compromise measure went through the Senate by voice vote with complete bipartisan consent. It failed to get through the House because Rep. Francis Walter (D., Pa), co-author of the basic law, refused on the last day of the session to let the measure be brought up.

An immigration law revision finally was passed in 1957, after Democrats were voted control of Congress once more

It made relatively "noncontroversial" changes in the law, but it was better than nothing.

> The 1957 revision contained these major features:
> It allowed the State and Justice Departments to waive the fingerprinting of alien visitors; authorized use by German and other refugees and deportees of unused visas from the expired Refugee Relief Act; terminated the mortgages of future quotas of immigration contained originally in the 1948 Displaced Persons Act; made various liberalizing changes to reduce the harshness and inflexibility of technical requirements of the McCarran Act.

Still unchanged, however, are the basic evils of the McCarran Act—the racist philosophy, the hostility to immigration, the deeper injustices that are done to our doctrine that "all men are created equal."

As in the case of civil rights and some other areas of our national life, we shall have to wait for an Administration that believes more deeply in reform, that cares more about correcting mistakes, before we can turn toward basic revision of our immigration and citizenship law.

AFL-CIO POSITION

The 1957 AFL-CIO convention said that the "national origins section, the heart" of the law as written over President Truman's 1952 veto, is the section that "results in discriminatory selection of immigrants and has led to understandable resentment" in other sections of the Free World.

Justice and equity, said the resolution, should base quotas of immigration on "meaningful and relevant factors such as family reunion, technical and professional needs of America, refugee relief, national interest and resettlement."

The country is in a "strong enough economic position" to allow the entrance of "at least 250,000 (persons) annually in addition to those now eligible as 'non-quota' immigrants."

Reasonable care should be taken to block subversive elements but "fair and democratic administrative procedures" should be applied for both aliens and for naturalized citizens.

The importation of temporary workers—as in farm labor programs—"should be permitted only when our economic needs require and only after all possible steps to provide jobs and decent conditions" for Americans. Such importations should be modeled on the Mexican Contract Labor Program but with "greatly improved procedures" to protect both American and foreign workers.

MINIMUM WAGE

Asking for enactment of a Fair Labor Standards law, President Franklin D. Roosevelt said in 1937:

"A self-supporting and self-respecting democracy can plead no justification . . . for chiseling workers' wages or stretching workers' hours . . . Our problem is to work out in practice those labor standards which will permit the maximum but prudent employment of our human resources to bring within the reach of the average man and woman a maximum of goods and of services conducive to the fulfillment of the promise of American life."

The Purpose of the Act

A year later the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 was passed. It provided a minimum wage of 25 cents an hour for the first year of the law's operation, 30 cents an hour for the following six years, and 40 cents an hour by 1945. The purpose of the Act was stated in the law itself: "To eliminate as rapidly as practicable . . . labor conditions detrimental to the maintenance of the minimum standard of living necessary to health, efficiency, and the general well-being of workers."

The Fair Labor Standards Amendments of 1949 raised the minimum wage to 75 cents an hour.

75¢ Utterly Inadequate

Even back in 1949 the 75 cents minimum was considered "inadequate" by members of the House Committee on Education and Labor. Since then living costs alone have increased by 15% on the average. For low-income groups, always worst hit by price rises, they have increased by at least 18%. Man-hour productivity—certainly an important factor in justification of higher wage levels—has risen at least 25%. The wage structure in major industries where collective bargaining contracts exist is now more than three times as high as it was in 1938. And last but not least, minimum family needs to maintain "health, efficiency, and well-being" have long required a substantial increase in the minimum wage.

Coverage

Yet even the inadequate 75 cents minimum wage of 1949 failed to apply to millions of workers whose need for protection is most extreme. Almost half of the wage earners of America are not covered by the present $1 an hour law. Six million workers are specifically excluded even though they are engaged in "interstate commerce"—work that moves across state lines—and are thus under the jurisdiction of federal legislation. Another fourteen million workers are automatically excluded because their work is deemed to be "intra-state"—not involved in traffic between states—and therefore Congress has no power to regulate it.

As a consequence, millions of underpaid American workers in retailing, the service trades, the processing of agricultural products, and various categories of workers in lumbering, public utilities, and other occupations, are not covered by the federal minimum.

N.A.A.C.P. ASKS AID FROM HIGH COURT

statute requiring the registration of corporations.

That same day, without a hearing, an Alabama judge issued a "temporary" restraining order forbidding the N. A. A. C. P. to do any business in the state.

The association said that as a nonprofit organization it did not come within the state corporation law. But when it offered to register, nevertheless, it was enjoined from doing so while the court proceeding continued.

The Attorney General next moved to make the N. A. A. C. P. produce various records, including membership lists. The association refused to name its members and was fined $100,000 for contempt. Under Alabama law, the contempt finding prevented it from pursuing the court battle over its registration as a corporation.

Contempt Finding Voided

The Supreme Court's decision reversed the contempt finding on the ground that the N. A. A. C. P. had produced all requested records except membership lists, which could not be required. The federal high court remanded the case to the Alabama Supreme Court "for proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion."

At that point the association asked the Alabama Supreme Court to expunge the contempt finding and send the case back to the Alabama trial court for proceedings on the corporation statute. Unless and until the N. A. A. C. P. could win those proceedings, it would be prevented from doing business in the state by the 1956 "temporary restraining order."

The Alabama Supreme Court did nothing from last summer until Feb. 12. Then it handed down an opinion reaffirming the contempt finding.

The opinion said the United States Supreme Court had rested its decision on the "mistaken premise" that the N. A. C. P. had produced all documents demanded except membership lists. There was nothing in the record to show that, the Alabama court said, and thus the association was still in contempt.

The refusal of a state court to obey a decision of the U. S. Supreme Court presents a most delicate problem, but it is not a new one to the high court. In its earliest days it met a similar refusal on the part of Virginia's highest court by entering a final judgment, without remand. It still has power to do so.

Whatever happens finally in the Alabama case will undoubtedly affect the others that are pending.

The Georgia case began with a demand by the state Revenue Department for voluminous records going back seven years. On the day N. A. C. P. officials received this demand, and were considering what to do about it, local officials of the association were served with a contempt citation.

Convicted of Contempt

Shortly afterward they were tried and found guilty of contempt and fined $25,000.

At that point the association's lawyers fell or were pushed into what they called a "procedural cul de sac." The trial judge refused to certify the record as prepared by the N.A.A.C.P. As a result, the higher Georgia courts refused to consider an appeal.

It is the contempt conviction that the association has asked the Supreme Court to review.

Tax records are the purported basis also of two cases from Arkansas. One began with a demand that the association's local branch pay $350 in back corporation taxes. In this action, the attorney general of Arkansas demanded files of association contributors, officers and agents.

Mrs. Daisy Bates, the association's director in Arkansas, refused to disclose the names. The Arkansas courts overruled her claim of constitutional privilege, and that is the question now before the Supreme Court. No contempt order is involved.

Mrs. Bates is also involved in another case. The City Council of Little Rock, Ark., asked her for the names of members and contributors, purportedly determine if the local N. A. A. C. P. was evading payment of an occupation tax.

She refused and was fined $25 for contempt. The Arkansas Supreme Court affirmed the conviction on the ground that she and the association could not claim immunity from the occupation tax and at the same time refused to produce records to support their claim.

New Statutes Attacked

A third Arkansas case involves a series of statutes passed at a special session of the Legislature in 1958. The laws were designed in part to discourage the association's legal activities, by forbidding gifts of money to the association or other support of its litigation.

The statutes also require lists of members to be filed by all organizations engaging in activities "designed to hinder, harass and interfere with the powers and duties of the State of Arkansas to control and operate its public schools."

The N. A. A. C. P. asked a three-judge Federal District Court to declare all the acts unconstitutional. But the court declined to pass on them, saying the statutes should be tested first in the state courts. That refusal has now been taken to the United States Supreme Court.

The last of the six cases, one from Florida, is to be filed in the Supreme Court this week. It stemmed from the refusal of the association's officials in Miami to turn names of members over to a legislative investigating committee. Subsequently, the officials were cited for contempt.

The six cases, taken as a whole, clearly have major import for the continuing racial struggle in the South. The legal fight against segregation is being carried on almost entirely by the N. A. A. C. P. Any successful Southern effort to cripple the association could make a profound change in the pace of integration.

Supreme Court Actions

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, April 27—The Supreme Court took the following actions today:

RAILROADS

Held, 6—3, that a railroad employe invoking his statutory right to cancel an authirization for check-off of his union dues could not be compelled by the union or employer to submit the cancellation on a particular form supplied byt he union (No. 269, Felter v. Southern Pacific).

SHIPS

Unanimously held that when the United States was sued in admiralty, it might not set off against the claim an amount said to be owed to the Government by the claimant in an unrelated transaction (No. 285, U. S. v. Isthmian Steamship).

CRIMINAL LAW

Agreed to pass on the connection with interstate commerce constitutionally needed to sustain a Federal conviction under the Hobbs anti-racketeering act (No. 722, Stirone v. U. S.).

Agreed to decide whether the Constitution permitted a trial by court martial for an Army civilian employe charged with a capital offense overseas in peacetime (No. 622 misc., Grisham v. Taylor).

RELIGION

Refused for the second time to hear a complaint that the Lincoln Square redevelopment project in New York violated the Constitution because of the involvement of a religious institution, Fordham University (No. 771, Gart v. Cole).

LAW ASKED TO BAR PASSPORT TO REDS

State Department Official Tells Senate Unit Action by Congress Is Vital

By C. P. TRUSSELL

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, April 29—The Internal Security Administrator of the Sttae Department declared today that the international situation demanded prompt Congressional action to deny passports to Communists.

Since last June, when the Supreme Court ruled, 5-4, that specific law was lacking, John W. Hanes Jr., the administrator, told a Senate subcommittee 1,150 persons known to have shown interest in the Communist conspiracy had received passports. The State Department, Mr. Hanes said, has been left helpless and has issued passports.

He said the department knew that many passports had gone to "hard-core" Communists dedicated to the overthrow of the Government.

Only three weeks after the court decision, Mr. Hanes declared, President Eisenhower requested specific authorization for passport denials to potential enemies. A bill got through the House during the last days of the last Congress but received no Senate attention.

In testimony to the Senate Internal Security subcommittee, he said:

"Each and every [Communist] party member as of today can obtain a passport from the Department of State, except in the rare instance that they happen to be ineligible for some other reason, such as being a fugitive from justice.

"Many such persons have applied for passports since the decision of the Supreme Court, some of them even though they may have no present need or intention of going abroad. It seems entirely possible that these people are acting in concert or because of fear that they may soon be unable again to have valid passports.

"This is a gap in our defense which our enemies have not been slow to take advantage of."

Mr. Hanes gave no hint or criticism of the court. The trouble, he said, was with the law. The State Department, he asserted, had acted for seven years, not under precise law but under its concept of Congressional intention, to adopt regulations denying passports to Communists.

Representative John V. Lindsay, Republican of Manhattan, opposed the passport bill, sponsored by Senator James O. Eastland, Democrat of Mississippi, on the basis of the broad and "vague" powers it would grant the Secretary of State to deny passport issuances.

He held also that its authority to restrict travel raised a constitutional question. He also opposed some parts of another Eastland bill that would halt pre-emption of state laws by the Federal Government, as was done by the Supreme Court in overriding Pennsylvania's sedition law in the case of Steve Nelson, a Communist leader.

He contended that such a measure could throw into confusion conflicting state and Federal laws governing labor relations, airline regulations, railroad management, communications, food and drug regulation and atomic control

Smith Act's Membership Clause Is Questioned Before High Court

By ANTHONY LEWIS

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, April 29—The Supreme Court heard argument today on the long-debated constitutionality of the so-called membership clause of the Smith Act.

The clause makes it a crime to become "a member of" a group that advocates the violent overthrow of the Government. The case heard today concerned Junius Irving Scales, a North Carolina Communist leader convicted under the membership provision.

The Supreme Court has upheld convictions of Communist leaders under the Smith Act for conspiring to advocate violent overthrow. The question today was whether extending the prohibition to members, without showing advocacy by them personally, met constitutional guarantees of free speech and association.

The Government asked the Court to construe the clause so that it did not cover "mere members" of the Communist party, but only those who were active members, who knew its illegal aims and who intended to bring them about. Scale, it said, met all those tests.

John F. Davis, arguing for the Government, said he agreed that Congress could not "punish guilt by mere association." A man might want to join the Communist party because he was "lonely," Mr. Davis said, or "for romantic reasons." But he said Congress could reach the active, knowing supporter.

Justice Hugo L. Black posed the hypothetical case of a political party which, during prohibition days, had a plank urging "open violation of prohibition."

"If a man were an active member of such a party,' the Justice asked, "and he knew its aim and believed in it and intended to carry it out, could he be prosecuted for his membership?"

Mr. Davis said yes, Congress could "constitutionally punish him for using a mechanism [the party] to carry out an illegal aim."

Justice Felix Frankfurter interjected: "He doesn't have to buy the liquor himself."

Telford Taylor of New York, who represented Scales, argued first that the Smith Act could not be read the way the Government suggested—with so many requirements beyond "mere membership"—except by totally distorting it.

Mr. Taylor emphasized that Scales was not himself charged with advocating violent overthrow of the Government.

Instead, the prosecution introduced evidence about the aim of the Communist party in general, Mr. Taylor said. The strongest of this, he asserted, was some comment on the Korean war, "repellent" but not really inciting to violence.

"If documents that are nothing more than polemical attacks on government policy can be relied on to show incitement to violent overthrow," Mr. Taylor said, "we indeed face the constitutional issue."

Justice Frankfurter pointed out that two separate issues were involved in Mr. Taylor's point.

The first was whether the Communist party said things sufficiently dangerous to permit Government repression despite the First Amendment's guarantees of free speech.

The second was whether getting at such danger by punishing membership in the party was, in effect, getting too far ahead of the danger, too "remote" from it to be constitutionally permissible. For example, one could not punish a man who bought matches as a potential arsonist.

In addition to the constitutional question there is a difficult issue of evidence. The court held in 1957 that the Smith Act prohibited only "incitement to action," not "theoretical advocacy," and the question was whether the evidence met that standard in the Scales case.

Several other prosecutions under the membership clause are now awaiting the result of this case.

ABUSES EXAMINED ON HABEAS CORPUS

NEW ORLEANS, May 4 (AP)—Abuse of habeas corpus proceedings, a basic protection of individual rights, came under the scrutiny of the National Association of Attorneys General Monday.

Judge Luther M. Swygert of the Northern District of Indiana reported on a study by an association committee. He cited 6,000 appeals for writs of habeas corpus to Federal Courts in ten years, and said the United States Supreme Court had been swamped with unnecessary applications.

Of the 6,000, he said, only thirty-two applicants have been successful.

The writ requires that a person be brought before a judge or court, especially if the belief exists that his rights have been violated.

This issue is a chief topic at the annual conference because it involves the jurisdiction of Federal and state courts. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and the American Civil Liberties Union have been deeply involved in the long-standing debate.

Attorney General Louis Lefkowitz of New York recommended that the group draft a plan for the compulsory treatment of narcotic addicts.

CLERICS WOULD TEST BIRTH-CONTROL LAW

Special to The New York Times.

NEW HAVEN, May 4—Three New Haven clergymen asked a Superior Court ruling Monday on the constitutionality of Connecticut's seventy-nine-year-old birth control law.

The ministers said the law prohibiting the dissemination of birth-control advice deprived them of their "liberty, freedom of speech and right to freely practice their religions."

The action was brought by the Rev. C. Lawson Willard, pastor of Trinity Protestant Episcopal Church; the Rev. Luther Livingston, pastor of Bethesda Lutheran Church, and the Rev. George Teague, minister of the First Methodist Church.

The ministers said they were "bound by the teachings of the church and their own religious beliefs to counsel married parishioners on the use of contraceptive devices and to advise them and to counsel to use same and to give such advice in premarital counselling."

The court was asked to rule whether the birth-control law conflicted with provision of the state and Federal Constitution guaranteeing free exercise of liberty and speech.

The Supreme Court of Errors, the state's highest court, has rejected two attempts to have the law set aside.

LAWYER'S CRITICISM CALLED UNETHICAL

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, May 20—A representative of the Hawaii Bar Association contended before the Supreme Court today that it was unethical for a lawyer to criticize a pending high-court proceeding, whether or not he was connected with it.

A. William Barlow of Honolulu took this position in the case of Mrs. Harriet Bouslog Sawyer. She was suspended from law practice for a year in Hawaii because of a 1952 speech.

She made the speech while she was defense counsel in a Smith Act trial. She denounced the kind of evidence admitted in such cases.

Justice William O. Douglas asked Mr. Barlow whether it was right for a person to criticize the act, which makes it a crime to advocate the forcible overthrow of the Government.

"Yes," Mr. Barlow said, "but that's not our problem here. She not only held those views, but expressed them during a trial in which she was of counsel."

Justice Hugo L. Black asked: "Suppose she had made the same speech in the same place at the same time, but had not been counsel in the particular case?"

Mr. Barlow said Mrs. Sayer would still have violated the canons of legal ethics.

"So it doesn't depend on the fact that she was counsel," Justice Black said.

"No, sir," Mr. Barlow answered. "But it aggravates the situation."

Supreme Court OKs Quiz Of Educators By Red Probers

SUSAN'S HOLIDAY
Boarding an American Airlines plane for New York at Midway Airport is Susan Heinkel, CBS-TV star of Susan's Show for children. She left for several weeks' vacation, during which she will attend a prom with a boy friend.

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Supreme Court Monday ruled Congress has the right to question educators about their political beliefs in making sweeping investigations of communism.

The 5-to-4 ruling upheld the contempt conviction of Lloyd Barenblatt, a former teacher at Vassar College and the University of Michigan who refused in 1954 to tell the House Un-American Activities Committee whether he was a member of the Communist party.

Justice John M. Harlan, who wrote the majority opinion, said the high court would always be alert against intrusion by Congress into academic teaching—freedom—that "broadly viewed, inquiries cannot be made into the teaching that is pursued in any of our educational institutions."

Not A Sanctuary

But, he said, as to inquiries into communism in the field of education:

"An educational institution is not a constitutional sanctuary from inquiry into matters that may otherwise be within the constitutional legislative domain . . ."

In a dissent, Justice Hugo F. Black noted that Barenblatt relied upon the First (freedom of speech) Amendment, and that the court majority held that First Amendment freedoms may be abridged in the interest of the nation's security. Black added:

"That notion rests on the unarticulated premise that this nation's security hangs upon its power to punish people because of what they think, speak, or write about, or because of those with whom they associate for political purposes. . . .

"I challenge that premise, and deny that ideas can be proscribed under our Constitution. I agree that despotic governments cannot exist without stifling the voice of opposition to their oppressive practices."

Tried in U.S. District Court here, Barenblatt was convicted of contempt of Congress and given a sentence of six months in jail and a $250 fine.

The court set aside a lower federal court's decision that three Virginia laws aimed at the National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People were unconstitutional.

The high court held by a vote of 6-to-3 that the lower tribunal should not have passed on validity of the Virginia laws until state courts have been given a "reasonable opportunity to construe them."

Justice Harlan wrote the majority opinion. Justice William O. Douglas wrote a dissenting opinion in which Chief Justice Earl Warren and Justice William J. Brennan Jr. joined.

Must List Members

Two of the Virginia laws required organizations promoting racial integration, or collecting funds for such purpose, to file with the state the names of members of the groups and complete financial statements.

The third law redefined barratry, or the stirring up of litigation by persons not directly involved.

A special three-judge U.S. District Court in Richmond decided the laws violated the Constitution's guarantees of equal protection and due process of laws. Virginia appealed to the high tribunal to reverse the special court's decision.

Prosecutors Complain Supreme Court Rulings Hurt War on Criminals

Decisions Lead to the Freeing Of Confessed Wrongdoers; Police Say Job Is Harder

Defenders Hail 'Fair Shake'

By WAYNE E. GREEN
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

DALLAS — Thanks to Danny Escobedo and Nick Aguilar, some 100 men who had signed confessions to burglary or narcotics counts have beat their raps here without even trying.

District Attorney Henry Wade dropped charges against the entire group because he believes that U.S. Supreme Court decisions involving Messrs. Escobedo and Aguilar would have made prosecution futile. "Even if we had won convictions I doubt the cases would have stood up on appeals," says Mr. Wade glumly.

In the Escobedo opinion the High Court overturned a death sentence for murder because the Chicago man wasn't allowed to see his attorney before confessing. Mr. Aguilar, from Houston, was likewise successful in his appeal to the Supreme Court; it reversed his 20-year sentence for narcotics possession because, the Court held, police should have presented proof that he had narcotics hidden in his apartment before a search warrant was issued.

The decisions, which run counter to oft-practiced police procedure in many cities, are only two of several landmark Supreme Court pronouncements that have greatly expanded the rights of persons suspected or convicted of non-Federal crimes. All the rulings are bringing broad changes to crime-fighting techniques, and they're fueling a controversy over whether the High Court is tilting the scales of justice too far in favor of the accused in the face of rising crime rates.

Happy Defense Attorneys

Numerous legal experts, particularly civil liberties advocates, applaud the Supreme Court for what they regard as a spelling out of a person's rights against illegal search, seizure, interrogation and detention, rights guaranteed by the Constitution. Such rights, they contend, long have been applicable to Federal law enforcement but too frequently have been flouted by local policemen and state courts.

Not surprisingly, defense attorneys are gleeful about the High Court's decisions. "The police are having to think and work now—using something besides their boots and billies," says Houston trial lawyer Percy Foreman, who expects to free five of his currently jailed clients on appeals prompted by Supreme Court decisions. Adds J. W. (Jake) Ehrlich, noted San Francisco criminal lawyer: "I now approach trial with more assurance that I'll get a fair shake for my client because some of the slipshod police tactics are going out the window."

something besides their boots and billies," says Houston trial lawyer Percy Foreman, who expects to free five of his currently jailed clients on appeals prompted by Supreme Court decisions. Adds J. W. (Jake) Ehrlich, noted San Francisco criminal lawyer: "I now approach trial with more assurance that I'll get a fair shake for my client because some of the slipshod police tactics are going out the window."

But most police and prosecutors heatedly argue they are rapidly losing legal ground in their battle against lawlessness. Citing the Supreme Court's position as the primary reason, Los Angeles District Attorney Evelle J. Younger recently said: "It's now more difficult to convict an individual who has admittedly committed a major crime than at any time in history."

The controversial decisions began in 1961 when the High Court reversed the conviction of a Cleveland woman, Dollree Mapp, for possessing obscene literature. The Supreme Court held that police had entered her home without a search warrant, thus making evidence used against her illegally obtained. Then came the much-publicized Gideon vs. Wainwright decision in 1963 that was to require courts to provide counsel to indigents in felony trials. This was followed by the Escobedo case, which ruled suspects are entitled to see their attorneys before making any statement to police, and the Aguilar opinion, which restricted the use of search warrants.

Rankled Police

Police appear to be most rankled by the Escobedo ruling. Officers in many cities are being instructed by their superiors to advise suspects of their right to see an attorney immediately upon arrest. In Oakland, Calif., policemen automatically recite this statement: "You do not have to say anything unless you wish to and you have a right to see an attorney before you say anything."

Such steps, it's argued, tend to limit the chances of voluntary confessions, which are included in an estimated 70% of criminal cases currently going to trial. "It has been our experience that if suspects are told of their rights, they will not confess. . . ." says former New York City police commissioner Michael Murphy. Mr. Murphy, who now is president of the National Automobile Theft Bureau, contends that police "are forced to fight by Marquis of Queensbury rules while the criminals are permitted to gouge and bite."

The Mapp and Aguilar rulings also are causing no little concern. The Mapp decision prohibits the admission in state courts of evidence obtained by "unreasonable" search or seizure; while the term "unreasonable" is quite general, it has fundamental application, according to police. For instance, officers who stop a motorist just because he looks suspicious cannot legally search his car unless they have a search warrant. And the Aguilar case makes it more difficult to obtain such warrants. It requires that police name before a proper authority the individual who has tipped them that, say, narcotics are being hidden. Previously, it wasn't unusual for search warrants to be issued merely on the assumption of police that illicit goods were being held.

Lecture on Ramifications

Furthermore, "the Aguilar case plays havoc with the stool pigeon because you have to identify him," complains Doug Crouch, district attorney in Fort Worth. Usually, Mr. Crouch says, police informers prefer to be shielded for fear of publicity or reprisal.

All this is creating uncertainty among police concerning their own rights. "The cop practically has to carry a law book around

Memo 9/1/60

A REVIEW OF THE SUMMER would be incomplete without a report on work of the University faculty's Ad Hoc Committee on the Disclaimer Affidavit. A report was issued Aug. 5 by the committee, including Profs. Charles Bunn (Law), chairman; Fred H. Harrington (Vice Pres Acad Aff), J. O. Hirschfelder (Dir Theor Chem Lab), Ralph K. Huitt (Pol Sci), Frederick Olson (Hist UW-M), H. Edwin Young (Chm Econ).

The committee reported that when Congress resumed its session on Aug. 8 there was "no chance of any action at this session on anything more favorable to our position than the bill (S. 2929 as amended) that passed the Senate (June 15)." This was the repealer bill with the Prouty amendment.

The bill (1) repeals the requirement for the disclaimer affidavit altogether; (2) makes it unlawful for any person to "apply for or receive any grant, payment or loan under this act (the N.D.E.A.) while he is a member of the Communist party or any other organization having for one of its purposes or objectives the seizure or overthrow of the government of the United States (or of any State or local government) by the use of force or violence, and has knowledge of such purpose or objective of that part or other organization"; (3) makes it unlawful for any person who within five years has been a member of such Party or other organization to apply under the Act unless his application is accompanied by a full sworn statement about such (former) membership; (4) makes it a federal crime knowingly to violate subsection (2) or (3).

"Needless to say, the Committee still believes that the disclaimer affidavit should be repealed outright," the report said. "But, we repeat, outright repeal is not a viable legislative alternative." The committee described the Senate bill as "a very great improvement over no repeal," and listed these reasons:

(1) repeals entirely the requirement for the disclaimer affidavit;
(2) eliminates all inquiry into belief;
(3) makes illegality depend on overt acts;
(4) limits other organizations described to those whose purposes include seizure or overthrow of government by force or violence, and eliminates present language about "other unconstitutional or illegal means";
(5) limits offenders to those who "willfully" violate prohibitions stated, and to one who "has knowledge of such purpose or objective" of the organization of which he is a member;
(6) confines administration (by making it a criminal law) to the Department of Justice, United States attorneys, and Federal courts and juries throughout the country.

The committee took no action in the name of the faculty, suggesting individual communications to members of Congress. Fate of the bill may have been determined by the time this MEMO reaches your hands.

Civ Liberties

Mr. Emory Via School for Workers
University of Wisconsin
Madison, Wisconsin

Dear Emory:

Thanks very much for forwarding the two issues of the Progressive containing articles dealing with the subject we recently discussed. This was very thoughtful of you.

I finally managed to obtain a copy of one version of the Purdue Research Center teenage survey of civil liberties attitudes. A copy of that questionnaire, as I used it in connection with my recent discussion of this issue, is enclosed. A more sophisticated version of this questionnaire is available through the Purdue Research Center if you are interested. I believe that it is incorporated in Monograph No. 30.

The enclosed questionnaire was administered to the group in question the evening of Sunday, February 3rd and I met with the group one week later. Rather than giving a talk I reviewed the results and discussed each question in terms of its relevance in the Milwaukee area. This proved to be a very successful way of dealing with the subject. It evoked a ready and intelligent response. A straight talk on civil liberties wouldn't have been nearly as effective.

Thanks again.

Sincerely and fraternally,

Dick Humphreys mm

PROBABLE CAUSE FOR ARREST

The U. S. Supreme Court is increasing its span of influence in the area of arrest. In Wong Sun v. United States, 371 U.S. 471 (1963) the court examined an arrest made by Federal agents and held that it was without probable cause, and the confession of the defendant that was closely connected with this arrest was excluded -- so also the subsequent "fruits" of this confession. Soon thereafter the court held in Ker v. California, 374 U.S. 23 (1963), that state police who had observed the defendant meet a known narcotics peddler and who also had information from a reliable informer had probable cause to make an arrest of the defendant and his wife in their apartment. The unique aspect of this case was that the police with a passkey entered the room of the defendant without a warrant, but the court upheld this manner of arrest as justified under local California law.

On November 23, 1964, the Supreme Court in a 6-3 decision re-evaluated the facts underlying an arrest to determine if "probable cause" existed to justify the arrest and subsequent search. The arresting officer knew the defendant had a record for "numbers game" violations and had heard reports that the defendant was involved in the "numbers game." The defendant was arrested in his automobile by an officer without a warrant. The defendant was taken to the police station where he was searched. This search revealed the evidence on which he was subsequently convicted. His conviction was affirmed by the Supreme Court of Ohio, which said:

> "Therefore, a question of fact is presented in each case, and where the facts in the possession of the police are sufficient to cause a reasonable and prudent man to believe that a felony has been committed and that the accused committed it, probable cause is present.

"In the hearing on the motion of defendant to suppress, an arresting officer testified that the arrest was made on the basis of information supplied by an informer, coupled with a knowledge of defendant's prior history. Here, there was not an arrest merely for an exploratory search. According to the testimony, the police, based on the information they had, were actually looking for the defendant for the purpose of arresting him." State v. Beck, 175 Ohio St. 73, 191 N.E.2d 825, 828 (1963) (Two judges dissenting)

However, the U. S. Supreme Court said:

"When the constitutional validity of an arrest is challenged, it is the function of a court of determine whether the facts available to the officers at the moment of the arrest would 'warrant a man of reasonable caution in the belief' that an offense has been committed. Carroll v. United States, 267 U.S. 132,162. If the court is not informed of the facts upon which the arresting officers acted, it cannot properly discharge that function. All that the trial court was told in this case was that the officers knew what the petitioner looked like and knew that he had a previous record of arrests or convictions for violations of the clearing house law. Beyond that, the arresting officer who testified said no more than that someone (he did not say who) had told him something (he did not say what) about the petitioner. We do not hold that the officer's knowledge of the petitioner's physical appearance and previous record were either inadmissible or entirely irrelevant upon the issue of probable cause. See Brinegar v. United States, 338 U.S. 160, 172-174. But to hold that these two facts, alone or in combination, of themselves constituted probable cause would be to hold that anyone with a previous criminal record could be arrested at will." Beck v. Ohio, 33 U. S. L. Week 4015, 4017 (U.S. Nov. 1964)

The Supreme Court applied the same test for probable cause as the Ohio Supreme Court but reached a different result from an analysis of the facts. The Supreme Court,"will, where necessary to the determination of constitutional rights, make an independent examination of the facts, the findings, and the record so that it can determine for itself whether in the decision as to reasonableness the fundamental - i.e., constitutional - criteria established by this court have been respected." Beck v. Ohio, 33 U.S.L. Week 4015.

The Supreme Court now imposes an objective standard for probable cause. The underlying facts will be scrutinized in an independent review by the court. An arrest in good faith by the police is not enough, for there must be sufficient facts to indicate to a court the existence of probable cause that the defendant arrested had committed or was committing an offense (not relying on the results of the search simultaneous with or subsequent to the arrest). The trial court now must insure that the record contains sufficient facts to support the conclusion that probable cause was present to support an arrest.

The court granted certiorari under the rule announced in Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961) on the issue of whether the clearing house slips had been seized in violation of the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments. The Supreme Court of Ohio had found that the search was incidental to a lawful arrest. However, the U. S. Supreme Court held that the arrest was not constitutionally valid. The test spelled out by the Supreme Court as the grounds for a valid arrest was:

> "Whether that arrest was constitutionally valid depends in turn upon whether, at the moment the arrest was made, the officers had probable cause to make it -- whether at that moment the facts and circumstances within their knowledge and of which they had reasonable trustworthy information were sufficient to warrant a prudent man in believing that the petitioner had committed or was committing an offense." Beck v. Ohio, 33 U. S. L. Week 4015.

The rule enunciated by the Supreme Court is almost identical to the one announced by the Supreme Court of Ohio (supra), but the courts reach opposite conclusions.

DEFENSE USE OF GRAND JURY MINUTES - IMPEACHMENT

On November 24, 1964 the Illinois Supreme Court in People v. Charles Johnson, __ Ill. 2d __ (1964) held that a defendant in a rape prosecution is entitled to the transcript of grand jury testimony of the complaining witness, after she had testified at the trial, for use for impeachment purposes. The testimony of the prosecutrix at the trial was "vital" to the state's case, and defense counsel properly made his record: first, he ascertained that the prosecutrix had testified before the grand jury concerning matters to which she testified at the trial; and, second, he requested her grand jury testimony for impeachment purposes during cross-examination.

Relying upon People v. Moses, 11 Ill. 2d 84, 142 N.E. 2d 1, (1957), and People v. Wolff, 19 Ill. 2d 318, 167 N.E. 2d 197, (1960), which established the defendant's right to access to pretrial statements made by prosecution witnesses for impeachment purposes, the Illinois Court held that the rationale of the Moses-Wolff rule was fully applicable to the grand jury testimony of state's witnesses since none of the reasons for grand jury secrecy are applicable. The policy of grand jury secrecy is intended (1) to prevent the accused from escaping before he is indicted and from tampering with witnesses; (2) to protect an accused person who is not indicted against unwarranted exposure; (3) to encourage uninhibited deliberations by the grand jurors; and (4) to encourage witnesses to testify before the grand jury without fear of public disclosure. (8 Wigmore on Evidence, 3rd ed., sec. 2360.)

The Court stated:

> "None of those reasons is applicable to the present case, where the accused seeks only the transcript of the testimony of a witness who has testified at the trial. Plainly the disclosure of grand jury minutes after an indictment is returned and the case proceeds to trial will involve no danger of flight by the accused and no risk of damage to his reputation. Nor is it to be expected that he will tamper with a witness who has already testified against him. There will be no impediment to future grand jury deliberations since such deliberations will remain secret. Finally, it is in no sense unfair to a witness who testifies at the trial to reveal his previous testimony."

The Illinois Court rejected the rationale of Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co. v. United States, 360 U.S. 395 (1958), requiring a defendant to show a "particularized need" for grand jury testimony of a government trial witness before they will be made available for use for impeachment purposes, stating that "the majority in Pittsburgh Plate Glass assessed the policy of secrecy differently."

For some background to this decision, see Dowling, Defense Use of Grand Jury Testimony for Impeachment in Illinois, 52 Ill. Bar Journal 522 (Mar. 1964). The article may be helpful in establishing the right of the defense to make use of grand jury testimony for impeachment purposes in other states.

RIGHT TO COUNSEL CASES SINCE ESCOBEDO

In the last issue of the Newsletter, the decision of People v. Dorado, 40 Cal. Rptr. 264, 394 P. 2d 952 (1964), petition for rehearing granted, was discussed. (Re-argument of this case took place on December 15, 1964, but results not known at the time this Newsletter was printed.) In that case an accused had not been advised of his right to counsel nor his right to remain silent prior to the taking of his confession. This accused made no request for counsel to the police authorities, but the California Court held that the confession was inadmissible under the rule set forth in Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478 (1964). The Illinois Supreme Court had occasion to rule on a similar fact situation and held contrariwise. In People v. Hartgraves, 202 N.E.2d 33 (Ill. 1964), petition for rehearing denied, decided on November 23, 1964, the police officers did not advise the accused of his right to remain silent or his right to counsel prior to the taking of the confession. The court in holding that the confession was admissible said:

> "It is true that defendant was not affirmatively warned that his confession might be used against him, but it has been held that this does not render a confession incompetent. (People v. Davis, 10 Ill. 2d 430, 140 N.E.2d 675; People v. Fox, 319 Ill. 606, 150 N.E. 347.) We have re-examined these holdings in the light of Haynes v. State of Washington, 373 U.S. 503, 83 S. Ct. 1336, 10 L. ed. 2d 513, relied upon by defendant, and the more recent decision in Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478, 84 S. Ct. 1758, 12 L. ed. 2d. 977, filed June 22, 1964. As we read the Haynes case, the United States Supreme Court merely stated that the failure to warn a defendant and advise him of his right to remain silent, is an attendant circumstance, 'which the accused is entitled to have appropriately considered in determining voluntariness and admissibility of his confession.' 373 U.S. at 517, 83 S. Ct. at 1345.
> "In the Escobedo case, the United States Supreme Court held that the refusal of a request to consult with counsel, coupled with a failure to warn accused of his right to remain silent, amounted to a denial of 'the Assistance of Counsel' as guaranteed by the Sixth Amendment to the United States Constitution.
> "In the present case the trial court considered testimony of the failure to warn the accused, and there is no evidence that defendant requested the assistance of counsel. Under all the facts and circumstances of this case, we hold that the failure to warn the accused did not compel a rejection of the confession." 202 N.E.2d 33, 35.

The opinion of the New York Supreme Court, Queens County (a court of original jurisdiction) in People v. Agar, decided on November 12, 1964, indicates the need for clarification in this area of the law. This court agreed with the Hartgraves decision (possibly without knowledge of this case), but also said:

"It may well be that the conclusion of the Supreme Court of the State of California, in Dorado, will be the ultimate indisputable determination of the United States Supreme Court if the question reaches that Court, as it is now constituted, but until there has been an appellate ruling to the contrary, which is binding upon the court, I will continue to rule that, unless counsel is requested, a confession or a statement made by a defendant under the circumstances here present is admissible against him, and that he need not be cautioned that anything he says will be used against him." 33 U.S.L. Week 2247

The courts have also reviewed the single issue of the affirmative duty of the police to advise the defendant of his right to remain silent, and the effect of a failure to do so on the admissibility of a subsequent confession. Oregon and the District of Columbia appear to have a common approach. In State v. Neely, 395 P.2d 557 (Ore. 1964), the Supreme Court of Oregon on September 30, 1964, said:

"We conclude that the Escobedo decision requires that the accused be effectively warned of his constitutional right to remain silent and that if this is not affirmatively shown by the state, a confession obtained without such warning is inadmissible. Whether law enforcement officers must in addition advise an accused of his right to counsel and whether it is necessary that this advice be given by a magistrate we need not now decide."

Although holding that the confession was admissible the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia reached a similar result. In Jackson v. United States, (D.C. Cir. 1964), 33 U.S.L. Week 2111, the court on August 13, 1964, held that when the accused had been repeatedly advised of his right to remain silent although not advised of his right to counsel, the confession was admissible.

RECENT CHANGES

New Pennsylvania Rules of Criminal Procedure (Pa. Stat. Ann., tit. 19-app., Rules 1-322) become effective on January 1, 1965. These new rules include a provision: (1) for use of summons in lieu of an arrest warrant for summary offenses (Rules 107 & 108), (2) for the request of a bill of particulars delivered directly to the attorney for the Commonwealth, while other pretrial discovery is at the discretion of the court (Rules 221 & 310), and (3) for a pretrial conference (Rule 311). In implementing the decision of Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963) and related cases, counsel is assigned in capital cases "as soon as practicable after the preliminary arraignment" and in non-capital cases "as soon as practicable after the case has been docketed" (Rule 318). The distinction in the time of appointment of counsel is based on the interpretation of White v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 59 (1963) where the preliminary hearing was a critical stage in the criminal proceeding in a capital case requiring the appointment of counsel. Pennsylvania has by statute adopted an "Application Form for the Assignment of Counsel" (Rule 318A) which might offer guidance to other jurisdictions in drafting a statement by the indigent defendant listing his financial resources.

The Supreme Court has not established the minimum offense for which counsel is necessary, but Justice Harlan in his concurring opinion held that counsel is required for trial of an offense involving "a substantial prison sentence." Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335, 351 (1963). To determine the nature or type of offenses for which counsel must be furnished, a look at recent enactments might prove helpful. The Criminal Justice Act of 1964 (P.L. 88-455, August 20, 1964) which provides compensation for attorneys and related services in the defense of impecunious defendants in federal courts requires the appointment of counsel in felony and misdemeanor cases, but not petty offenses. A petty offense is an offense for which a defendant can receive a fine of not more than five hundred dollars ($500) or imprisonment for not more than six months (18 U.S.C. 1). The Illinois legislature in passing the Code of Criminal Procedure of 1963 (effective January 1, 1964) announced a very liberal standard:

> "In all cases except where the penalty is a fine only, if the court determines that the defendant is indigent and desires counsel, the Public Defender shall be appointed as counsel. If there is no Public Defender in the county or if the defendant requests counsel other than the Public Defender, the court shall appoint as counsel a licensed attorney at law of this state." Ill. Rev. Stat. Ch. 38, Section 113-3(b). (Emphasis added)

The Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts on June 29, 1964, established a similar requirement in Rule 10 which states:

> "If a defendant charged with a crime, for which a sentence of imprisonment may be imposed, appears in any court without counsel, the judge shall advise him of his right to counsel, and assign counsel to represent him at every stage of the proceeding unless he elects to proceed without counsel or is able to obtain counsel." (Emphasis added)

The rule of the Gideon case, which involved a felony conviction for which the defendant received a sentence of five years imprisonment does not force the results achieved in the above legislation and court rule. These rules however, might be an accurate interpretation of the Gideon rule in determining the type of criminal offenses for which counsel must be furnished if the defendant is indigent.

GENERAL INFORMATION

The NLADA and the ABA Standing Committee on Legal Aid and Indigent Defendants have jointly published a pamphlet entitled Guidelines for Adequate Defense Systems. Copies of the pamphlet may be obtained from the National Defender Project.

The National Advisory Council for the National Defender Project will meet in New Orleans on February 11-13, 1965, following the mid-year meeting of the ABA.

Under the auspices of New York Attorney General Louis J. Lefkowitz, a state-wide conference of county bar representatives was held in Syracuse on November 14, 1964. Representatives from throughout the state discussed the various methods employed in New York for providing representation for the indigent defendant. Four systems are used: (1) county option Public Defender; (2) county option contract with Legal Aid Society; (3) centralized assigned counsel system (a paid director coordinates assignment of counsel for the county; and (4) assigned counsel system without paid director (most common).

On October 7, 1964 Stetson University College of Law, St. Petersburg, Florida, received a one-year grant from the National Defender Project. The funds will enable the College of Law to establish a Public Defender Clinic to work in conjunction with the Circuit Public Defender, Robert E. Jagger. In November 1964 two members of the National Defender Project staff had an opportunity to visit the College of Law and the Public Defender's Office. The program is now in full operation and has already generated much law school and community interest.

We would appreciate receiving any recent cases within your jurisdiction that would be of interest to defenders in other parts of the country.

STATE INTERPRETATIONS OF THE ESCOBEDO AND MASSIAH CASES

State court cases interpreting and construing the effect of Massiah v. United States, 377 U.S. 201 (1964), and Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478 (1964) are mounting. An earlier Newsletter (Vol. II, No. 1, Jan. 2, 1965) cited three state Supreme Court cases dealing with the scope and application of the Escobedo rule. Those cases were People v. Dorado, 394 P. 2d 952 (Cal. 1964); People v. Hartgraves, 202 N.E. 2d 33 (Ill. 1964); and State v. Neely, 395 P. 2d 557 (Ore. 1964).

To provide some knowledge of the breadth of the problem of accurately applying the Escobedo rule to individual fact situations and to present some of the conflicting rules of law, the following summary of cases is listed:

CALIFORNIA - People v. Dorado, Crim. 7468, January 29, 1965. Since the last issue of the Newsletter, the Supreme Court of California issued an opinion upon rehearing consistent with their earlier decision. In a 4-3 decision, Justice Tobriner held that when the police officials failed to advise the accused of his absolute right to remain silent or the right to consult with counsel, his subsequent confession would be inadmissible even though he had not made a formal request for counsel, a fact present in the Escobedo case. The court stated:

> "The constitutional right (to counsel) does not arise from the request for counsel but from the advent of the accusatory stage itself."

- In re Lopez, 33 U.S.L. Week 2390 (January 29, 1965). The right to assistance of counsel as announced in the Massiah and Escobedo cases is not retroactive.

HAWAII - State v. Kitashiro, 397 P.2d 558 (1964). The Supreme Court of Hawaii considered the issue of whether Escobedo made the McNabb-Mallory rule (the failure of police authorities to bring a defendant promptly before a commissioner renders a confession obtained during the unlawful delay inadmissible) applicable to the states and held that it did not. The court said:

> "While Escobedo marks a shift in course, upon comparison with Crooker v. California, 357 U.S. 433, Cicenia v. LaGay, 357 U.S. 504, Culombe v. Connecticut, 367 U.S. 568, and Haynes v. Washington, 373 U.S. 503, the point pertinent here is that emphasis was put upon the right to counsel. The McNabb-Mallory rule was not extended to state cases. It remains the rule in this jurisdiction that a confession obtained during unlawful delay between arrest and production before a magistrate is not ipso facto inadmissible." 397 P.2d 558, 564.

IDAHO - State v. Hall, 397 P.2d 261 (1964). While under investigation for a charge of assault to commit rape, the defendant, an airman, was advised by a U.S. Air Force investigating agent of the nature of the offense, his right not to make any statement, and the possible use of the statement against him. (See 10 USC 831.) The record did not disclose that the defendant requested counsel, and the record is likewise silent that the defendant was advised as to his right to counsel. The majority of the court held the confession to be admissible and reversed on other grounds, but Justice McQuade in a special concurring opinion said:

> "While the case of Escobedo v. Illinois, supra, rules that statements made in the absence of counsel are inadmissible, the conclusion is inevitable that investigators must inform the defendant that he has a right to counsel before the interrogation is conducted." 397 P.2d 261, 269.

ILLINOIS - People v. Hartgraves, (supra). The Illinois Supreme Court construed Escobedo on its facts, holding that a confession is admissible even though the suspect has neither been advised of his right to remain silent nor of his right to confer with counsel. (Contra to People v. Dorado, supra.)

INDIANA - Hayden v. State, 201 N.E.2d 329 (1964). In this case a 15-year-old boy was convicted of a robbery-murder in a "purse-grab" from an 82-year-old woman. This youthful defendant was held in police headquarters one day prior to the signing of his first written confession, and before such confession was signed, this boy was advised of his constitutional rights to remain silent and to see an attorney. On appeal it was contended that this defendant, because of his tender age, could not waive his constitutional right to counsel. The court affirmed the conviction and held:

"Under other circumstances, we might concur in appellant's contention, but here it is apparent from the facts in evidence that appellant was worldly wise far beyond the years of his 'tender age.' " 201 N.E.2d 329-330.

IOWA - State v. Fox, 131 N.W.2d 684 (1964). After the defendant was arraigned in a prosecution for rape, a police officer asked the defendant to tell the sheriff how he "got loused up in a deal like this." In response, the defendant made an incriminating statement. No objection was made when this statement was introduced into evidence. The court acknowledged that the defendant had the right to refuse to answer questions of the police and that before answering questions he was entitled to the advice of counsel. However, the court held that these statements were admissible and distinguished the Escobedo case in the following manner:

"It appears from the Escobedo case that each case must largely turn upon its own facts, but we are sure there is no departure in that case from our rule that evidence as to purely voluntary statements made by one accused of a crime, otherwise material, is admissible. True, the latest Supreme Court pronouncement in the Escobedo case perhaps leaves one with the thought that any evidence of a statement made by one accused either before or after arraignment, not made in the presence of counsel, is inadmissible (see dissent therein), but we are satisfied the holding in that case was predicated upon those facts which disclosed a police interrogation of the accused when his attorney was being excluded and was unable to advise him. There are no such circumstances here, and we think the testimony as to [defendant's] admission was properly accepted, especially so where no objection to it appears in the record." 131 N.W.2d 684, 686.

KENTUCKY - Carson v. Commonwealth, 382 S.W.2d 85 (1964). The defendant (over sixteen years) was convicted of murder and sentenced to death. Prior to taking his confession, he was advised of his right to have counsel, that he was not required to make any statement, and that any statement made could be used against him. The court adhered to Crooker v. California, 357 U.S. 433, (1958), holding that a denial of a request to contact counsel was not an infringement of the constitutional right of the defendant without regard to circumstances of the case. The circumstances of each confession would be reviewed, and the defendant could waive this right to consult with counsel. The Court of Appeals of Kentucky stated:

"We subscribe to the reasoning of the Supreme Court as expressed. If an accused may refuse opportunity to consult counsel and then claim denial of due process to foreclose admission of a statement voluntarily made, shrewd criminals will be quick to grasp the opportunity to confess > without counsel, thus gaining complete acquittal without any trial. That this would present an anomaly is not to overstate the case." 382 S.W.2d 85, 91.

Escobedo was distinguished on the ground that the defendant here was advised of his right to counsel and his right to remain silent.

MARYLAND - Anderson v. State, 205 A.2d 281 (1964). The Court of Appeals of Maryland held that at least where it does not appear that the defendant requested counsel during police interrogation, Escobedo does not require rejection of an otherwise voluntary confession. Here the police testimony indicated that the defendant was advised that his statement could be used against him. He was also advised that his statement had to be "voluntary." The same result was reached in Swartz v. State, 205 A.2d 803 (1965), where this court said:

> "We have held that the Supreme Court limited the effect of Escobedo to the facts before it in that case and that one of those decisive facts was that the accused there had repeatedly and in terms asked to see a previously retained lawyer and had been refused. Here no request for a lawyer whatever was made and Escobedo, in our view, does not control." 205 A.2d 803, 804.

MASSACHUSETTS - Commonwealth v. McCarthy, 200 N.E.2d 264 (1964). On a hearing on a motion to suppress the confession of the defendant, the evidence indicated that the confession was made six months after indictment to police officers, who knew that an attorney represented the defendant. The defendant did not request counsel until he had made his confession to the stenographer. The Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts held that the confession was inadmissible under the rule announced in the Massiah case.

NEVADA - Bean v. State, 33 U.S.L. Week 2390 (January 22, 1965). The express request for counsel is a prerequisite for the application of the Escobedo exclusionary rule to a confession. The Nevada Supreme Court refused to follow the Dorado decision (California), which it believed to be an extension of the rule in the Escobedo case.

NEW JERSEY - State v. Vigliano, 43 N.J. 44, 202 A.2d 657 (1964). The defendant, a police officer, talked with his fiancee about obtaining an attorney, not specifically named, while in police custody under investigation for the murder of his mother. Although the opinion fails to indicate whether the defendant was advised of his right to remain silent or his right to confer with counsel, the court evaluated the facts in the case and found that he had made no affirmative request to speak with an attorney.

The court held that the confession was voluntary and admissible and placed emphasis on the fact he was a police officer and no stranger to law enforcement. (The case was reversed on other grounds).

- State v. Johnson, 33 U.S.L. Week 2375 (1965). Although the Gideon rule is retroactive, the New Jersey Supreme Court held that Escobedo rule is not to be given retroactive effect:

> "There are however several factors which distinguish Gideon from Escobedo. First, Gideon itself was a collateral attack while Escobedo was a direct appeal. Second, the opinion in Escobedo does not indicate whether the court intended retroactive application. Unlike the treatment of Betts v. Brady, 316 U.S. 455 (1942), in Gideon which overruled that case, there is not the slightest intimation in Escobedo that either Cicenia v. LaGay, 357 U.S. 504, or Crooker v. California, 357 U.S. 433, was an 'abrupt break with its own well-considered precedents,' see Gideon at 344, or 'departed from the sound wisdom upon which the court's holding in Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45, rested', Id. at 345; or was 'an anachronism when handed down.' Unlike Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961), there is no language in the court's opinion in Escobedo which provides ammunition for arguing whether retroactive effect was intended. ***
> "And unlike Griffin v. Illinois, 351 U.S. 12 (1956), Escobedo does not contain a concurring opinion indicating that the majority intended retroactive application. See Justice Frankfurter, concurring, Id. at 20. Third, no subsequent adjudication by the Supreme Court nor any other court has come to our attention which reveals whether Escobedo was intended to be applied retroactively. As noted above, Gideon has been given retroactive application in a number of cases. Griffin was applied retroactively in Eskridge v. Washington State Board, 357 U.S. 214 (1958)."

NEW MEXICO - Pece v. Cox, 396 P.2d 422 (1964). The Supreme Court of New Mexico refused to hold a confession inadmissible because the defendant had no attorney when the statement was made and relied upon the decision of Crooker v. California, 357 U.S. 433 (1958). The court held:

> "Petitioner relies on Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478. However, we are impressed that the proper rule to be applied is that announced in Crooker v. California, 357 U.S. 433, distinguished in Escobedo, supra, on its facts. Here, petitioner had no attorney when the statement was given and claims that he had not been advised (as is clearly set forth in the form on which the confession was typed) that he did not have to make any statement at all, and that if he did make a statement it could be used against him on a trial. Also, when all the circumstances are weighed, not the least of which was the fact that a codefendant who was at the time represented by counsel also gave a statement which was admitted in evidence by the trial court after a foundation as to its voluntary character had been ruled on by the judge, just as was done in the case of petitioner, we are impressed that prejudice is not demonstrated. Crooker v. California, supra, is controlling." 396 P.2d 422.

NEW YORK - People v. Stanley, 15 N.Y.2d 30, 203 N.E.2d 475 (1964). The Federal Grand Jury indicted the defendant for the crime of inducing Schermond to transport money across state lines in order to defraud him of that money. (18 U.S.C. 2314). The defendant was later released on bail and immediately taken into custody by New York City police officers for an offense arising out of the same transaction and was questioned by them in the absence of counsel. Statements by this defendant were received by the New York trial court in evidence against him, and he was convicted of grand larceny by stealing money from Schermond and another man. Using the distinction that the state offense was a different crime upon which the defendant had neither been arraigned nor indicted, the New York Court of Appeals sustained the admissibility of this inculpatory statement. In a dissenting opinion Chief Judge Desmond indicated that the cooperation of the federal and state officers in prosecuting the same alleged criminal activity had proceeded to a point where there had been an actual arraignment on the federal indictment. These federal and state offenses had become interwoven, and the accused was entitled to counsel prior to making a statement to the state officers.

NORTH CAROLINA - State v. Stinson, 139 S.E.2d 558 (1965). A police officer received a note from the defendant in custody that he wished to see the officer. During their conversation the defendant said he was guilty of a breaking and entering offense, and this statement was admitted in evidence against him. The Supreme Court of North Carolina held that the officer under the circumstances was not required to warn the defendant that anything he said might be used against him.

- State v. Elam, 139 S.E.2d 601 (1965). The defendant had been advised of his right not to make a statement and his right to counsel, but he declined to talk to a lawyer and confessed. The defendant contended on appeal that his confession should have been excluded under the Escobedo case. The court held the confession to be admissible and said:

"We hold that under the circumstances here surrounding the making of the extrajudicial confessions of guilt by the defendant as shown by the evidence he was not denied the constitutional right to the benefit of counsel, because, if he had any such right, he intelligently and understandingly waived it." 139 S.E.2d 601, 607.

OHIO - State v. McLeod, 1 Ohio St. 2d 60, 203 N.E. 2d 349 (1964). Seven days after the defendant was indicted for murder and before he procured or was assigned counsel, the defendant voluntarily made an oral confession to a deputy sheriff and an assistant prosecuting attorney while riding around in the sheriff's automobile searching for the gun used in the holdup. In June 1964 the Supreme Court of the United States had remanded this case to the Ohio Supreme Court in light of Massiah v. United States, 377 U.S. 201 (1964), but on December 29, 1964, the Supreme Court of Ohio announced its opinion and adhered to its original decision that the confession was admissible. The court stated:

> "The circumstances here being different as to the manner in which the statements were obtained in the Massiah case, we are of the opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeals should be affirmed." 203 N.E. 2d 349, 352.

The dissenting judges (O'Neill and Gibson) stated that the exclusionary rule of the Massiah case was applicable and thought that the majority was erroneous in distinguishing Massiah on the basis of factual differences.

OREGON - People v. Neely (supra). The Supreme Court of Oregon held:

> "We conclude that the Escobedo decision requires that the accused be effectively warned of his constitutional right to remain silent and that if this is not affirmatively shown by the state, a confession obtained without such warning is inadmissible." 395 P. 2d 557.

PENNSYLVANIA - Commonwealth v. Coyle, 415 Pa. 379, 203 A. 2d 782 (1964). The defendant was convicted of murdering a policeman in Philadelphia and sentenced to death. The defendant was not apprehended immediately after the murder. Later in Massachusetts he and his brother committed a robbery and had a gun battle with police. Eleven days after the killing in Philadelphia and one day after the robbery and gun battle he was taken into custody by the Massachusetts police. One hour and forty minutes later he was interrogated by a Massachusetts state police detective. He was not advised of his right to remain silent, did not have counsel, and was not offered the assistance of counsel. There is some conflict in the evidence as to whether or not he requested counsel at this time. During the course of this interrogation, the appellant not only admitted his criminal activity in the state of Massachusetts, but also admitted being on the scene at the time the Philadelphia police officer was killed. Later the defendant was advised of his right not to make a statement and that counsel would be provided if he sought such assistance. At that time he stated that he did not need counsel and proceeded to give a more detailed statement as to his criminal activity in Philadelphia describing his movements in the police officer's killing. The Pennsylvania Supreme Court held that the confession was admissible.

Two points of the court's reasoning in allowing the introduction in evidence of this admission were: (1) the main focal point of the interrogation by the Massachusetts state police detective was not the police officer's killing but rather the Massachusetts robbery, and (2) assuming that the admissions made to this Massachusetts state police detective were tainted with some degree of constitutional infirmity, the same admissions were made to a district attorney after the defendant had made an intelligent waiver of the assistance of counsel. Justice Cohen dissented and had serious doubt about the admissibility into evidence of these uncounseled statements. (Note: One point the court did not specifically consider was the fact the first tainted confession to the Massachusetts state police detective might have affected the untainted confession to the district attorney, because having made an incriminating oral statement, the defendant "had let the cat out of the bag.")

- Commonwealth v. Patrick, 206 A. 2d 295 (1965). The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania cited and followed the Illinois decision of People v. Hartgraves, supra. The court said:

> "(W)e conclude that a statement or confession made during interrogation by the police, if voluntarily made, may be constitutionally admissible in evidence even though the accused was neither warned of his right to remain silent, nor of his right to counsel." 206 A. 2d 295, 300.

RHODE ISLAND - State v. Dufour, 206 A. 2d 82 (1965). The Supreme Court of Rhode Island cited and followed People v. Dorado, (Aug. 1964), supra. In this case the defendant had only been requested to go to the police station for the purpose of questioning and did not request counsel prior to making his confession, and the court said:

> "In Escobedo the defendant requested the assistance of counsel and was refused. In this respect that case differs from the case at bar but in the course of its opinion the supreme court made it clear, we think, that the defendant in such circumstances must not only have been advised of his right to assistance of counsel when requested but he must also have been warned of his right to remain silent." 206 A. 2d 82, 85.

The rule enunciated goes further than the Dorado (Jan. 1965) opinion delivered after rehearing. This case is the most liberal extension of Escobedo.

TENNESSEE - Campbell v. State, 384 S. W. 2d 4 (1964). The defendant was taken into custody and questioned about two burglaries. A day after the defendant had been arrested his counsel tried to contact him at the police station, but on the first two occasions he was denied permission to see him. When the attorney went back the third time, the chief of police stated he wanted to talk to the defendant first and requested the attorney give him 30 minutes to do it and then the attorney could see him. The attorney granted this request by the chief of police. During this 30-minute period the confession was made, and the defendant had not been advised of his right to remain silent or his right to counsel. The court held that the confession was inadmissible and cited Haynes v. Washington, 373 U.S. 503 (1963), in addition to the Escobedo case.

TEXAS - Turner v. State, 384 S.W.2d 879 (1964). A written confession made to the police after indictment and in the absence of counsel (no request for counsel was made) was held to be admissible. The Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas distinguished the cases of Spano v. New York, 360 U.S. 315 (1959), and Massiah v. United States, 377 U.S. 201 (1964).

VIRGINIA - Ward v. Commonwealth, 138 S.E.2d 293 (1964). After participating with his friend in the murder of his friend's father, the defendant, the age of 19, was questioned by a police officer at his home about his whereabouts. Prior to the defendant making a statement to the officer, the defendant's father said to him, "You don't have to say anything unless you see an attorney. Just give him your name and address and such." The defendant replied, "No, I want to tell you." Defendant then described the murder, but stated that the gun in his possession accidentally went off. This statement was later reduced to writing. The Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia held the confession was admissible and distinguished the Escobedo case. The court went on to say:

> "It is not necessary for us to pass upon the 'totality' theory advanced by defendant for here it is apparent that the statements complained of were made voluntarily. In fact, it appears that the defendant insisted upon telling all. Certainly there is no rule of law which requires an arresting officer to close his ears to voluntary statements made by a person in his presence." 138 S.E.2d 293, 299

WISCONSIN - Browne v. State, 131 N.W.2d 169 (1964). The defendant contended that his admissions before trial to police officers should have been excluded from evidence in the absence of: (1) either representation by counsel before making such admissions or the intelligent waiver of counsel; and (2) the police officers informing the defendant of his constitutional right to remain silent and not say anything in response to questions. The Supreme Court of Wisconsin held that the Escobedo rule did not support such contentions and was limited to its circumstances, particularly Escobedo's repeated request to speak with his lawyer. Another interesting facet of the case was that the defendant asserted as error the trial court's denial of his constitutional right to try his own case without counsel. His conviction was affirmed, and the motion for a rehearing denied.

GIDEON EXTENDED TO A MISDEMEANOR OFFENSE

In Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963), the Supreme Court held that the Sixth Amendment provision for the assistance of counsel is applicable to state trials by the Fourteenth Amendment. Gideon had been convicted of a felony and was sentenced to serve five years in the state prison. Justice Black in the opinion of the court held:

> "The right of one charged with crime to counsel may not be deemed fundamental and essential to fair trial in some countries, but it is in ours." 372 U.S. 335, 344. (Emphasis added)

There is no indication in this opinion that the right to be represented by counsel would be limited to felony cases. Justice Harlan, in a concurring opinion, said:

> "The special circumstances rule has been formally abandoned in capital cases, and the time has now come when it should be similarly abandoned in noncapital cases, at least as to offenses which, as the one involved here, carry the possibility of a substantial prison sentence. (Whether the rule should extend to all criminal cases need not now be decided.)" 372 U. S. 335, 351

On January 12, 1965, the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit decided the case of Harvey v. Mississippi (No. 22005). The defendant, a Negro farmer in Mississippi, was charged with the misdemeanor of "possession of whiskey," which is punishable by a fine of up to $500 and up to 90 days in jail. The defendant informally entered a plea of guilty to the Justice of the Peace, and both the Justice of the Peace and the defendant Harvey spoke in terms of a fine as punishment for the offense. During his trial Harvey was not represented by counsel. Sentence was entered on the record of the Justice of the Peace as a $500 fine and a 90-day jail term, but the mittimus order or arrest of the defendant was not issued until the 40-day statutory period for taking an appeal had expired. After Harvey was put in jail counsel filed a writ of habeas corpus in the district court which was denied. On ruling on the matter whether the defendant had a right to counsel during the trial of this offense, the Court of Appeals held:

> "While the rule as thus stated has never been expressly extended to misdemeanor charges in state tribunals, it has been argued that such a principle is implicit in the Supreme Court's decision in Gideon v. Wainwright, 1963, 372 U.S. 335. Be this as it may, the reasoning in [Evans v. Rives, 126 F.2d 633 (D.C.Cir. 1942)] along with other right-to-counsel decisions persuades us that we should apply that rule in the present case. See Hamilton v. Alabama, supra; White v. Maryland, supra.

> The failure of notice to Harvey of his right to the assistance of counsel invalidated his guilty plea and rendered his conviction and incarceration constitutionally improper."

The Evans case mentioned in the above quote and relied upon by the court was a 1942 decision by the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia which held that a defendant who received a sentence of one year in jail for nonsupport of a minor child was entitled to counsel even though the offense was classified as a misdemeanor. This pre-Gideon federal decision said:

> "And so far as the right to the assistance of counsel is concerned, the Constitution draws no distinction between loss of liberty for a short period and such loss for a long one." 126 F. 2d 633, 638.

The new Criminal Justice Act in providing compensation for counsel in federal courts states:

> "(b) Appointment of Counsel - In every criminal case in which the defendant is charged with a felony or a misdemeanor, other than a petty offense, and appears without counsel, the United States commissioner or the court shall advise the defendant that he has the right to be represented by counsel and that counsel will be appointed to represent him if he is financially unable to obtain counsel." (P.L. 88-455, 18 U.S.C. 3006A) (Emphasis added)

A petty offense is defined as any misdemeanor the penalty for which does not exceed imprisonment for a period of six months or a fine or not more than $500 or both. (18 U.S.C.A. Sec. 1) The Harvey case goes much further than the Evans case and the provisions of the Criminal Justice Act of 1964 and extends counsel to those cases which might otherwise be described as petty or summary offenses. The type of offenses for which counsel will be required will remain in an unsettled area of the law until the Supreme Court provides a clearer pronouncement. (See Kamisar, "Where to Draw the Line," 22 The Legal Aid Brief Case 10 (October, 1963)).

GENERAL INFORMATION

During January and February 1965 the National Defender Project announced several grants for demonstration and law school programs. The grants awarded included: (1) a defender program in the Federal courts in San Francisco fitting within the scope of the Criminal Justice Act of 1964 ($68,942 for three years); (2) the establishment of the Salt Lake Legal Defender Association in Salt Lake County, a non-profit organization, which will replace the uncompensated appointed counsel system previously existing ($44,515 for the first year with additional funds to be made available in the second and third years); (3) the establishment of a Legal Aid Society of Greater Kansas City, Missouri, with a criminal division that will function in all courts of Jackson County ($153,750 for three years); (4) a contingent grant to support a proposed state-wide public defender system for Minnesota ($121,000 for a period of two years); (5) a comprehensive defender program in Boston, Massachusetts, including representation in the district (lower) courts ($320,000 for three years); (6) a law school program at the University of Virginia in conjunction with a survey in the Municipal Court of Charlottesville, Virginia ($9,500 for one year), and (7) a criminal procedure course and summer internship program at Duke University providing for student training in local state courts ($9,000 for one year).

During February 11-13, 1965, the Advisory Council of the National Defender Project met in New Orleans, and the large National Defender Project grants were reviewed and evaluated:

Kansas City, Missouri (also Boone and Callaway Counties), by Justice Charles E. Whittaker, Retired Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, by Judge William H. Hastie, Circuit Judge of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit.

Boston, Massachusetts, by Judge Frank R. Kenison, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of New Hampshire.

District of Columbia, by Charles B. Murray, Director of the Legal Aid Agency of the District.

New Haven, Connecticut, by Mr. William Pincus of The Ford Foundation.

Those concerned with plans or programs providing counsel in the Federal courts under the Criminal Justice Act of 1964 should review the "Report of the Judicial Conference of the United States," dated January 13, 1965, published by the Administrative Office of the United States Courts. The Judicial Conference approved a system of central disbursement of funds under this Act requiring that the authorization and payment in each case be made by the Administrative Office of the U. S. Courts. The report contains several suggested court plans and provides samples of the forms to be used.

THE RIGHT TO COUNSEL AT THE PRELIMINARY HEARING

Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45 (1932), decided that the right to the appointment of counsel sufficiently in advance of trial to permit effective preparation for trial was an element of due process of law guaranteed the accused by the Fourteenth Amendment. The Supreme Court said that "even the intelligent and educated layman... requires the guiding hand of counsel at every step in the proceedings against him." 287 U.S. 45, 69. But, despite the sweep of the Supreme Court's language, it has been settled law that the guarantee of counsel applies not to every step in the criminal prosecution, but only to what has come to be denominated, with some circularity, "critical stages" of the criminal proceeding.

Hamilton v. Alabama, 368 U.S. 52 (1961), held that arraignment could be such a critical stage when, as in Alabama, it is then, if at all, that the defense of insanity must be raised, that pleas in abatement must be made, or that motions to quash on account of defects in drawing the grand jury must be made.

> " [T] he pitfalls [that face the unrepresented defendant at trial] face an accused in Alabama who is arraigned without having counsel at his side. When one pleads to a capital charge without benefit of counsel, we do not stop to determine whether prejudice resulted.... [T] he degree of prejudice can never be known. Only the presence of counsel could have enabled this accused to know all the defenses available to him and to plead intelligently." 368 U.S. 52, 55.

And in White v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 59 (1963), where the accused, unrepresented by counsel at a preliminary hearing, entered a plea of guilty to a capital offense and that plea was offered in evidence against him at trial after he had, on advice of counsel, pled not guilty at arraignment, the Court held that Hamilton v. Alabama required reversal of the conviction even though the Maryland Court of Appeals had declared that under state law the accused had not been required to plead at the preliminary hearing nor were any rights or defenses preserved or lost at that time. White v. State, 177 A.2d 877, 881-82 (Md. 1961).

> "Whatever may be the normal function of the 'preliminary hearing' under Maryland law, it was in this case as 'critical' a stage as arraignment under Alabama law. For petitioner entered a plea before the magistrate and that plea was taken at a time when he had no counsel.
> "We repeat what we said in Hamilton v. Alabama... that we do not stop to determine whether prejudice resulted: 'Only the presence of counsel could have enabled this accused to know all the defenses available to him and to plead intelligently.'" 373 U.S. 59, 60.

But the Court's brief per curiam opinion in White leaves undetermined the scope of the right guaranteed.

Capital and non-capital distinctions. Though both Hamilton and White were capital cases, and though the language of Hamilton specifically incorporated that fact in the holding, few state decisions suggest that a lower constitutional standard might obtain in non-capital cases. State v. Perra, 125 N.W.2d 44 (Minn. 1963), reasons that Hamilton and White > "appear limited to situations wherein the accused in capital cases, in the absence of counsel, has entered a plea either at his arraignment or at a preliminary hearing and thereby has waived substantial rights." 125 N.W.2d 44, 51 n.3.

The Supreme Court of New Mexico points out the distinction but did not rule on its validity. Sanders v. Cox, 395 P.2d 353 (1964). But generally state courts have found no special significance in the fact that a capital case was before them. Latham v. Crouse, 320 F.2d 120 (10th Cir.), cert. denied 375 U.S. 959 (1963); State v. White, 133 S.E.2d 320 (S.C. 1963). And it seems likely that Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963), having erased the distinction between capital and non-capital offenses in the right to counsel at trial, the distinction is without force at any critical stage. As Justice Clark observed, in his concurring opinion in Gideon,

> "the Constitution makes no distinction between capital and non-capital cases. The Fourteenth Amendment requires due process of law for the deprival of 'liberty' just as for deprival of 'life,' and there cannot constitutionally be a difference in the quality of the process based merely upon a supposed difference in the sanction involved." 372 U.S. 335, 349.

And so at least one court in a non-capital case has reasoned. Alden v. State, 234 F. Supp. 661 (D. Mont. 1964). The Pennsylvania Rules of Criminal Procedure do preserve the distinction, affording counsel to those accused of capital crimes at or before the preliminary hearing, Rule 318(a), while appointing counsel for those accused of non-capital cases only at arraignment, Rule 318(b). But that distinction is based not on theory - the commentator concedes that the "ideal rule" would appoint counsel to every person accused of a crime "even at the preliminary hearing stage" - but on strain upon the state judicial system that would be created by a system of early representation.

> "There are approximately five thousand issuing authorities throughout the state who accept complaints and hold hearings at almost every hour of the day and night. To require counsel to be appointed by a court of record to attend proceedings be-before the minor judiciary - in some instances, many miles away - just would not work." Pa. Rules of Court 1965, p. 455.

Requirement of prejudice. Some courts have understood the White case to mean that the absence of counsel at the preliminary hearing is not a violation of the defendant's constitutional rights if the absence of counsel is not, in the eyes of the court, prejudicial. Thus, in People v. Daniels, 199 N.E. 2d 33 (Ill. App. 1964), an Illinois Appellate Court saw no deprivation of the accused's right to counsel since:

> "There is neither a claim nor any showing that absence of counsel at the preliminary hearing or a failure of an earlier appointment of counsel in any manner prejudiced the defendant or in any way adversely infected or contaminated the subsequent proceedings in this case." 199 N.E. 2d 33 at 34.

To the same effect, see Warner v. Commonwealth, 386 S.W. 2d 455, 456 (Ky. 1965); Commonwealth v. O'Leary, 198 N.E. 2d 403 (Mass. 1964), accused stood mute at preliminary hearing and court entered not guilty plea on his behalf; Matthews v. State, 206 A. 2d 714 (Md. 1965), plea of not guilty entered at preliminary hearing; Bonner v. Director, 206 A. 2d 708 (Md. 1965), defendant pleaded not guilty at preliminary hearing; Rainsberger v. State, 399 P. 2d 129 (Nev. 1965), plea at preliminary was not prejudicial because, later, at arraignment, defendant again pleaded guilty, with advice of counsel; State v. Baier, 339 P. 2d 559 (Kan. 1965), defendant without counsel waived preliminary hearing but, at trial, while represented by appointed counsel, pleaded guilty; United States ex rel Maisenhelder v. Rundle, 229 F. Supp. 506 (E.D. Pa. 1964), plea or testimony at preliminary hearing was never put before trial court (Also see, Commonwealth ex rel Maisenhelder v. Rundle, 198 A. 2d 565 (Pa. 1964); however, note dissenting opinion of Cohen, J., in this latter case; see infra); Sanders v. Cox, supra, non-capital offender pleaded guilty at trial when represented by counsel, guilty plea at preliminary hearing, while not represented, was not prejudicial; State v. Dennis, 204 A. 2d 868 (N.J. 1964), proceedings or plea at preliminary hearing never brought before trial court, nor even divulged in appellate opinion; Johnson v. State, 207 A. 2d 643 (Md. 1965), where defendant was charged with three capital crimes: (1) murder of seven year old girl, (2) assault with intent to rape the seven year old girl, and (3) forcible rape of a neighbor woman, convicted of each, and sentenced to death three times, the court said:

> "With reference to the claim that he did not have counsel at his preliminary hearing in Municipal Court, it is not alleged or shown that he entered any plea there, or that any plea or statement he may have made there was introduced at his trial in the Criminal Court, and thus the preliminary hearing was not such a critical stage of the proceedings as to require the presence of counsel." 207 A. 2d 643. (Emphasis added.)

But White did not address itself to a determination of those procedures at a preliminary hearing which were prejudicial but to when a preliminary hearing was a "critical stage," that is, "that point of the process [of investigation and prosecution] at which the right to counsel accrues independently of judicial analysis of 'fundamental fairness,' prejudice or coercion." Comment, 32 U. Chi. L. Rev. 560, 568 (1965). The Maryland Court of Appeals treated the issue of the propriety of the admission at trial of the earlier plea as quite different from the right to counsel at the preliminary hearing and the Supreme Court noted that:

> "Although petitioner did not object to the introduction of this evidence at the trial. . . , the rationale of Hamilton v. Alabama, supra, does not rest, as we shall see, on a showing of prejudice." 373 U.S. 59, 60.

Cohen, J., dissenting in Commonwealth ex rel Maisenhelder v. Rundle, 414 Pa. 11, 198 A. 2d 565 (1964), supra, observed that:

> "Even though there is no showing of prejudice, I would reverse since the rationale of White v. State of Maryland. . . and Hamilton v. Alabama. . . does not require such a showing.
> "In White v. State of Maryland, the conviction was reversed because defendant was not represented by counsel when he pled at the preliminary hearing even though it was not required that he plead. The same facts are present in the instant proceeding." 198 A. 2d 565, 567.

Other courts have found there to be no constitutional injury in the failure to appoint counsel where no plea offered at the preliminary hearing could be offered in evidence at trial, State v. White, 133 S.E. 2d 320 (S.C. 1963); DeToro v. Pepersack, 332 F. 2d 341 (4th Cir. 1964); or where the accused could not under state law offer a plea at the preliminary hearing, Williams v. State, 237 F. Supp. 360 (E.D.S.C. 1965); or where the accused did not in fact offer a plea, Mercer v. State, 237 Md. 479, 206 A. 2d 797 (1965); Ronzzo v. Sigler, 235 F. Supp. 839 (D. Neb. 1964). And most states adhere to the view that the accused is not denied due process of law by the failure to appoint counsel at the preliminary hearing if the preliminary hearing is not a critical stage. State v. Osgood, 123 N.W.2d 593 (Minn. 1963); People v. Sedlak, 256 N.Y.S.2d 84 (N.Y. Sup. Ct. 1965); State v. Richardson, 399 P.2d 799 (Kan. 1965); Bussey v. Maxwell, 177 Ohio St. 111, 202 N.E.2d 698 (1964); Ronzzo v. Sigler, supra; People v. Morris, 30 Ill.2d 406, 197 N.E.2d 433 (1964); Freeman v. State, 392 P.2d 542 (Idaho 1964).

The oft cited case of United States ex rel Cooper v. Reincke, 333 F.2d 608 (2d Cir. 1964), the U.S. Court of Appeals reasoned that the preliminary hearing could not be deemed a critical stage:

> "The Connecticut hearing in probable cause has been accurately characterized as a mere 'inquest' made to determine the existence of probable cause, and to discharge the accused if none exists... The finding of probable cause is not final and it cannot be used against an accused on the trial before the Superior Court....
> "The Connecticut hearing in probable cause cannot, therefore, be characterized as critical as is arraignment in Alabama. Indeed, it can hardly be termed a proceeding against the accused, to the contrary, it appears to operate entirely for the accused's benefit. And the mere fact that an accused is required to plead does not in itself demand a contrary conclusion where the plea entered is a self-serving denial of guilt. At trial, appellant had every opportunity to present any defense that was available initially." 333 F.2d 608, 611-612.

The Supreme Court of Idaho stated:

> "While it is recognized that an accused has a right to counsel at every stage of proceedings, we do not understand this to mean that he must be so represented in the preliminary processes which take place primarily for the purpose of ascertaining whether a crime has been committed and whether there are reasonable grounds to believe that the accused has committed it, and particularly where no prejudice has befallen him." Freeman v. State, 392 P.2d 542, 547 (Idaho 1964).

Such reasoning acquires added force from the Court's analogy of the preliminary hearing in White to the arraignment in Hamilton and by the characterization of White and Hamilton by Justice White (joined by Justices Clark and Stewart) in dissent in Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478 (1964), as cases which "dealt with the requirement of counsel at proceedings in which definable rights could be won or lost, not with stages where probative evidence might be obtained." 378 U.S. 478, 497. In Escobedo, Justice Goldberg, writing the majority opinion had said:

> "The 'guiding hand of counsel' was essential to advise petitioner of his rights in this delicate situation. Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45, 69. This was the 'stage when legal aid and advice' were most critical to petitioner. Massiah v. United States, supra, at 204. It was a stage surely as critical as was the arraignment in Hamilton v. Alabama, 368 U.S. 52, and the preliminary hearing in White v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 59." 378 U.S. 478, 486.

Further, Pointer v. Texas, 85 S. Ct. 1065 (1965), held that the admission into evidence at trial of transcripts of testimony taken at a preliminary hearing at which the accused was not represented by counsel and was hence unable to cross-examine the witness constituted a denial of the accused's right under the Sixth Amendment, guaranteed him by the Fourteenth Amendment, to confront the witnesses against him. The Court declined to decide whether the denial of counsel was itself a denial of due process because > "the State informs us that at a Texas preliminary hearing such as is involved here, pleas of guilty or not guilty are not accepted and that the judge decides only whether the accused should be bound over to the grand jury and if so whether he should be admitted to bail. Because of these significant differences in the procedures of the respective States, we cannot say that the White case is necessarily controlling as to the right to counsel. Whether there might be other circumstances making this Texas preliminary hearing so critical to the defendant as to call for appointment of counsel at that stage we need not decide on this record and that question we reserve." 85 S. Ct. 1065, 1067.

Advantages of preliminary hearing. Despite, however, what might appear to be the Supreme Court's emphasis on the formal aspects of the preliminary hearing, it has been said that the disadvantage suffered by the unrepresented defendant is primarily tactical. The value of the preliminary hearing as a discovery device is highlighted by Washington v. Clemmer, 339 F. 2d 715 (D.C. Cir. 1964); 339 F. 2d 725 (D.C. Cir. 1964). See generally Silverstein, Defense of the Poor, 76-83 (1965) and II Defender Newsletter, No. 3 (May 3, 1965). The accused does not know whether to demand or waive a hearing or how to cross-examine witnesses and is not prepared to effectively discuss with the prosecuting attorney possible reduction of the charges against him. Such tactical concerns may certainly be elements of the effective preparation for defense envisioned by Powell. The Wisconsin Supreme Court, though reserving the question of whether the indigent is constitutionally entitled to the appointment of counsel at the preliminary hearing, adopted a prospective rule as a matter of policy stressing "the avoidance of the adverse psychological factors affecting an unrepresented defendant, the furnishing of opportunity for effectively preparing the defense of cross-examining government witnesses at the preliminary and the preservation of testimony of other witnesses which might be lost." Sparkman v. State, 27 Wis. 2d 92, 133 N.W. 2d 776, 780 (1965).

In the main, however, the courts have been unsympathetic to constitutional arguments that the accused has a right to effectively exploit the preliminary hearing as a discovery device. The Supreme Court of Nevada held:

"that the aid of counsel is of value at all times to one accused of crime, even before a preliminary hearing is held. Our recognition of counsel's value, however, does not mean that his assistance is constitutionally required at all stages of the criminal proceeding." Application of Hoff, 393 P. 2d 619, 620 (Nev. 1964).

Ronzzo v. Sigler, supra; DeToro v. Pepersack, supra; and United States ex rel. Parker v. Meyers, 233 F. Supp. 563 (E.D. Pa. 1964), all see the loss of the opportunity for counsel to have cross-examined prosecution witnesses at the preliminary hearings as a non-prejudicial injury - though all refer to the availability of alternative discovery devices by which the accused can learn of the State's case. The 10th Circuit, in United States ex rel Cooper v. Reincke, supra, in speaking of right to counsel at the preliminary hearing stated:

"Whatever collateral benefit that might have accrued, just as the prejudice he may have suffered, is altogether conjectural and certainly cannot amount to the deprivation of a constitutional right." 333 F. 2d 608, 613.

This court was also not impressed by the accused's claim of the loss of the advantage of the opportunity to bargain for a plea to a reduced charge and obtain a shorter sentence worked by the failure to appoint counsel at the preliminary hearing.

"[H]ad he chosen to change his plea to guilty after weighing the chances with his counsel, he was perfectly free to do so. He neither waived nor lost any of these bargaining possibilities." 333 F. 2d 608, 613.

Need for a preliminary hearing. Those courts which have spoken on the subject have found no defect in the waiver of hearing by the unrepresented accused. Ex parte Jett, 172 So. 2d 811 (Ala. App. 1965); State v. Stallings, 25 Conn. Supp. 386, 206 A. 2d 277 (1964). State v. Kirkland, 82 N. J. Super. 409, 197 A. 2d 876 (1964), reasons that the accused's opportunity, lost by the waiver of preliminary hearing, to cross-examine complaining witnesses or to speak in his own behalf could not be error since it is no greater error than would follow from outright denial of preliminary hearing, which is not error per se. And United States ex rel Combs v. Denno, 231 F. Supp. 942 (S.D.N.Y. 1964), holds that the accused could not be disadvantaged by waiver of the preliminary hearing since, "indeed, there is no constitutional requirement that a State set up any procedure prior to indictment for examination of witnesses by either the prosecution or the defense." 231 F. Supp. 942, 944.

An indigent defendant's right. Further, it may be argued that, if the accused has a right to retained counsel at the preliminary hearing, then Griffin v. Illinois, 351 U.S. 12 (1956) would require that counsel be appointed for the indigent. The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, in Washington v. Clemmer, supra, ruled that the accused was entitled to have a court reporter present to prepare a transcript of his preliminary hearing.

> "We think this course is required by minimal standards of fair and equal justice. Defendants who have funds are entitled to employ their own reporters. To deny this opportunity to an indigent defendant would be to permit invidious discrimination based on wealth." 339 F.2d 715, 718.

In Sparkman v. State, supra, Justices Hallows and Wilkie, found a constitutional right to appointed counsel at the preliminary hearing because it was a necessary part of the criminal proceedings and needed to insure a fair trial and

> "because an accused has a statutory right to retained counsel at a preliminary hearing, an accused who is indigent is entitled to appointed counsel under the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment." 133 N.W.2d 776, 781.

But in People v. Morris, 30 Ill.2d 406, 197 N.E.2d 433 (1964), the Illinois Supreme Court (Schaefer, J., dissenting as to this point but concurring in the result) rejected the argument that Griffin requires the state to furnish the accused a free copy of the transcript of the preliminary hearing.

Conclusion. In such an uncertain area, the courts have proceeded with some caution. The Wisconsin court in Sparkman v. State, while admitting that there had been constitutional developments since they had last considered the question, chose to act by announcing a rule of court. In Commonwealth v. O'Leary, 198 N.E.2d 403 (Mass. 1964), the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court noted with an eye to the future, that while there did not now appear to be any constitutional right to counsel at the preliminary hearing,

> "In view of the possible implication in [the Powell, Hamilton, Gideon and White] decisions and of others to follow, the prudent course for a District Court judge is to appoint counsel for an indigent defendant in every case where there is to be a probable cause hearing...." 198 N.E.2d 403, 405.

In Application of Hoff, supra, the court, while expressing doubt how much further the Supreme Court would go, urged the state legislature to pass a statute providing for the appointment and compensation of counsel for indigents. And, in fact, both Idaho and Utah, by legislation adopted in 1965, have provided for the appointment of counsel at the preliminary hearing thus joining the fourteen states (including Wisconsin and Massachusetts) in which counsel is usually offered at or before the preliminary hearing. See Silverstein, The Defense of the Poor, Table 23 at 75, Appendix D (1965).

In the federal courts the appointment and compensation of counsel at the preliminary examination has been provided for in the passage of the Criminal Justice Act of 1964 (18 USC 3006A).

THIRD CIRCUIT ACCEPTS BROAD APPLICATION OF ESCOBEDO DECISION

While in police custody, but prior to either preliminary hearing or indictment on the charge, defendants confessed to having killed an off-duty policeman while attempting to "hold-up" a Newark, New Jersey, tavern on the night of March 15, 1961. Neither had been advised of his right to consult with counsel or his right to remain silent. After dealing with and rejecting petitioners' arguments that their confessions should not have been admitted to evidence because they were obtained (1) during a period of illegal detention, (2) by physical coercion, and (3) by mental overbearing, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit (Biggs, C.J.) reversed and remanded with directions to the District Court to issue writs of habeas corpus on the express grounds that defendants had been denied their constitutional right to counsel. U.S. ex rel Russo v. New Jersey, No. 14833, 3rd Cir. May 20, 1965. The court rejected possible factual bases for distinguishing Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478 (1964):

> "Certainly it is untenable to ground a distinction on the fact that Escobedo had already hired his own attorney while Bisignano and Russo would have required appointed counsel. Such a distinction smacks of denial of equal protection once it is determined that there is a right to counsel at this stage of the proceedings. Cf. Douglas v. California, 372 U.S. 353 (1963)....
> "We can perceive no sound basis for holding that request for counsel is a prerequisite for the right to counsel at the interrogation stage while it is not at any other....
> "No sound reasoning that we can discover will support the conclusion that although at other stages in the proceedings in which the right attaches there must be an intelligent waiver, at the interrogation level a failure to request counsel may be deemed to be a waiver."

By way of dictum, the court clearly indicates that advising a prisoner of his constitutional right to remain silent would not, in and of itself, be sufficient to render his later incriminating statements admissible in evidence at trial:

"In reviewing the facts of Escobedo, it is apparent that Escobedo was well informed of his constitutional rights since some days previously he had conferred with counsel and it must be assumed, as the Supreme Court did assume, that counsel had informed Escobedo of his right to remain silent and the effect any statement that he made might have. Yet the Supreme Court held that such prior instructions were inadequate when Esocbedo was faced with the incriminating statements of his alleged partner in crime. The Supreme Court held that at that very moment when he was confronted with these statements, he was entitled to the guiding hand of counsel.

"The request by Escobedo to consult with his attorney is in and of itself evidence that he was aware of his constitutional rights. Thus, it would seem that to suppress a confession of one knowledgeable of his rights but who has nonetheless confessed and to admit into evidence a confession of one who might be unaware of his rights at the time of his confession would be sophistry. The view that we have expressed here has been well stated by the California Supreme Court: 'To require the request would be to favor the defendant whose sophistication or status had fortuitously prompted him to make it.' People v. Dorado, 42 Cal. Rptr. 169, 178, 398 P. 2d 361, 370 (1965), pet. for cert. filed, 33 U.S.L. Week 3323 (3/22/65)." (Slip Opinion, No. 14833, pp. 13-15) (Note: The U.S. Supreme Court denied certiorari in Dorado, 33 U.S.L. Week 3389. Certiorari was also denied in People v. Hartgraves, 202 N.E.2d 33 (Ill. 1964), 33 U.S.L. Week 3330.)

RECENT SUPREME COURT DECISIONS

Defendant's failure to testify. The court extended last year's decision in Malloy v. Hogan, 378 U.S. 1, 84 S. Ct. 1489, which applied the self-incrimination clause of the Fifth Amendment to the states, by holding that:

> "The Fifth Amendment, in its direct application to the federal government and its bearing on the States by reason of the Fourteenth Amendment, forbids either comment by the prosecution on the accused's silence or instructions by the court that such silence is evidence of guilt." Griffin v. California, 85 S. Ct. 1229, 1233.

Justice Douglas, for the majority, called comment on refusal to testify a "penalty imposed by courts for exercising a constitutional privilege," and rejected Justice Stewart's dissent that instructions by the Court should be allowed as a protective shield against unwarranted inferences which might be drawn by an uninformed jury.

Whether the accused may require a jury instruction that his silence must be disregarded was explicitly reserved. Federal courts grant such an instruction. Bruno v. U.S., 308 U.S. 287 (1939).

Tehan v. Shott, 337 F.2d 990 (6th Cir. 1965) presenting the question whether Griffin should be retrospective, has been granted review. No. 877, 33 U.S.L. Week 3376. Six states could be affected: California, Ohio, New Jersey, Connecticut, Iowa, and New Mexico.

Mapp decision not retrospective. On June 19, 1961, the Court held that illegally seized evidence was inadmissible in state courts. Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961). In Linkletter v. Walker, 33 U.S.L. Week 4576, the Court ended the split of authority among state and federal courts on the question whether Mapp should be retrospective by holding it inapplicable to state court convictions which have become final before the date of the Mapp decision. "Final" means the "judgment of conviction was rendered, the availability of appeal exhausted, and the time for petition for certiorari had elapsed." (See footnote 5, 33 U.S.L. Week 4577.)

The Constitution being neutral on the problem of retroactivity, Justice Clark announced a test looking at the history of the rule, its purpose and effect, and the effect of retrospective application on its operation. Since the exclusionary rule was adopted because it was the only effective deterrent to police action in violation of the Fourth Amendment, its purpose would not be advanced by retrospective application of Mapp. Furthermore, such application would require new hearings on many old cases. "To thus legitimate such an extraordinary procedural weapon that has no bearing on guilt would seriously disrupt the administration of justice." (Emphasis added.)

Griffin v. Illinois, supra, Gideon v. Wainwright, supra, and Jackson v. Denno, 378 U.S. 368 (1964), which have been held to operate retrospectively, were distinguished as relating to the reliability of the evidence and the fairness and accuracy of the trial. (Footnote 20. 33 U.S.L. Week 4582)

The magic of the date, June 19, 1961, is further illustrated by Carafas v. LaValle, 334 F.2d 331 (2d Cir. 1964). The Second Circuit Court of Appeals granted a writ of habeas corpus to a defendant whose appeal was still pending when Mapp was announced, even though at his pre-Mapp trial, he had not objected to the admission of illegally seized evidence. The Supreme Court denied certiorari. 33 U.S.L. Week 3393.

Trial publicity. In Estes v. Texas, 33 U.S.L. Week 4543, the Court ruled that the introduction of television into the defendant's trial denied his constitutional right to fair trial under the Due Process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Mr. Justice Clark, for the majority, first reasoned that the petitioner Estes need not show actual prejudice, but merely the probability of unfairness, and then traced the psychological impact on the jury, the witnesses, the judge, the defendant, and his counsel and the physical disruption caused by the presence of TV cameras and crew. "A defendant on trial... is entitled to his day in court, not in a stadium, or a city or nationwide arena." Clark apparently would apply the rule to all "notorious" trials, but Harlan, whose vote was required for the 5-4 majority, cautioned the Court to "proceed step by step in this unplowed field." The difference is probably narrow, since there is undoubtedly a correlation between "notoriety" and TV coverage.

GENERAL INFORMATION

Ford Grant to NLADA. The Ford Foundation has granted $1.8 million to NLADA to expand the National Defender Project to conduct a series of demonstration programs for the improvement of the assigned counsel system. The grant will provide funds for three-year demonstration programs establishing an administrator to direct and assist the efforts of assigned counsel in approximately 20 different localities throughout the country. The administrator system can operate in a purely assigned counsel system or can supplement an existing defender service.

Recent National Defender Project Grants. Five additional grants have been awarded by the National Defender Project: (1) a three-year grant of $33,874 to establish the "Wyoming Defender Aid Program" to provide law student assistance to assigned counsel throughout the state of Wyoming and to conduct an increased educational program in criminal procedure at the University of Wyoming College of Law; (2) a one-year grant of $7,500 to the Legal Aid Society of Westchester County, New York to employ a legal intern; (3) a $2,000 grant to the Austin Junior Bar Foundation for the acquisition of auxiliary services of investigators and experts to assist assigned counsel; (4) a six-month grant of $9,305 to the Public Defender of Santa Clara County, California, to employ two legal interns; and (5) a contingent grant of $28,475 for a period of two years to the State of Wisconsin to provide financial assistance in the creation of a state-wide public defender at the appellate level in Wisconsin.

Conference on Law and Poverty. During 23-25 June 1965, the National Conference on Law and Poverty was held in Washington, D.C. At this conference the Office of Economic Opportunity (OEO) outlined their objectives and procedures in establishing legal services programs as part of the "War on Poverty." Federal funds will be available for imaginative programs providing legal services that will benefit the poor. The booklet entitled Law and Poverty: 1965 prepared by Patricia M. Wald is an excellent reference work and contains the tentative guidelines for legal services proposals to the OEO. Additional materials on the Conference and legal services programs can be obtained from the Director, Community Action Programs, Office of Economic Opportunity, Washington, D.C.

NLADA Defender Membership up 150%. Small part-time offices are taking advantage of the recently adjusted dues rate as both smaller and larger offices have strikingly increased NLADA membership in the past six months. Annual dues are now as follows:

	Minimum Dues
Defender organization memberships for full-time office	$50
Part-time offices (1-3 part-time attorneys)	25
Professional memberships to individual attorneys interested in this service	10

Non-member Defender organizations still receiving this Newsletter are urged to keep in touch with developments affecting Defenders in the Office of Economic Opportunity, Ford Foundation, and proposed legislation through the national association. ADMISSIBILITY OF A CONFESSION

As a result of recent United States Supreme Court rulings upon the admissibility of confessions in state criminal cases, serious consideration has been given to the methods of interrogation that produce these confessions. Not only the courts and counsel, but also law enforcement agencies, are vitally concerned with insuring that the confession of an accused person is voluntary and hence admissible at his subsequent trial. The defense lawyer views the interrogation process to determine if the confession or incriminating statements qualify for admission. No one questions that interrogation is a valuable law enforcement tool, but some doubt has been expressed about the propriety of interrogation of the accused. Some have indicated that the Supreme Court will go so far as to exclude the use of confessions, and Justice White in his dissenting opinion in Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478 (1964), stated:

> "The decision is thus another major step in the direction of the goal which the Court seemingly has in mind - to bar from evidence all admissions obtained from an individual suspected of crime, whether involuntarily made or not." 378 U.S. 478, 495.

The philosophy against the use of a confession is founded upon the privilege of self-incrimination, for since a man cannot be compelled to testify against himself at the trial where he has the adequate safeguards of the judicial process and the assistance of counsel, he should not be incriminated by his words made prior to trial. The importance of this right of the accused to remain silent at trial and have the government prove its case by other evidence has been re-emphasized in the last term of the Supreme Court. In Griffin v. California, 14 L. Ed2d106 (1965), the court held that the trial court and prosecutor were precluded from commenting before the jury upon the defendant's failure to testify in his own behalf. Decisions of the United States Supreme Court have not impeded the use of confessions in state criminal trials, but they have become the subject of much interpretation, qualification, and distinction by the state trial courts. (See March 1965 issue of Defender Newsletter which discusses 27 different state decisions on Massiah and Escobedo.)

History. In 1936, Chief Justice Hughes of the United States Supreme Court in Brown v. Mississippi, 297 U.S. 278, held that the state procedure on the admissibility of confessions in criminal cases was subject to review under the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. In this case the defendant who had been suspected of murder had been twice hanged by a rope from a tree, and having been let down was tied to the tree and whipped. He was subsequently whipped again until he would agree to confess to a statement dictated by the deputy sheriff. The Court held:

> "But the freedom of the State in establishing its policy is the freedom of constitutional government and is limited by the requirement of due process of law. Because a State may dispense with a jury trial, it does not follow that it may substitute trial by ordeal. The rack and torture chamber may not be substituted for the witness stand." 297 U.S. 278, 285-6.

In attacking a conviction based upon an involuntary confession the Court held that the introduction of such a confession was "a wrong so fundamental that it made the whole proceeding a mere pretense of a trial and rendered the conviction and sentence wholly void. The conviction and sentence were void for want of the essential elements of due process, and a proceeding thus vitiated could be challenged in any appropriate manner." 297 U.S. 278, 286-7.

Admissibility Equals Voluntariness. The recognized test in the admissibility of a confession was voluntariness. In Watts v. Indiana, 338 U.S. 49 (1949), the late Justice Frankfurter outlined the meaning and purpose of the test of voluntariness:

> "A statement to be voluntary of course need not be volunteered. But if it is the product of sustained pressure by the police it does not issue from a free choice. When a suspect speaks because he is overborne, it is immaterial whether he has been subjected to a physical or mental ordeal. Eventually yielding to questioning under such circumstances is plainly the product of the suction process of interrogation and therefore the reverse of voluntary. We would have to shut our minds to the plain significance of what here transpired to deny that this was a calculated endeavor to secure a confession through the pressure of unrelenting interrogation. The very relentlessness of such interrogation implies that it is better for the prisoner to answer than to persist in the refusal of disclosure which is his constitutional right. To turn the detention of an accused into a process of wrenching from him evidence which could not be extorted in open court with all its safeguards, is so grave an abuse of the power of arrest as to offend the procedural safeguards of due process." 338 U.S. 49, 53-4.

The test of voluntariness is used to balance the right of the accused to resist questioning against the right of the law enforcement authorities to inquire about the facts of a crime.

Factors Affecting Voluntariness. Although the rule is easy to define, difficulties arise in the application of determining what is a voluntary confession in a given fact circumstance. The principle adopted by the Court in determining voluntariness in its evaluation of the facts surrounding a confession is to consider the "totality of the circumstances." Fikes v. Alabama, 352 U.S. 191, 197 (1957). Since the admissibility of a confession will turn on many factors, a list analyzing 36 United States Supreme Court opinions from Brown v. Mississippi in 1936 to Escobedo v. Illinois in 1964, gives rise to certain aspects of the interrogation process that will be considered by the court in determining the voluntariness of a confession. All parties concerned with the admissibility of a confession should insure that the record reflects those factual circumstances most favorable to their position (i.e. admissibility or non-admissibility), for the Supreme Court will not be bound by the lower courts' determination of voluntariness and will make its own independent factual review. Lisenba v. California, 314 U.S. 219, 237-8 (1941). This chart (pp. 6-7) of this Newsletter) for ease of understanding classifies the individual factors affecting voluntariness into eight major categories: (1) Denial of Rights, (2) Questioning, (3) Threats, (4) Status of Accused, (5) Nature of Coercion, (6) Second Confession, (7) Special Techniques, and (8) Previous Experience with Police. The purpose of this chart is to provide ready accessibility to Supreme Court cases dealing with the specific factors listed. (A listing of the cases cited in alphabetical order is contained on p. 11 of this Newsletter.)

I. Denial of Rights

When the interrogators violate legal rights of the accused, serious doubt is cast upon the admissibility of a confession. A look at the chart will immediately indicate the many cases in which the Court considered that the deprivation of friend, relative or counsel (the holding of the accused in an incommunicado status) affected the voluntariness of the confession.

In Gallegos v. Colorado, 370 U.S. 49 (1962), a fourteen-year-old boy was charged with the fatal assault of an elderly man. After he was arrested by the police he immediately admitted the assault, and again five days later during which time he saw no lawyer, parent or other friendly adult, he signed a formal written confession which was introduced in evidence against him. In addition to the youth of the accused, the Supreme Court found the formal confession to be involuntary because the accused was not allowed to have the advice of his parents, lawyer or friend. This was a denial of the youthful accused's right to due process under the Fourteenth Amendment, and in this case the right to counsel was considered under the aspect of procedural due process.

In two recent cases, Massiah v. United States, 377 U.S. 201 (1964), and Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478 (1964), the Court held that the confessions were inadmissible as a result of a denial of the assistance of counsel. This Sixth Amendment provision was directly applied to a federal proceeding in the Massiah case and extended to a state proceeding through the Fourteenth Amendment by Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963).

In Massiah v. United States, 377 U.S. 201 (1964), the accused had been indicted for violating federal narcotics laws. He had retained a lawyer, pleaded not guilty, and was released on bail. While out on bail he made incriminating statements to a co-defendant in co-defendant's car in which a radio transmitter had been installed by federal agents with the cooperation of this co-defendant. The federal agents overheard these incriminating statements and testified to them at trial. The Supreme Court held that these statements were inadmissible as a constitutional deprivation of counsel under the Sixth Amendment:

> "We hold that the petitioner was denied the basic protections of that guarantee (assistance of counsel under the Sixth Amendment) when there was used against him at his trial evidence of his own incriminating words, which federal agents had deliberately elicited from him after he had been indicted and in the absence of his counsel." 377 U.S. 201, 206. (Emphasis added.)

The Supreme Court did not limit the exclusion of confessions to post-indictment statements, but in a five to four decision announced by Justice Goldberg applied this exclusion to pre-indictment statements in the decision of Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478 (1964). Although the Escobedo case is often cited in attacking any post-arrest statement by an accused without an attorney, that decision by its own terms is narrowly restricted:

> "We hold, therefore, that where, as here, (1) the investigation is no longer a general inquiry into an unsolved crime but has begun to focus on a particular suspect, (2) the suspect has been taken into police custody, (3) the police carry out a process of interrogations that lends itself to eliciting incriminating statements, (4) the suspect has requested and (5) been denied an opportunity to consult with his lawyer, and (6) the police have not effectively warned him of his absolute constitutional right to remain silent, the accused has been denied 'the Assistance of Counsel' in violation of the Sixth Amendment to the Constitution as 'made obligatory upon the States by the Fourteenth Amendment,' Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S., at 342, and that no statement elicited by the police during the interrogation may be used against him at a criminal trial." 378 U.S. 478, 490-491. (Numbers added.)

The two polar interpretations of this rule, People v. Dorado, 398 P.2d 361 (Cal. 1965), (liberal) and People v. Hartgraves, 202 N.E.2d 33 (Ill. 1965), (conservative), have both been refused review by the United States Supreme Court which denied each petition for certiorari during the last term of court. 33 U.S. Law Week 3389 and 3330.

Police authorities, vitally concerned with assuring that a confession is voluntary should recognize the need for advising an accused of his right to remain silent, warning the accused that his answers may be used against him in a trial, and telling him of his right to consult with an attorney. Justice Goldberg expressly held that these factors play on the voluntariness and the admissibility of a confession (Haynes v. Washington, 373 U.S. 503, 517 (1963)), and failure to advise the accused of any one of these three points opens the door for a motion to suppress an otherwise valid voluntary confession.

II. Questioning

Of all the questioning techniques frowned upon by the court, extended questioning has been most severely criticized. In Ashcraft v. Tennessee, 322 U.S. 143 (1944), relay questioning for more than 36 hours with one five-minute pause was the principal factor controlling the Court's decision that the confession was involuntary.

In Leyra v. Denno, 347 U.S. 556 (1954), a state employed psychiatrist interrogated a 50-year-old man suspected of bludgeoning to death his mother and father. The psychiatrist used an interview approach indicating that he was present to help the accused and that the accused would feel much better if he confessed. This manner of interrogation was held to be improper, and any admissions to the psychiatrist were the product of 'mental coercion.' In Spano v. New York, 360 U.S. 315 (1959), a close friend of the accused who was a police officer was used by the interrogators to play on the accused's sympathy. His superiors instructed this friend to tell the accused that the friend would be in trouble unless the accused confessed. The court held that the accused's will was overborne and the confession involuntary, and one of the incidents contributing to the involuntariness of the confession was the falsely aroused sympathy by the pretended friend.

III. Threats

When physical harm to the accused is threatened, there is no doubt that the resulting confession would be involuntary. As police interrogators become more sophisticated, the line between the threat and the proper method of inquiry becomes extremely fine. In Lynumn v. Illinois, 372 U.S. 528 (1963), the accused was suspected of the sale and possession of narcotics and was informed by police officers that she would be disentitled to public assistance (ADC) and would lose custody of her children. They also informed her that if she cooperated, they (the police) would recommend leniency. Although the state trial court and supreme court held the confession to be voluntary, the United States Supreme Court reversed.

In Stein v. New York, 346 U.S. 156 (1953), the defendant Cooper's father was taken into custody with him and his brother was arrested for a parole violation. Cooper obtained a commitment from the police that his father would be released if he confessed and was able to bargain with parole officials to see that his brother would be unmolested if he "cooperated." The court held that Cooper's confession was voluntary, for his bargaining indicated that he exercised free choice when he made the confession. In Rogers v. Richmond, 365 U.S. 534 (1961), the accused who had previously remained silent after his arrest on suspicion of murder confessed when the police chief indicated he was about to have the accused's wife taken into custody. The trial court instructed the jury that the admissibility of the confession was determined by a legal standard which took into account the circumstances of its probable truth or falsity. Because of this instructional error by the trial court, the case was remanded for a retrial, but the Court's decision was critical of the manner of interrogation.

IV. Status of the Accused

The status of the accused includes such factors as his youth, education, intelligence, linguisitic ability, sanity, health, and previous contacts with the police or criminal background. In its early cases reviewing the voluntariness of a confession, the Supreme Court denounced improper police questioning of an illiterate. In White v. Texas, 310 U.S. 530 (1940), the Court refused to believe that an illiterate cotton picker made a voluntary written confession after several nocturnal trips to the woods for interrogation by several Texas Rangers. In Haley v. Ohio, 332 U.S. 596 (1948), a 15-year-old boy was arrested about midnight and questioned by police in relays of one or two each for five hours. The boy confessed and signed a written confession which contained the statement that he had been advised of his rights. He had been held incommunicado and neither his lawyer nor his mother was allowed to see him. The Court on the aspect of his age in holding that the confession was involuntary through Justice Douglas stated:

* Lower court decision affirmed

2/ Gallegos v. Colorado

> "What transpired would make us pause for careful inquiry if a mature man were involved. And when, as here, a mere child - an easy victim of the law - is before us, special care in scrutinizing the record must be used. Age 15 is a tender and difficult age for a boy of any race. He cannot be judged by the more exacting standards of maturity. That which would leave a man cold and unimpressed can overawe and overwhelm a lad in his early teens. This is the period of great instability which the crisis of adolesence produces. A 15-year-old lad, questioned through the dead of night by relays of police, is a ready victim of the inquisition." 332 U.S. 596, 599.

The intermittent questioning of a 27-year-old Negro who started school at the age of 8 and left at 16 while still in the third grade, which resulted in a confession, was held to be improper and the confession to be inadmissible. Fikes v. Alabama, 352 U.S. 191 (1957). Although the Court considered the nature of the interrogation, the intelligence of the accused was a substantial factor influencing the Court's decision that the confession was involuntary. The leading case on the inadmissibility of a confession from one who is insane or mentally incompetent is Blackburn v. Alabama, 361 U.S. 199 (1960), and the confession of an accused previously adjudicated insane was held to be involuntary.

The sickness, ill health, or injury of the accused will influence his will to resist, and hence he will be more prone to the overbearing techniques of improper questioning. In Reck v. Pate, 367 U.S. 433 (1961), the accused suffered severe abdominal pains and had to be treated by a doctor and taken to the hospital during questioning. In Townsend v. Sain, 372 U.S. 293 (1963), the accused a 19-year-old narcotics addict who had been addicted since the age of 15 was undergoing withdrawal symptoms throughout the interrogation and had to receive medical assistance to alleviate the pain. In Jackson v. Denno, 378 U.S. 368 (1964), the accused who was suffering from a bullet wound, was interrogated at the hospital before and after he had received medication. The incapacity of the accused will weigh heavily in determining the voluntariness of a confession, but under the present state of the law will not in itself be grounds for the exclusion of a confession.

V. Nature of Coercion

The principal case on the nature of coercion in its worse form is Brown v. Mississippi, 297 U.S. 278 (1936), the first case in which the United States Supreme Court reviewed the admissibility of a confession in a state criminal trial. In this case it was clearly acknowledged that physical torture was used to obtain a confession (supra). Other forces or pressures exerted against an accused that will affect his ability to make a voluntary statement are his fear of mob violence, his protracted detention, the denial of sleep, his movement from jail to jail without authority, slapping him, illegal police procedures, stripping him of his clothing, denial of food to him, unduly harsh confinement facilities, promises of leniency, and his placement in a "show-up."

In Ward v. Texas, 316 U.S. 547 (1942), the accused, who had been slapped once, was "sweet talked" into a confession by police officers. He alleged that he had been psysically mistreated by the interrogators, but this issue of fact was resolved against him. Throughout his interrogation, the accused was transferred from jail to jail in violation of local law. The Court held that the effect of moving an ignorant Negro by night and day to strange towns telling him of threats of mob violence and questioning him continuously was grounds for concluding that the confession was not free and voluntary but the product of coercion and duress. In Malinski v. New York, 324 U.S. 401 (1945), the accused was immediately stripped after arrest and then kept naked for three hours at which time he was allowed to put on his shoes, socks, and underwear and given a blanket to robe himself. The prosecutor indicated that the accused was kept undressed as part of the psychology to humiliate him and to let him think he was going to get a shellacking. On this basis the Court ruled that the confession was the product of fear. One aspect of the Supreme Court holding that a confession was involuntary in Payne v. Arkansas, 356 U.S. 560 (1958), was the denial of food to the accused for long periods, and under the circumstances of that case the confession was not an expression of free choice.

VI. Second Confession

During an interrogation, it is not uncommon for the accused to make several confessions, usually commencing with an oral admission. Once the accused has admitted his guilt, the psychological process of unburdening himself is difficult, if not impossible, to terminate or retract. If the first confession was coerced, is a subsequent confession containing the same incriminating statements admissible? The rule of law controlling this matter has been stated in Lyons v. Oklahoma, 322 U.S. 596 (1944):

> "The Fourteenth Amendment does not protect one who has admitted his guilt because of forbidden inducements against the use at trial of his subsequent confessions under all possible circumstances. The admissibility of the later confession depends upon the same test - is it voluntary. Of course the fact that the earlier statement was obtained from the prisoner by coercion is to be considered in appraising the character of the later confession. The effect of earlier abuse may be so clear as to forbid any other inference than it dominated the mind of the accused to such an extent that the later confession is involuntary. If the relation between the earlier and later confession is not so close that one must say the facts of one control the character of the other, the inference is one for the triers of fact and their conclusion, in such an uncertain situation, that the confession should be admitted as voluntary, cannot be a denial of due process." 322 U.S. 596, 603.

In this case the second confession was made 12 hours after the first coerced confession, and the Court held that the second confession was voluntary. In Leyra v. Denno, 347 U.S. 556 (1954), the subsequent confessions were extracted within five hours after the coerced confession, and the Court held that these confessions were controlled by the character of the first confession and hence inadmissible.

VII. Special Techniques

The use of "truth serum," or its equivalents will not result in a voluntary confession. In Townsend v. Sain, 372 U.S. 293 (1963), the Court said:

> "If an individual's will was overborne or if his confession was not the product of a rational intellect and free will his confession is inadmissible because coerced. These standards are applicable whether a confession is a product of physical intimidation or psychological pressure and, of course, are equally applicable to a drug-induced statement. It is difficult to imagine a situation in which a confession would be less the product of a free intellect, less voluntary, than when brought about by a drug having the effect of a 'truth serum.' " 372 U.S. 293, 307-308.

The two cases cited for the use of a lie detector merely indicate that the lie detector was used as part of the interrogation process, but the Court has not indicated how the use of the lie detector would influence voluntariness.

VIII. Previous Experience with the Police

The criminal record of the accused is considered by the Court in determining voluntariness of the statement, for the sophistication of the accused by virtue of his many experiences with the police and criminal law will not often make him easy prey of the interrogator. In Stein v. New York, the defendant Cooper who had previously been convicted on separate occasions of two separate auto thefts, an attempted grand larceny, murder, and a Dyer Act violation, was able to bargain with the police authorities for the release of his father and brother. In the Haynes and Escobedo cases, holding the confessions to be inadmissible, the Court took note of the fact that the defendant in each case had no previous experience with the police authorities.

Summary. So long as the court follows the "totality of the circumstances" rule in determining voluntariness, all factors affecting voluntariness will be reviewable. Some facts will be more important than others, but each case will depend upon its factual circumstances. The court record should clearly reflect that all the factual circumstances were considered by the trial court, for this immediate and complete determination of the admissibility of a confession allows adequate appellate review and will limit future collateral attacks on a conviction.

Special Considerations.

Procedural aspects of confession introduced at trial. In Jackson v. Denno, 378 U.S. 368 (1964), the Supreme Court held that the trial court must make a preliminary finding of voluntariness on the confession prior to its presentation to the jury. In response to this Supreme Court mandate, the New York Court of Appeals in People v. Huntley, adopted the Massachusetts procedure under which the jury passes on voluntariness only after the judge has fully and independently resolved the issue against the accused and has made express findings upon the disputed fact question of voluntariness. The trial judge must find voluntariness beyond a reasonable doubt before the confession can be submitted to the jury, and the burden of proof of voluntariness is upon the People. People v. Huntley, 15 N.Y.2d 72, 204 N.E.2d 179 (1965).

Federal Rules. In addition to the above requirements governing the admissibility of confessions in state criminal trials, the federal courts have a special exclusionary rule for a confession that is made to law enforcement officers who fail to bring the accused, once arrested, before a commissioner without unnecessary delay. In Mallory v. United States, 354 U.S. 449 (1957), the defendant was charged with rape in the District of Columbia. He was arrested at 2:30 p.m. and about 4:00 p.m. was asked to take a lie detector test. About 9:30 p.m. that evening he confessed to the polygraph operator, and about 10:00 p.m. the police began looking for a U.S. Commissioner. The accused was taken before the Commissioner the next morning. The Supreme Court exercised its supervisory authority over federal courts and interpreted the requirements of Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure 5(a) - that the arrested person be taken without unnecessary delay before the nearest available Commissioner - so as to exclude the confession taken during this period of unnecessary delay, citing McNabb v. United States, 318 U.S. 332 (1943).

GENERAL INFORMATION

On 10 August 1965, the NLADA Executive Committee approved the following grants:

A three-year grant of $375,000 to the Houston Legal Foundation, Houston, Texas, to initiate a supervised assistance program to attorneys appointed by the courts of Harris County, Texas, to represent indigent defendants in criminal cases. The total cost of this three-year program will be $750,000 - the Houston community bearing 50% of the cost. The organization for providing legal services will have a director; a criminal division with five full-time staff lawyers, supplemented by the assistance of law students; an investigation division with five investigators, two secretaries, and law student assistance; and a ROR program.

A two-year grant of $35,500 to the Public Defender of the Eighth Judicial Circuit of Florida to provide legal representation for indigent criminal defendants in Bradford County, Florida, in misdemeanor cases and to furnish legal assistance to inmates at the state prison at Raiford, Florida.

A two-year grant of $30,000 to the Public Defender of the Fourth Judicial Circuit of Florida to expand defender services to the preliminary hearing in conjunction with a ROR program.

A three-year grant of $52,500 to establish a Federal Defender Program within the Federal Courts located in Chicago. This grant will be used for establishing a student training program that will provide assistance for assigned counsel representing defendants in federal criminal cases pursuant to the recently funded Criminal Justice Act of 1964.

A grant of $13,500 for one year to conduct a student program at the University of Georgia School of Law in conjunction with the local Legal Aid and Defender Office in Athens, Georgia.

A grant of $8,000 to the University of Chicago as the second year award of a National Defender Fellowship. The recipient of this fellowship is Stephen Schiller, a practicing attorney in Chicago, who will pursue graduate training leading to a masters degree in the area of criminal law and procedure.

Grants to Existing Programs. (1) A grant of $22,902 to Stetson University College of Law to continue in operation the Public Defender Clinic for the second and third years. (2) A two-year grant of $24,000 to the University of San Francisco School of Law to continue the student assistance program to assigned counsel in the local federal court in San Francisco. (3) A two-year grant of $18,000 to Duke University to continue the student training program and lawyer assistance program in local state courts in North Carolina.

The Truth About 'Lie' Detectors

"I agree to submit to a screening test and to take a Lie Detector Test at any time that the Company may so request. I also grant my employer the right to dismiss me at any time that I fail or refuse to take a Lie Detector Test."

This is the pledge which a company requires its present and prospective employes to sign. It is typical of the growing use of so-called lie detector machines.

Union members throughout the country report that employers are asking questions about their union activities, personal finances, past employment and future job plans, drinking habits, physical condition, police record, driving habits, sexual activities, political beliefs and many more topics—all while hooked up to a machine. Jobseekers otherwise qualified are denied employment and workers are discharged for "failing" or refusing to take a polygraph or "lie detector" test.

This increasing and widespread use of the "lie detector" in labor relations requires that the machine, its use and users be subject to detailed examination.

Among the questions raised are: How widespread is the use of "lie detectors?" How does the polygraph work? What claims are made for it? Are the claims justified? What should unions and workers do about the lie detector?

While the polygraph has been used in police work for several decades, its use in industry is a relatively new development. The fact that anyone can buy the equipment and sell his services as a "lie detector expert" makes it extremely difficult to arrive at any reliable estimate of the number of "lie detector" tests given each year. And even where statistics are available they frequently shed no light on industrial vs. police usage.

The extent of the problem, however, may be indicated by the following information.

One witness from a Chicago lie detector firm, appearing before a congressional subcommittee investigating the use of the polygraph in government, testified there are about 1,500 private lie detector operators in the United States. His own firm, one of over 30 such firms in Chicago, gives over 3,500 tests each year. The New York City phone book lists over 50 "lie detector" outfits.

The Wall Street Journal reported on a firm with offices in three Texas cities. It gave 4,985 tests one year, 6,896 the next and expects to test 26,000 people in its third year. A good example of the lie detective boom is the case of a firm started in 1959 in Austin by two University of Texas graduates. Two years later this firm had offices in 10 cities in the United States and Canada. Texas may be the heaviest user, with an estimated 7,500 companies requiring employes to take periodic "lie detector" tests.

Business Week estimated that business organizations, by hiring "lie detector" firms to find out if employes are honest, are responsible for 80 percent of these firms' incomes. The cost of a test varies from a minimum of $25 for a routine screening test to hundreds of dollars for tests designed to locate "guilty" workers.

The Wall Street Journal reported that among polygraph users are major companies in steel production, copper refining, auto manufacturing, meat packing, food processing, oil, electronics, mail-order retailing and supermarkets. The Journal said that "examiners and polygraph manufacturers are benefiting handsomely from the machines' upswing."

But private industry has no monopoly. Local, state and federal governments are major users of "lie boxes." The federal government seems sold on polygraphs. A survey of the House Subcommittee on Government Operations, headed by Representative John E. Moss (D-Cal.), recently revealed that 19 federal agencies use them. Seventeen of these agencies, employing 639 operators and using 512 machines, spent approximately $4.5 million giving about 20,000 tests in fiscal 1963. Two agencies, the Central Intelligence Agency and the National Security Agency, have their totals classified as secret.

Government agencies use lie detectors for many reasons, including screening applicants for federal jobs, investigating thefts on military bases and in post offices, for information leaks and in other security cases.

Why the Lie Detector?

Proponents of the polygraph claim its use is justified by the need to reduce a claimed $4 million daily business loss due to theft, pilferage and embezzlement. Others justify its use in "screening out misfits" on such grounds as increasing employment costs and the need to protect company secrets.

Certainly the quest for truth is not new. One management newsletter likens the search for "honest employes" to Diogenes carrying his lantern through the streets of ancient Greece searching for an honest man. Proving one's innocence by walking on red hot coals, immersing arms in boiling water or licking a hot iron are repeated examples of trial by ordeal practiced by our forefathers. While these and other tests were founded on faith or superstition there were a few that had a psychological or physiological base.

In one ancient test the suspect was required to hold a handful of rice in his mouth while he answered questions. If the rice stayed dry he was clearly a liar since the theory was that a liar's salivary glands would dry up out of fear.

The "modern lie detector" is based on similar concepts. The premise is that most people have uncontrolled physiological reactions to feelings of guilt which can be measured electronically. "Lie detectors" are simply machines which are supposed to sense and record these reactions. The most common measurements are of blood pressure and pulse, breathing rate and electrical conductivity of the skin. Early "lie detectors" normally tried to measure one or the other of these functions while most "modern" machines combine the three. A pneumatic tube is fitted across the subject's chest to measure breathing, an inflatable rubber cuff is wrapped around the arm to measure pulse and/or blood pressure and a pair of electrodes is attached to the fingers to measure skin current. The latter is called galvanic skin response (GSR). These devices activate pens that draw lines on a rolling sheet of paper. It is from this process that the "lie detector's" modern name—the polygraph—is derived. Polygraph is the Greek word for "many writings."

When the subject is attached to the machine and before the questioning starts, the machine is "calibrated" to his "normal" patterns of breathing, blood pressure and sweating. Questions are then asked and the movement of the pens observed. The operator looks for any changes from the "normal" pattern that may occur as each question is asked. If, for example, the subject replies "No" to the question "Have you ever been fired from a job?" and wiggles of one or more of the pens change from the "normal" pattern, the conclusion drawn is that the subject is lying.

The whole process is based on the following assumptions:

1. A person becomes emotionally upset when he lies.
2. The emotional disturbance causes certain physiological reactions: breathing rate will change, pulse rate will increase, blood pressure will rise and more current will pass through the skin due to increased sweating.
3. The physical reactions cannot be controlled by the subject or, if control is possible, the effort to control will cause changes in the pattern.
4. These changes can be measured and recorded.
5. The recorded patterns are the result of either truthfulness or deception and not of any other cause and they can be interpreted by the polygrapher so that he can identify true or false responses to questions.

When the polygraph is used for screening applicants prior to employment a further assumption is made that future activity can be predicted, based on answers about past activities.

These assumptions should be examined closely to see how they measure up.

Belief: Lying Causes Emotional Upset

The basis of "lie detection" is that either the act of lying itself or the fear of being caught in a lie is upsetting and causes emotional disturbance. Now before a person can be bothered by lying, he must believe he is lying. If a person in a mental hospital says he is Napoleon and he believes this, the lie detector response (or lack of response) would indicate he was telling the truth. He believed what he said! But one does not have to be mentally sick to believe something contrary to accepted fact. The witness to an accident who describes a blue hit-and-run car as "green" is not lying. The underpaid store clerk who pockets the money from a small sale each day and uses it for bus fare may actually believe the money is "rightfully" his. The question, "Have you stolen any money from the store?" may evoke no emotional and, therefore, no polygraph response. The pathological liar who weaves his yarns without fear will not emotionally trigger the machine.

The fact is we frequently do not even know what a lie is. Testifying before the Moss subcommittee, Dr. Martin T. Orne, Senior Resident Psychiatrist, Massachusetts Mental Health Center and a Harvard Medical School professor, said:

"I don't know how to define a lie. . . . It is not a term which has been carefully defined by scientists. What a lie is, is a matter of point of view which varies with individuals. . . ."

The reality is that some people, either through training, practice or the pecularity of their individual psycho-physiological make-ups, just do not experience any emotion when attempting to deceive others. It is because this fact is known to "lie detector" operators that they practice their own form of deception. "If it doesn't bother a person to lie then we must induce a fear in him that we will discover his lie," they reason. This fear is built up by such claims as "you can't beat the lie detector" or that the lie detector is 99 percent accurate. This attempt to create an aura of infallibility is necessary since, as one lie detector expert wrote, "The only real deterrent is fear of the possibility of discovery and punishment. . . ." This writer then claims that, with the "lie box," when the ". . . possibility is turned into certainty, the effect is increased manifold." He calls getting caught on the "lie detector" a "moral vaccination, a shot of integrity in the arm."

It all comes down to the following exchange which took place between Benny Kass, Counsel for the Foreign Operations and Government Information Subcommittee and Professor Fred Inbau, Northwestern University School of Law and co-author of a leading "lie detector" text.

Kass: "Mr. Inbau, if a person doesn't have any faith in the polygraph, if he doesn't feel it is accurate or feels it is not completely infallible, will the polygraph still produce the desired results?"

Inbau: "He has got to have some fear of having his lies detected by this technique. He has to have some respect for it."

It is this process of inducing the "fear of the lie detector" that led one writer to call it "America's Mental Blackjack."

Belief: The Body Reacts to Emotion

There are many who have experienced the quickening of the heart beat, the gasping for breath, the sweating palm, the dryness of the mouth or the feeling of the need to urinate when they have been excited or afraid or nervous for any number of reasons. These physiological reactions occur to some people even when an event becomes almost routine. The nervousness of an athlete on the starting line or an actor as the curtain rises or a worker getting up to speak at a union meeting are examples. If these phenomena did not occur, there could be no "lie detector." The fact is they do occur. But, unfortunately for the polygraphers, it is also a fact that these reactions don't occur in all people at all times in the same way. It may be true that with the majority of people the attempt to deceive will cause some or all of the measured reactions. Even leading research psychiatrists and psychologists don't know for sure how many people do react to the polygraph and, possibly of more importance, whether or how a particular person will react. But even when a reaction is recorded there is no assurance that it was triggered by the act of lying or the fear of being caught in a lie. The testimony of a scientist before the subcommittee is revealing:

"The word 'emotion' is very difficult for the scientist to define. As a matter of fact, most scientists have given up defining it. . . . When we say this person is afraid, angry, fearful, sexy, depressed, sorrowful, excited, happy, all these words mean something; but they certainly do not mean the same thing to all people. . . . What is a lie? A lie is a very complicated concept. The physiological recordings will register disturbances, physiological responses, which mean many things. When a person lies or when a person is emotional, a variety of states, attitudes, transactions of the organism with the environment are implied. Some aspects are more emphasized in one individual than in another. We have no tools whatsoever for identifying with any degree of accuracy what these are. What are physiologic recordings measuring? Physiologic responses. Everything beyond that is inference."

Belief: Reactions Cannot Be Controlled

It already has been pointed out that some people do become disturbed by the act of lying or by the fear of being caught lying and that this disturbance does, in some people, trigger physical reactions. Obviously, however, if these reactions are controllable and a person can keep from "pulling his physiological trigger," then the lie detector is useless.

Once more the expert gives the answer. Before the subcommittee, Dr. Orne summarized a rather lengthy discussion of the controllability of these reactions by stating: "Since we all have this ability at all times, we may consider the ability of the individual to produce a GSR response at will, to inhibit respiration at will, to increase his heartbeat at will as within the repertoire of the normal human being."

Dr. John Lacey of the Fels Research Institute and Antioch College agreed with Dr. Orne when he was asked if the "nervous system is entirely automatic." Dr. Lacey replied: "I think it is so clear today that it is not."

Belief: Physiological Changes Can Be Measured

Here lies the only "truth" to "lie detection." There is no question that there are instruments available today that can with high degrees of validity and reliability measure and record breathing, pulse and sweating (GSR). Once more, however, we find that even the modern polygraph is unsuited to the task. As Dr. Lacey said:

"The so-called lie detector polygraph is, as I understand it, a very simple and for the most part a fairly crude piece of instrumentation. . . . There has been no attempt to take advantage of the many, many things we have learned in the past two decades about the recording of physiological responses, the artifacts, biophysical and electronic, as well as those engendered by the nature of the examiner-examinee interaction. There has been no attempt to take advantage of new methods of display, new methods of computation . . . the lie detector operators still diagnose the record by visual scannings of the record. I may say I am convinced this is an impossible task."

But even if this were not true and today's polygraph was a highly accurate, consistent instrument, it could still only record body reactions. As Professor Inbau stated: "The instrument itself plays a rather minor role in the conduct of a lie detector or polygraph test . . . the instrument itself does not reveal the lie. . . . Consequently, the technique is no better than the man who is making the diagnosis."

And George Lindberg, President of the American Academy of Polygraph Examiners, backed him up by pointing out that one could not apply a percentage to the role of the instrument "because it is 100 percent examiner."

Belief: Only Deception Causes the Squiggles

We already have seen that any conclusion that a squiggle on the machine's graph is proof that the examinee is being deceptive is without foundation. When an operator sees movement on the graph he must determine if the movement is unusual and if it was caused by the answer to a particular question.

When he determines this, the only fact that he has is that one or more of the pens "jumped" or "wiggled" more than usual. What the cause for the change was can only be an inference, not a fact.

What are the facts? How valid and reliable is the "lie detector" in the hands of its users?

Congressman Henry Reuss (D-Wis.), questioned both Inbau and Reid on the statistics in their book, "Lie Detection and Criminal Interrogation," and asked: "What evidence can you give the Committee on the validity of your findings that they (lie detectors) work 99 times out of a hundred?" Congressman Reuss was unable to get a meaningful answer. Inbau and Reid were joined by Lindberg in an exercise of verbal gymnastics which boiled down to the following exchange:

Congressman Reuss: "Do I understand correctly that actual proof of the accuracy of the polygraph test was only obtained in 18.9 percent of the cases?"

Lindberg: "Yes."

Congressman Reuss then commented: "That 18.9 percent verified as correct is a far cry from 99 percent accuracy, is it not?"

In an article titled "Don't Trust the Lie Detector," three Harvard University professors came to the same conclusion as Congressman Reuss and stated: "In short, there is nothing to document the claims of accuracy or effectiveness except bald assertions."

Finally, Dr. Jesse Orlansky of the Defense Department's Institute of Defense Analysis, in a report declassified in May of this year titled "An Assessment of Lie Detection Capability" analyzed the whole field of lie detection, with specific reference to a 10-year period covering about 200,000 tests given by the Department of Defense Orlansky concluded: "Up to the present time it has proved impossible to uncover statistically acceptable performance data to support the view held by polygraph examiners that lie detection is an effective procedure."

"Quack" Operators

But the lack of evidence that the "lie detector" works does not bother the user. And, when definite proof that the process "goofs" is uncovered, the proponent usually shrugs it off as an isolated example. A few polygraph experts will agree with almost any criticism of the machine and its use but only when the instrument is in the hands of ill-trained, uneducated operators. It is these "quacks" who are responsible for the poor statistical evidence, they claim. On the other hand, they would maintain, in the hands of an honest, ethical, intelligent, well-educated, well-trained and experienced "professional" the polygraph is a useful, accurate and reliable instrument to protect the innocent and detect the guilty.

Once more this poses a quandary, however. Even if this were true there seems to be little agreement on what constitutes proper education, training and experience. Professor Inbau estimated that 80 percent of present operators were substandard. Dr. Joseph Kubis, a Fordham University psychologist, pointed out that "There are a number of individuals who buy these instruments, do not take any training, set up, as it were, a shingle and operate with this instrument. . . . There are more of them than we can see and identify." Inbau and his colleagues, Reid and Lindberg, felt that minimum requirements should be a college degree, six months' training in the use of the polygraph, plus six

On Jack Ruby's Test

". . . I wouldn't suggest a lie detector test to testify the truth . . . but if you want such a test, I will arrange for it."

—Chief Justice Warren, responding to Jack Ruby's insistence on a polygraph test, Warren Commission Report, page 807.

". . . In evaluating the polygraph, due consideration must be given to the fact that a physiological response may be caused by factors other than deception, such as fear, anxiety, neurosis, dislike and other emotions. There are no valid statistics as to the reliability of the polygraph. . . ."

—Warren Commission, interpretation of polygraph test, page 813.

"It should be pointed out that the polygraph, often referred to as 'lie detector,' is not in fact such a device. The instrument is designed to record under proper stimuli emotional responses in the form of physiological variations which may indicate and accompany deception. The FBI feels that the polygraph technique is not sufficiently precise to permit absolute judgments of deception or truth without qualifications. . . ."

—FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover, commenting on polygraph examination of Jack Ruby, Warren Commission Report, page 815.

months of closely-supervised internship.

The scientists felt that even more education, training and internship were needed. They stressed the need for education in the specific areas of physiology and psychiatry. Cleve Backster, a former CIA employe who set up its training program and, by his own testimony, has been "a consultant to most every government agency that is using the polygraph today" disagreed. Backster, who charges $500 for a six-week lie detector course in his New York school was obviously displeased with those who would require higher standards. "I don't understand," he said, "by virtue of these standards that are so stipulated how, with less than perhaps 50 people who have acquired their training by this method, the other 2,000-some examiners have managed to get along."

Half the federal agencies require no further background of a trainee than a high school diploma and the extent of federal training ranges from a five to eight-day course in the Navy to a seven-week Army course.

This record prompted Congressman Moss to conclude:

"I have a real concern—in fact, a firm conviction of the complete inadequacy of the training. You can take people and put them through courses and have them take these machines, the less they know about them the more they are inclined to regard them as some miracle that is going to give them a guide as to the truthfulness of another human being."

But even if a person facing a test insists that his examiner have the highest education and training qualifications, he still has little protection.

Professor Skolnick of Yale summarized the problem by stating:

"The scientific basis for lie detection is questionable. There seems to be little evidence that upholds the claim to a regular relationship between lying and emotion; there is even less to support the conclusion that precise inferences can be drawn from the relationship between emotional change and physiological response."

In other words, it is the technique that is at fault and no amount of education and experience can turn an imprecise, unreliable procedure into one of precision and reliability.

And what do you do if the polygraph seems to say you are lying when, in fact, you are being truthful? Cleve Backster suggests: "Get in touch with the Research and Instrument Committee of the Academy for Scientific Interrogation to see if there is a record of the examiner receiving bona fide training and whether he is listed as a member of a reputable polygraph professional organization."

But what is the "Academy?" It is simply a trade association of "lie detector" operators and Backster, for five years chairman of its "research" committee, runs his own "lie detector" school. All one needs to enter his school is a high school diploma and $500. At the end of six weeks one receives a diploma and is called a "graduate," eligible for the "Academy."

No Recourse

Employers and examiners make sure they are protected against victims of polygraph mistakes. Companies normally require employes and applicants to sign a statement of consent and release before taking the polygraph examination. This release usually states that the test is being taken voluntarily and absolves the company of any liability in connection with the test. Some releases give blanket authority for using the test result for any purpose desired by the company which would, of course, allow it to turn over the test results to other employers. The release may confer upon the employer the right to discharge at any time if the employe refuses to take the test or fails to be cleared by such a test.

When an employer contracts with an outside polygraph firm to give tests, the usual procedure is to have the applicant or employe execute a second waiver; this time for the protection of the agency and its examiners. These waivers are required by even the most "professional" examiners. Refusal to sign a waiver is a refusal to be tested since the test will not be given without the waiver. A polygraph examiner may report an innocent worker "guilty" of a theft causing loss of job and serious impairment of future job opportunities and the waiver relieves the examiner of any responsibility for such action.

And Secret Surveillance

The very people who set themselves up as objective "truth" seekers are themselves most guilty of deception. They practice spying, seek to make innocent people informers and create a myth of infallibility for the lie detector. Spying begins as soon as a worker or applicant enters the reception room of the "lie detector" firm. Unknown to the subject, the receptionist is trained to observe his actions and report them to the examiner. In the words of Inbau and Reid: "The recorded observation of a competent secretary or receptionist as to the subject's general conduct and behavior while in the waiting room will be very helpful to the examiner."

Inbau and Reid also instruct examiners to warn workers that even if they are innocent of a theft they will show upon the machine as guilty if they have any suspicion of a fellow worker as the culprit. The solution is tell the examiner who they suspect. If the worker responds: "Well, I don't like to say if I can't prove it," examiners are instructed to "make it clear to him that what he says will not later on be attributed to him or used as proof of any sort, but that a divulgence of the suspicions is necessary for the subject's own test purposes. He should then be urged to name the person he suspects. Usually the innocent subject who harbors any suspicion will name the person or persons he suspects; the guilty subject will seldom identify another person as a suspect."

But the deception and spying are not over. While not necessary to the use of a polygraph, it has become standard procedure to give these tests in a room containing a hidden microphone and a two-way, see-through mirror enabling persons outside the test room to observe and listen to an examination without the examinee's knowledge.

Lindberg: "Most polygraph laboratories are also afforded the psychological mirror, as it is called, or the two-way mirror."

Lindberg then explained that secret observation was only used for training new examiners and, on occasion, to have a female observe when a male operator is testing a female examinee.

Congressman Reuss then asked:

"Do you ever use that to give prospective clients, or police officers, or company officials, or governmental officers who might be contemplating the employment of your agency as a lie detector unit, do you ever use that double mirror to give them an opportunity to observe polygraph tests in action?"

Lindberg: 'Yes, so long as they have no interest in the individual case itself."

Reuss: "When they do observe, this is done without the knowledge of the subjects that they are being observed by these people?"

Lindberg: "Yes."

The Deputy Secretary of Defense, Cyrus Vance, was so shocked when he found that this practice existed that he issued an order to the armed services secretaries, the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and to the Director of NSA which, among other items, required that no polygraph test could be conducted without first advising the subject "whether the area in which the polygraph examination is to be conducted contains a two-way mirror or comparable device and whether the examination will be monitored or recorded in whole or in part by any means." Since the same order required written consent in advance of a test, a subject objecting to this secret prying could simply refuse the test if these conditions existed.

In private industry, however, an examinee does not know if he is being observed or monitored.

There are even graver and more basic objections to the lie detector test than that it is unreliable and that its administration is almost inevitably accompanied by gross abuses. Those objections are that any method of extracting information from people involuntarily violates individual rights of privacy and the principle that no person should be made to incriminate himself. Such practices encourage a police state environment and, since witnesses may talk about others as well as about themselves, a nation of informers.

Let us suppose that an absolutely reliable method can be found of inducing people to talk freely and truthfully, insofar as it is given them to know the truth. For example, would the use of such a "truth" drug be any less objectionable, even assuming its absolute reliability, than a lie detector test? We submit it would not.

The United States Constitution guarantees, in the Fourth Amendment, "The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures. . . ." The Fifth Amendment declares that no person "shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself." Above and beyond these formal constitutional guarantees, democratic societies have always placed a high value on the right of individuals to privacy and to freedom from unreasonable scrutiny of their private affairs. Democracies believe that the protection of these rights outweighs the likelihood that industrial pilferage may go undetected or even Lie detector room with secret mike and 2-way mirror.

Government Should Ban Lie Boxes

"After months of investigation, including many hours of sworn testimony before my Subcommittee, I am firmly convinced that there is no such thing as a 'lie detector.' The American people have been fooled into believing that an electronic gadget used by an investigator with no scientific training can detect truth or falsehood. This is absolutely not the fact. Yet the federal government owns hundreds of polygraphs and spends millions of dollars to give thousands of 'lie detector' tests each year. Until competent scientists complete the most careful study of the many problems involved in the lie detection process, the government should halt the use of the polygraph as a 'lie detector.'" that some criminals may go unpunished.

—Rep. John E. Moss (D-Cal.), Chairman, House Foreign Operations and Government Information Subcommittee.

The constitutional guarantees protect only against action by the government or someone acting by authority of the government. They likewise apply only to forced testimony and to the seizure of evidence, while persons submitting to lie detector tests are asked to give their consent.

But there is nothing voluntary about submitting to a lie detector test when submission is a condition of getting or keeping a job. And the invasion of privacy, and of the principle against compelled testimony, is as great whether the invasion is by a private corporation or a government agency. If any distinction can be drawn, collateral abuses are more likely in the former than in the latter case. The federal law against wiretapping applies alike to private citizens and police officers; and the use of lie detectors by private individuals is at least as objectionable as by government agents.

Four states—Alaska, California, Massachusetts and Oregon—have statutes prohibiting its use in all private employment and (with the exception of California) public employment. State AFL-CIO organizations led the fight for passage of these statutes in the four states. Currently similar bills are under consideration in several other states, including New Jersey where, in backing the bill, State AFL-CIO President Vincent J. Murphy said: "It has been found in many cases that lie detector tests are inaccurate and unreliable and the requirement of submission to such a test is, we believe, a subversion of our American principles of freedom."

Arbitrators and Lie Detectors

In those states where the use of the "lie box" is not prohibited by statute, arbitrators frequently have been faced by attempts to introduce "lie detector" test results to justify the discharge of employes. Uniformly, arbitrators have refused to admit the test results or to consider them as evidence. And where workers have been discharged for refusing to submit to a test, arbitrators have upheld the workers' right to refuse.

In one discharge case, arbiter Norman Eiger declared that polygraph tests "have no probative value and are not admissable as evidence in these proceedings." The discharged worker was ordered reinstated since without the lie detector report there was no proof of theft and therefore the grievant had been discharged without "just cause."

In another case, four union members were discharged for refusing to take a lie detector test after some company property had disappeared. Six workers supposedly had access to the "stolen" merchandise. Two took the test and the company laid off and then fired the other four for refusing to submit to the polygraph. The company viewed the refusal as insubordination. Arbitrator Daniel Lewis felt otherwise. He said: "Under such circumstances the company's demand that the four men take the 'lie detector' test or face discharge for insubordinaton was an invasion of privacy and an unreasonable and unwarranted exercise of management's right."

Even when an employe signed a pledge at the time of hire that he woul submit to a "lie detector" test whenever the company asked—on pain of discharge for refusal—his later refusal was held not cause for discharge.

A wholesale drug company had instituted a "lie detector" program in an attempt to prevent drug and narcotic pilferage. New employes were required to sign a pledge agreeing to take the test and giving the company the right to fire them for refusing or failing to pass a test. Ten years later, after the program was started and after a burglary thought by police to be an "inside job" the company requested that employes take "lie detector" tests. The grievant, along with some others, refused the request either as a volunteer or in obedience to an order.

In holding that the refusal was not proper cause for discharge, arbitrator Peter Kelliher observed:

"As a matter of the 'common law of labor relations,' it must be found that the great weight of both arbitration and legal authority is opposed to the use of lie detector results as competent evidence."

Kelliher did not feel that the release signed at the time of employment was binding and in fact felt it was "clearly an invasion of the collective bargaining rights of this union and could not be upheld." In commenting on the requirement to take the test he stated:

"In view, however, of the overwhelming weight of impartial scientific authority that these lie detector tests are not accurate and legal authority that they do not constitute competent evidence and invade the right of privacy and the constitutional rights against self-incrimination, this Board cannot uphold such a requirement in this case."

Of course, the applicant for employment or the non-union employe who either does not get a job or is dis-

States Outlawing Lie Detectors

On April 2, 1964, Alaska joined California, Massachusetts and Oregon in becoming the fourth state to outlaw the use of lie detectors in employment relations. The text of the Alaska statute follows:

"Lie-Detector Tests. (a) No person either personally or through an agent or representative may request or suggest to a person in his employ or to a person who has an application for employment pending before him or require as a condition of employment that the employe or applicant submit to an examination in which a polygraph or other lie-detecting device is used.

"(b) The provisions of (a) of this section do not apply to the state or a political subdivision of the state when dealing with policemen in its employ or with persons applying to be employed as policemen.

"(c) In this section 'person' includes the state and political subdivision of the state.

"(d) A person who violates this section is guilty of a misdemeanor and, upon conviction, is punishable by a fine of not more than $1,000, or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or both."

charged for failing a "lie box" examination has no recourse in arbitration. This led one writer to say:

"If carried to its ultimate conclusion, widespread or universal use of the polygraph as a personnel selection device would create a pool of unemployable individuals who would be rejected from any employment because they failed to pass the polygraph test. No doubt there would be some in this group who probably should be excluded and for very good reasons. But there would also be in this group others that would be denied employment because the polygraph examiner detected or thought he detected tendencies or characteristics that rendered the individual undesirable for most types of employment. This pool would also contain others who would be denied employment because they refused to submit to such a probing, by waiving their right to privacy, in order to obtain employment. The sociological implications of the universal use of the polygraph in personnel administration could assume monumental proportions."

Contract Protection

Unions cannot depend only on courts and arbitrators to prevent workers from being victimized by the "lie box." As already noted, the unsuccessful job applicant has no recourse to an arbitrator or judge. In addition, the damage to an individual may be an accomplished fact before a judge or arbitrator can rule. Failing a "lie detector" test frequently brands a worker as guilty not only by the company but, unfortunately, also by fellow workers who may have accepted the "myth of infallibility" created by "lie detector" purveyors. Prohibitions against the use of "lie detectors" included in labor-management agreements will prevent this danger. Workers should not be required to submit to this indignity..

A clause which protects both workers and applicants might say:

"The company shall not require, request or suggest that an employe or applicant for employment take a polygraph or any other form of lie detector test."

The fact that a particular company has not used or says it does not intend to use the "lie box" should not persuade a union to neglect closing the door before the approach of the lie detector seller. It may be much easier to negotiate a preventive clause than to convince a company to end its "lie detector" program.

There have been suggestions that unions join with management in working out "rules of the game" governing the use of the polygraph in employment relations. The trouble is that, while some protective guarantees might reduce or even possibly eliminate some of the abuses detailed in this report, they cannot remove the basic inadequacies of the polygraph in its use as a "lie detector."

The only sure protection for the worker is not to gamble on the "lie box" game. And, when he refuses the gamble, he joins such distinguished Americans as Assistant Secretary of Defense Arthur Sylvester, the Director of Naval Intelligence, Rear Admiral Rufus Taylor and Rep. John E. Moss.

When the suggestion was made during an investigation of an alleged information leak that Defense Department officials take a lie detector test, Secretary Sylvester refused. And, as the following exchange between Congressman Moss and Admiral Taylor shows, both shared the Secretary's views:

Moss: "Of course, Admiral, I have since April of last year been directing a staff study of polygraphs. We have been attempting to get together a great deal of information so that we would be in a position to understand the full subject and prepare for the hearings.

"I started this assignment with no definite opinion on polygraphs. I had never given them much thought but, as a result of the experience of the past 12 months, I would refuse most emphatically to take one, unless perhaps I had my personal physician, a psychiatrist and my lawyer with me and had their evaluation of what was going on."

Admiral Taylor: "I really can hardly blame you for taking that view, particularly in view of some of the things I have heard in sitting in this hearing on the sidelines . . . I have misgivings about this thing, too. What I feel to be a lot of pseudo-scientific nonsense that has been discussed here . . . But if you want my considered opinion as someone advising you to what your rights and where your best interests lie, I would say don't take a polygraph examination."

UNION EDUCATION AND CIVIL LIBERTIES

by Harry Fleischman, Director,
National Labor Service, American Jewish Committee

A cartoon in the New Yorker showed a wife complaining to her bearded artist-husband, "Why do you have to be a non-conformist like everybody else?"

Would that it were so. Unfortunately, non-conformity is still viewed by the American people as a dangerous disease to be shunned like the plague.

A Purdue University poll of teen-age opinions revealed that more than half of our high school students believe that wiretapping and the third degree should be legalized to help the police maintain obedience and that police should censor books, movies, radio and TV to shield us from improper thinking. Moreover, 41 per cent would abolish freedom of the press and 33 per cent would deny freedom of speech to people who hold unpopular views.

Nor can we turn for defense of free speech to our temples of learning. Two professors who polled a "random sample" of University of Wisconsin students found that the students "overwhelmingly rejected the principles of the Bill of Rights" -- the right to freedom of press, assembly and worship. Indeed, Chief Justice Earl Warren of the U.S. Supreme Court said several years ago that he doubted the Bill of Rights would win approval if it were submitted to this generation of Americans in a referendum.

Businessmen follow along in the accustomed pattern. Gallup and Roper polls commissioned by the Fund for the Republic a decade ago disclosed that a third of college-educated businessmen would ban a person who favors government ownership of big industry from teaching in a college. Where businessmen had less than college education, 58 per cent would ban such a teacher.

An example of business views was a pamphlet, "So You Want a Better Job?" by Paul W. Boynton, a personnel officer of Socony Vacuum Oil Company, which included this passage:

"Personal views can cause a lot of trouble. Remember then to keep them always conservative. The 'isms' are out. Business being what it is, it naturally looks with disfavor on the wild-eyed radical or even the moderate pink."

When Socialist leader Norman Thomas wrote to the company, Boynton came to see him but couldn't understand why Thomas was exercised. After all, 300,000 copies of his pamphlet had been circulated for years, and Thomas' was the first word of criticism that had reached him.

Happily, after a short time, C.F. Beatty, Socony's industrial relations director, wrote Thomas that the pamphlet had been revised to proclaim that "the world needs different viewpoints; blind conformity means stagnation. You won't get far unless you think for yourself."

Unfortunately, Norman Thomases are rare. How strong is the current pressure for conformity in the business world today?

With high school and college students, to say nothing of businessmen, so fearful of dissent, should we expect more of the labor movement? Ideally we should, since organized labor learned the need for civil liberties the hard way. As early as 1806, when Philadelphia shoemakers went on strike, they were brought to trial and found guilty for forming "a combination and conspiracy to raise their wages." In 1894, in the Pullman strike, a labor injunction -- termed by union leader Eugene V. Debs a "Gatling gun on paper" -- helped crush the strike and smash the American Railway Union. Lockouts, blacklists, yellow-dog contracts, labor spies to undermine and betray unions and the use of troops and deputized thugs to terrorize workers and organizers were all parts of the employer arsenal in the past.

Even today, as a recent convention of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations pointed out, "Freedom of speech, assembly, association and solicitation of membership for union organizers and factory workers are virtually non-existent in the rural South and all efforts to exercise these rights have been and are being frustrated, despite the guarantees of the Constitution." In 1965, organizer Henry Jenkins of the Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union received death threats just before a National Labor Relations Board election in Greensboro, Alabama. In 1961, two organizers of the American Federation of Hosiery Workers were brutally beaten by hoodlums in Ellijay, Georgia, and then arrested for "fighting, disorderly conduct, inciting a riot and soliciting membership without a license." A union organizer was beaten and kidnapped by a job in Franklinton, N.C., while the city police and the county sheriff turned their backs. When two organizers of the Textile Workers Union were knifed in Fitzgerald, Georgia, police blandly wrote off this incident with a report that they got into a fight and knifed each other.

The right to dissent, to hold unpopular views, to try to convince others and change existing practices by peaceful and lawful means is the very cornerstone of American liberty. As Labor, the paper of the railway brotherhoods, eloquently said:

"Our forefathers fought a bloody seven-year revolution to insure these rights and bequeath them to their descendants...What distinguishes an American from the citizen of a Communist land or from the subjects of any other tyrant is not chiefly the American's standard of living. It's that we are more nearly free men. And the Bill of Rights is what protects our freedom."

Yet, while every AFL-CIO convention has unanimously passed strong resolutions in defense of civil liberties, there is a wide gap between the positions voted at conventions and the views of local union leaders. Rank and file unionists score even lower in concern for civil liberties.

Back in 1954, the Fund for the Republic polled 5,000 rank and file Americans and 1,500 community leaders on their attitudes towards communists and civil liberties. The survey's results, summarized by Harvard Professor Samuel A. Stouffer in a fact-packed book, "Communists, Conformity and Civil Liberties," included data on 1,537 rank and file unionists and 107 presidents of local unions.

The following year, Ben Segal, then with the Trade Union Program of the Fund for the Republic, and I conducted polls of local union leaders at union leadership training institutes. Union educational directors joined in. The answers to our institute quizzes, covering 1,301 local union heads at more than a score of institutes from 1955 to 1964, were remarkably similar to those listed by Stouffer. They disclosed that union members' enthusiasm for the traditional American principles embodied in the Bill of Rights, their tolerance of people whose ideas and opinions differed from their own, were lukewarm at best.

What do we mean by "tolerance?" Not necessarily approval. We mean that, even if we disagree strongly with other people's opinions, we uphold their rights of free expression, the civil liberties guaranteed to them by the Constitution and the laws of the United States.

President George Meany of the AFL-CIO stresses that "one need not accept the doctrines of democratic socialism to realize that its adherents are true democrats who are uncompromising enemies of communism and all other forms of dictatorship. As a matter of fact, democratic socialists have often shared with free trade unionists the honor of being the first and main target of communist hostility, abuse, persecution and liquidation." Yet two out of five local union leaders would bar a socialist from teaching and one out of five would expel a socialist from his local union.

Although the Bill of Rights declares that Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, more than half of our local union leaders would deny an atheist the right to teach and one out of four would keep him out of the union.

As to communists, two out of three local union leaders would strip American-born communists of their American citizenship, while five out of six would fire a communist working in a defense plant. Almost half would fire a communist who clerked in a store.

During the McCarthy era, labor was fearful of the witchhunts which spread throughout the land. Unions are not opposed to investigations per se. They hailed the LaFollette probe into labor spying, but AFL-CIO spokesmen have criticized "loosely-conducted congressional investigations where unfounded accusations and unproved charges had the effect of character assassination of good, loyal Americans." Such inquiries were critized as wandering from any proper legislative purpose into attempts "to enforce uniformity of opinions and to stifle the traditional American right to dissent." Yet two thirds of local union leaders polled backed the McCarthyite notion that Congress should investigate political beliefs and associations in order to determine whether they are "un-American."

How is it that such a wide gap exists between the views of top union spokesmen and those of local leaders and rank and filers? What kind of union education is there on civil liberties, civil rights, public affairs and voter participation? Has union education failed to contribute effectively to union members' understanding of American liberties?

Perhaps we can best answer these questions by examining the nature, scope and function of labor education. First of all, we must realize that the raw material for union education -- workers in mines, mills, factories and offices -- comes out of our primary and secondary school systems with woefully inadequate teaching about civil liberties and the primary place it should hold in our American way of life. The reasons for this are being dealt with in other papers before this conference, so I will not attempt to enumerate their causes.

Second, we must recognize that labor education on the formal level -- classes, institutes, conferences -- reaches only a very small proportion of union members. For all practical intents and purposes, labor education is leadership training. It is directed at shop stewards, committeemen, shop chairmen and paid union officials such as organizers and business agents. It tends to focus on practical training rather than general education, concentrating on such subjects as steward and officer training, collective bargaining, public speaking, union structure and administration. In the broader subjects, as Lawrence Rogin, AFL-CIO education director, has pointed out, the study of economics starts out with unemployment and wages, and political science with the need for passage of a minimum wage law or a Wagner Act. That education which has been most successful starts with the immediate problems of the workers and builds upon them. In many cases, he concedes, the training is conceived narrowly and becomes self-defeating, limited only to training.

Where, instead, the educator builds upon the immediate problems to take the student to an exploration of the broad principle, the theoretical concept, he can help develop the ability of "learning how to learn" which Jack London once described as the characteristic of the liberally educated individual.

Thus, suggests Rogin, the problem of legislative reapportionment can open the way to an analysis of the concept of democracy. The pressures of Negroes for jobs and housing creates immediate problems for unions to consider, plus the possibility of understanding history, anthropology, psychology and sociology.

The AFL-CIO Education Department conducts no schools or classes under its own direct sponsorship. It assists, guides and inspires those international unions and state and local labor bodies which do carry on educational activity. It prepares teaching materials, conducts professional conferences for labor educators, and urges unions without educational programs to venture into the field. It maintains the major labor film library in the United States, which contains many films dealing with civil liberties and rights. It encourages the development of university labor education centers and assists in promoting effective cooperation between them and the unions.

In preparation for this paper, we wrote the nation's union educational directors and university labor specialists to find out what kind of education union members were receiving in civil liberties, civil rights and citizenship participation. We received almost forty replies, with extensive samples of programs developed. In addition, Mrs. Judy Marine, research assistant at the Center for Research and Education in American Liberties, interviewed many education directors in Washington and New York. The results of those inquiries will be compiled and passed along to you following this conference. Broadly speaking, they indicated that of the more than 130 national and international unions affiliated with the AFL-CIO, only about 40 have staff in the national office charged with the specific responsibility of developing educational programs. Most of the larger unions, covering approximately half the AFL-CIO membership, are in this number. Many large unions also have regional education directors throughout the country. Frequently they carry on massive programs, including the development of special materials and the constant involvement of their local unions in a variety of educational activities. Even where education is ignored or frowned upon by the national offices of some unions, many of their local and regional organizations carry on extensive educational programs.

The most prominent union educational activity is the one-week resident labor school, usually sponsored by a national union, but some also by state federations. Approximately 150 to 200 such schools are held each summer, with 10,000 to 15,000 students. Most of them meet on university campuses and are held in cooperation with university labor education centers, but others take place at summer camps, hotels and other conference centers, including a few owned by unions.

About 50,000 trade unionists participate in weekend educational conferences, also of an intensive nature. These are primarily sponsored by individual unions, but many involve a number of unions. The programs of weekend conferences range the gamut of union concerns -- the "tool" subjects, plus economic, social, political and international problems.

In recent years, training of full-time union personnel in longer resident programs has been growing, with much experimentation to find the most effective methods and content for this activity.

Many university labor programs and local unions also carry on a variety of classes held in the evening or at other times workers can attend without taking time off from work. These classes generally meet once a week, with most lasting from six to ten weeks. In one recent year, universities reported conducting almost 450 such courses, with about 12,000 students. This does not include the large number of classes run by unions on their own. But, at most, only 100,000 unionists attend any classes -- 15,000,000 union members remain without any formal union education.

What subjects are the students given? One area of concentration is concerned with the "tool" subjects, union administration, shop steward training, collective bargaining, arbitration procedures, communication and related subjects. Another seeks to develop effective union citizenship, teaching labor history and an understanding of the role of the union in industry and society. A third area deals with labor legislation in all its aspects. More and more attention is being given to the political role of unions, and their broad legislative objectives, with courses in economics, civil rights, reapportionment, the threat to democracy posed by the ultra-right, political science and international affairs. Unions are increasingly concerned lest their gains at the bargaining table be lost in the halls of Congress and state legislatures. Finally, especially in the long-term schools, there is an attempt to provide an understanding of the total society, with a concentration on the social sciences, but with some attention to the humanities as well.

Are unions democratic? By and large they are, especially in the locals. They are far more democratic, by their very nature, than business organizations which are run on a hierarchical principle. Now, more than in the past, there is acceptance of dissent and some knowledge of the traditional methods of democracy. To some extent this is due to the internal democracy provisions of the Landrum-Griffin Act, which eliminated some of the grosser aspects of union autocracy, i.e., no elections, dictatorial control, expulsion of opposition members, which prevailed in a few unions.

Democracy does not mean that decisions are always wise or progressive. In some craft unions, when union officers urged their locals to accept Negro members, the members democratically threw out their officers. It is interesting to note that many business critics of unions, who protest "boss rule" in unions, at the same time are unhappy when rank and file workers vote to reject contracts union leaders have accepted. Then the cry becomes, "what kind of leaders are you when you can't even control your rank and file?"

One factor that induces unions to promote teaching about civil rights and civil liberties is the need to promote unionization in difficult situations. Thus, attempts by textile workers and other unions in the South to organize have been met by ordinances requiring organizers to pay license fees up to $2,500; meeting places have suddenly become unavailable; local papers and radio stations carry only anti-union messages; race-hate and allegedly anti-Communist propaganda smears the unions; police and vigilante brutality break out. Therefore, unions had to teach about the rights guaranteed by the Constitution. In doing so, unions found themselves having to teach that the same rights apply in situations some unions would prefer to ignore -- such as civil rights. When school desegregation was a hot issue in the South, and many union members opposed such integration, some union educators used an indirect approach to deal with the issue. They would focus on the right to picket, but give illustrations that would parallel experiences on school desegregation. For instance, Bill Elkuss of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers used this theoretical case:

The South Carolina legislature outlaws picketing. An employer decides this is a good time to destroy the union. He cuts wages, eliminates paid holidays and vacations. What would you do?

SOUTHERN UNIONISTS: We'd go on strike and carry picket signs.

EDUCATOR: Suppose the Governor calls out the National Guard, not to enforce the First Amendment on free speech, but to stop your picketing.

SOUTHERN UNIONISTS: We'd go to court -- all the way to the Supreme Court, if necessary.

EDUCATOR: Okay, the court rules you have the right to picket peacefully and enjoins the Governor from using the National Guard to stop your picketing. But a "Citizens' Council to Stop Picketing" comes to the plant gates, shouts "Kill those dirty Communists," and throws bricks and stones until you fall. If you were President of the United States, what would you do?

SOUTHERN UNIONISTS: Issue a Presidential Proclamation calling on the mob to disperse and ordering the Governor to enforce the law.

EDUCATOR: What if the mob and the Governor pay no attention to the Proclamation and continue to beat up union pickets?

SOUTHERN UNIONISTS: Only one thing to do. Federalize the National Guard or call out the troops.

In this case, union students who were segregationists were led by the logic of the situation to conclusions they would have bitterly resisted before dealing with this case study.

In the 1950 Senatorial primary in North Carolina, Frank Graham received 90 per cent of the Negro votes. That fact was the major issue in the run-off. The unionized mill villages stayed with Graham, while the non-union ones voted on the basis of race. The result indicated the effects of intensive union education. Education didn't eliminate prejudice, but it enabled even segregationist workers to put the race question into some kind of perspective, balancing it with other issues favored by the candidates.

Where unions support civil rights, they find that they must carry on a good deal of education in the South to carry their members along with them. And now that the spirit and elan of the civil rights movement in the past few years has provided a shining example to the labor movement, unions are increasingly playing up the theme of a Negro-labor-liberal coalition in their organizing efforts in the South. The International Chemical Workers Union, which had a number of segregated locals only a few years ago, has made a movie, "Union and Freedom," telling of the victorious strike against the Scripto Company in Atlanta. It shows Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., speaking at strike meetings and marching with union President Walter L. Mitchell on the picket line.

Southern unions sponsor an annual month-long Southern Labor Training Center for full-time staff plus a number of week-long institutes which stress the same coalition concept.

Civil liberties situations which led unions to attempt to educate their members include the industrial security problem. A number of years ago, the AFL-CIO sponsored a pamphlet on "Security, Civil Liberties and Unions," and many conferences on the subject took place. Labor's vigorous activity against abuses in the various government security programs was reflected in our poll, which showed nine out of ten local union leaders supporting the right of those accused as security risks to confront and cross-examine their accusers. It was not until 1960 that the Supreme Court held the government's industrial security program invalid in an 8-to-1 decision because denial of confrontation and cross-examination of government witnesses, without statutory authority, was illegal.

The AFL-CIO and its affiliates, recognizing that wiretapping constitutes a serious threat to personal liberties and that technological developments have made it very difficult to control, has urged a law permitting wiretaps only to federal agents under specific court orders, in an area clearly defined to cover espionage, treason and kidnapping. All other taps should be banned, said the AFL-CIO, including a prohibition on using tapped information at congressional hearings. Fittingly, the Communications Workers of America has led the fight against wiretapping.

The use of so-called "lie detectors," says the AFL-CIO, violates basic considerations of human dignity, raises issues of invasion of privacy, self-incrimination, and implies the concept of guilty until proven innocent. Therefore it is waging a broad campaign for federal action to ban the use of such devices by both private employers and government, and the issue comes up at many union schools and in union papers.

Seven unions and a farmers' group have joined the American Civil Liberties Union in challenging the constitutionality of the non-communist affidavit provision of the Taft-Hartley Act. The oath was attacked as a bill of attainder (legislative punishment without judicial trial) prohibited by Article I, Section 9 of the Constitution.

The brief was filed in support of leaders of the Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers who were convicted of falsely denying affiliation with the Communist Party. Section 9(h) of the Taft-Hartley Act barred access to NLRB services to organizations failing to file such affidavits. The petition was backed by the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, the Meat Cutters, Teachers, Typographers, Transport Workers, Auto Workers, Packinghouse Workers and the National Farmers Union.

The brief says that the groups are especially interested in the case "because (we) are opposed to government-imposed loyalty tests...as a prerequisite for holding office...in a private organization. (We) are opposed in particular to such tests as a condition for the receipt of a benefit otherwise made freely available by statute."

Noting that the Mine-Mill Union was expelled from the CIO in 1949 because it was found to be dominated by the Communist Party, the brief contrasted that action by a private association with governmental compulsion that the Taft-Hartley Act's affidavit represents.

One important area where most unions have been discouraging, rather than encouraging, the right to dissent deals with the war in Vietnam. The official position of the AFL-CIO strongly backs the Administration's position on that war and union papers and educational programs reflect that policy, with very few exceptions. District 65, RWDSU, did carry on open debate at special membership meetings and printed the debate in its paper, but that educational effort is almost unique. There are a handful of other unions permitting debate on the issue, such as the American Federation of Teachers, but most have made it a sacred cow. True, the AFL-CIO sponsors the daily broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan over the American Broadcasting Company network, despite his frequently critical comments, but I am afraid that that is the exception that proves the rule.

Since only 100,000 unionists attend union classes or institutes, what kind of education do rank and file members receive from their unions? The one main line of communication which reaches all union members is the union journal. Yet in many cases the union paper is narrowly parochial with its main stress on bread and butter issues. While most such papers rarely deal with civil liberties, the coverage of civil rights issues in recent years has risen markedly.

Educational and citizenship themes are often discussed at local union meetings, but unfortunately such meetings are infrequently well-attended unless contract negotiations or a strike vote are on the agenda.

At the same time, because unions are vitally interested in legislation, increasing emphasis has been placed on political education and COPE (Committee on Political Education) has engaged in vigorous voter registration drives and distribution of simple educational material. This has reached far more rank and file union members than union educational departments.

In addition, the AFL-CIO Community Services Department has trained 75,000 union counselors, ready to lend a hand when a worker gets into financial trouble, steer unionists to appropriate social agencies when they run into difficulties, help on welfare and mental health problems, and serve on boards of many community agencies. In a broad sense, both COPE and the Community Services Department are engaged in union education for better citizenship.

Nevertheless, civil liberties remains an abstraction for most local union leaders and rank and file unionists' zeal for civil liberties is depressingly low. Is the prospect of educating unionists in civil liberties then a hopeless one?

Far from it. We mentioned that the questionnaire we distributed at union summer schools brought discouragingly negative responses, but we didn't reveal the whole story. We distributed the attached questionnaire at the opening institute session. Local union leaders filled them out immediately -- without any discussion. We told the participants not to sign their names and emphasized that this was an opinion poll, not a test. After the questionnaires were handed in, we kept the results secret until the closing session of the institute, so that knowledge of the results would not color classroom discussion.

In class the next day, we asked the students to define democracy. Invariably, and usually without much prodding, the answers -- which we put on the blackboard -- included:

* Freedom of Speech
* Freedom of Press
* Freedom of Worship
* Freedom of Assembly
* Majority Rule with Protection of the Rights of the Minority.

Then, as we asked for discussion on the specific questions, a fascinating process started. In dealing with subjects like collective bargaining, labor economics, political issues and civil rights, a good many of the local union leaders are aware of and accept the union viewpoint, but civil liberties is virgin territory for most of them. Thus, prior to discussion, the questionnaires revealed that two out of five would keep a Socialist from teaching.

We called on students who backed each side of the issue to explain why. "I don't want a Socialist giving my kids propaganda about socialism in class," said one. (We had to lay down ground rules and explain that any teacher who propagandized for any point of view was not teaching -- he was indoctrinating. The purpose of teaching, we continued, was not only to present facts to students but lead them to think for themselves about the meaning of those facts. For the sake of our discussion, we added, we had to assume that the teacher was following the approved curriculum, or else he could be fired for not doing his job.)

"I still don't want a Socialist as a teacher. He's opposed to our economic system, and if he's a good teacher, he will have influence on the children, even outside the classroom." Back we went to the blackboard. How did this answer square with the definition of democracy he had previously approved? Brows were furrowed.

The same process, only more so, occurred when it came to atheism. Some stressed that if the atheist was a good teacher and a man of impeccable morals, he would be even more "dangerous," because then his example would be more attractive to the children. Most, however, despite strong personal misgivings, expressed the view that freedom of speech required protecting the rights even of an atheist. Some, backing that view, pointed out that the Bill of Rights declares that Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.

What about Communists? "They're enemies of our country. Why let them use our freedoms to destroy freedom?" "They tried to bust our union before. We won't give them another chance." "Yes," replied another, "but what good is freedom of speech if we allow it only to people with whom we agree? Unless those whose views are obnoxious are free to speak, freedom is a fiction." The arguments waxed hot and heavy -- never completely resolved, but certainly with much greater thought given to the complexities of the problem.

When almost half said they would fire a Communist who clerked in a store, the question arose, "Should Communists have the right to eat?" Almost all said yes, and then puzzled out their replies when asked, "If you would deny a job as a store clerk, what jobs should a Communist be allowed to hold? Or should he just be on relief, with our taxes supporting him?"

When two-thirds of the local union leaders voted to strip American-born Communists of their citizenship, we asked what did the Constitution provide on revoking citizenship for native Americans. They were usually flabbergasted to learn that citizenship can be revoked only for treason against the United States, which consists "only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort" and that "no person shall be convicted of treason unless on testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act or on confession in open court."

We applied similar Socratic dialogues to each item on the questionnaire, to the accompaniment of pained expressions, heated debate and eventual enlightenment. One union staffer put it this way, "You're really unfair. You're making us think!"

This technique, of course, is not the only successful way to teach unionists about civil liberties. But it demonstrated that open, informed discussion on the issues invariably made support for civil liberties soar dramatically.

If civil liberties views can be reversed so easily, suggest some observers, we need not fear the anti-civil liberty attitudes of most Americans. They're only skin-deep. That's correct, but only if we can provide effective civil liberties education for all Americans. Today, neither the school system, corporate programs or union education is doing an adequate job. We need not only to develop additional materials and techniques but also to place civil liberties higher on our list of priorities.

Writing on "Strengthening Union Democracy" in the American Federationist some years ago, Jack Barbash of the University of Wisconsin noted that "the democratic process is of the essence of union functioning because if the union is not an instrument of interest representation it is nothing. The union's ability to represent its constituents has been and is its chief stock in trade in a way that is not true of any other private association. A failure of the union to function democratically is therefore a failure in its central function."

To give vitality to democracy in the union within the framework of union goals, suggested Barbash, "the union leadership must first act out of conviction that democracy is worthwhile even if it is occasionally inconvenient. And secondly, union leadership must communicate to the membership an awareness and sensitivity to the responsibilities and the occasional inconveniences involved in the exercise of democratic rights."

How can this be done? In addition to the use of civil liberties questionnaires as a basis for discussion courses, many other approaches are possible. In 1962, for instance, the National Institute of Labor Education published a pamphlet on "Teaching Ethics in Labor Education" which included case materials, a bibliography, and ways of adapting the case method to labor ethics education. That project was financed by the Fund for Adult Education.

Certainly today it ought to be possible to secure the financial support needed to prepare a pamphlet which could bring together under one cover a wide variety of methods and materials on teaching civil liberties. The pamphlet might well include:

1. Purposes and goals in teaching civil liberties.

2. Ways in which civil liberties concerns can be salted into traditional labor subjects, such as steward training, grievance procedure, collective bargaining, organizing, public speaking, etc.

3. Ways of teaching specific aspects of civil liberties -- due process of law, free speech, right of assembly, etc.

4. One shot sessions for summer schools and institutes that would emphasize civil liberties.

5. Case studies in a union setting designed to stimulate discussion of alternate approaches on the theme of "how would you handle this situation?"

6. Selected list of films and pamphlets useful in teaching civil liberties.

7. Resources for teaching civil liberties. Descriptions of government and private agencies, universities and unions experienced in this field and types of persons they have available.

8. Brief reading excerpts from great historic figures associated with the idea of democracy.

9. The Democratic Practices Code of the AFL-CIO Committee on Ethical Practices.

10. Obstacles to look for when teaching about civil liberties and how to overcome them.

It should not be assumed that having materials available will automatically assure their full use. Training or demonstration programs may need to be developed, and conferences held to bring the full range of trade union education to bear on this subject.

At best, however, we must remember that trade union education reaches but a fraction of union members. We need to supplement this education with a constant flood of materials in the public schools, in corporate programs, in the daily press, magazines, radio and TV. Only such a massive educational development can create the climate and soil in which full democracy can flower.

TWENTY QUESTIONS ON HUMAN RIGHTS

WHAT DO YOU THINK?

NOTE TO UNION MEMBERS: Please fill out carefully. Many union members disagree on the correct answers to the questions below. All we are looking for is your opinion. PLEASE DON'T SIGN YOUR NAME.

Put a circle around Y (for Yes) if you agree with a statement below; if you do not agree, circle N (for No).

1. Should a man who favors government ownership of the railroads and big industry

   (a) be allowed to teach? Y N

   (b) be expelled if he is a member of your union? Y N

2. Should an atheist (a man who doesn't believe in the existence of God)

   (a) be allowed to teach? Y N

   (b) be expelled if he is a member of your union? Y N

3. Should an admitted Communist

   (a) be allowed to teach? Y N

   (b) be expelled if he is a member of your union? Y N

   (c) be fired if he works in a defense plant? Y N

   (d) be fired if he is a clerk in a store? Y N

4. Should an American-born admitted Communist have his citizenship taken from him? Y N

5. Should admitted Communists be jailed? Y N

6. Is it more important to identify all the Communists even if some innocent people should be hurt, than to protect the innocent even if some Communists are not found out? Y N

7. Should those accused as security risks under federal security programs have the right to confront and cross-examine their accusters? Y N

8. Should Government security tests be confined only to sensitive positions involving military, atomic, government or international affairs and not be required for other positions? Y N

9. Is everyone who invokes the privilege against self-incrimination guilty as suspected? Y N

10. Should Congress investigate political beliefs and associations in order to determine whether they are "un-American?" Y N

11. Should employers be permitted to state their views regarding labor unions to their workers? Y N

TEACHING THE BILL OF RIGHTS IN CALIFORNIA

The American people are devoted to their Constitution and to the individual rights it guarantees, but they have repeatedly demonstrated their difficulty in translating the broad principles of freedom into action in specific cases. The problem, almost invariably, is ignorance of the practical, everyday meaning of these principles. To make sure that future generations are better informed about their rights and responsibilities as Americans, the Constitutional Rights Foundation (609 South Grand Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90017) is cooperating with public education agencies in California to improve teaching about the Bill of Rights in the state's schools. The foundation is a nonprofit organization made up of public-spirited educators, lawyers, businessmen, labor leaders, and motion picture personalities. The state-wide program it is sparking is described here by the editor of the California Teachers Association Journal.

By J. WILSON McKENNEY

ONE OUT OF FOUR U.S. high school seniors believes that "the government should prohibit some people from making public speeches." Sixty-three per cent of these graduating teenagers would not allow Communists to speak on the radio in peacetime, and 42 per cent agree that the police or the FBI may sometimes be right in giving a man "the third degree" in order to make him talk.

These are the findings of H. H. Remmers and his associates at the Purdue University Division of Educational Reference. Since 1951 they have tested repeatedly the attitudes of young U.S. citizens, and have concluded that these young people display an appalling lack of comprehension of the content and meaning of the Bill of Rights.

But failure to understand that liberty is indivisible is far more widespread. Many Americans who recently tested their own elementary knowledge of the Bill of Rights by participating in the Columbia Broadcasting System's "National Citizenship Test," demonstrated that ignorance is not limited to the young (see box on page 88). The evidence indicates clearly that Americans are fervently attached to the concept of freedom—in many wars they have fought bravely in its defense. Yet, too often, their understanding of the practice of freedom has been as superficial as the war-time slogans for which they fought. Young and old, they are largely ignorant of the basic charter of their freedom and, in practice, are often oblivious to—even approving of—its violation in specific, emotion-laden instances.

In California, however, something tangible is being done about this gap between principle and practice. The State Board of Education, the State Department of Education, and the Constitutional Rights Foundation (CRF), have combined forces to see that future generations of high school graduates are better educated concerning their freedoms, their liberties, their rights and responsibilities as citizens, through better teaching of the Bill of Rights.

California's attack on ignorance of the principles of individual freedom was launched in 1963 when CRF representatives persuaded the State Board of Education to look into the nature and extent of teaching about constitutional rights in the schools of the state. It was found that a few school districts had prepared resource materials for their teachers, but the record was spotty, and no comprehensive approach to the subject had been developed.

"Howard had committed the 'crime' of ordering, for a voter registration drive, the drawing of a poster showing a chained Negro in prayer."

As a result, the Board prepared a policy statement that strongly endorsed teaching about the Bill of Rights in the schools and called for improved instruction in the field (see box on page 69). Methodist Bishop Gerald Kennedy of Los Angeles was appointed chairman of a four-man committee of members of the Board charged with responsibility for seeing that the policy was implemented, and a fourteen-man advisory committee of attorneys, educators, and civic leaders, headed by Richard C. Maxwell, Dean of the School of Law at the University of California at Los Angeles, was appointed to aid the committee.

The immediate need, the Board decided, was for a teachers curriculum guide for use within the existing social studies program in the last two years of high school. With a $30,000 grant from CRF, State Superintendent of Schools Max Rafferty set up a Department of Education project to develop a guide that would provide tangible aid to teachers in treating the subject in greater depth. This guide, the Bill of Rights Source Book for teachers of American history and government, is now being published and will be distributed to eleventh- and twelfth-grade teachers throughout the state. It presents applications of the Bill of Rights to current controversies—from school segregation and sit-ins to school prayer and released time—with legal and historical background. The Source Book does not aim at developing a particular point of view, but at stimulating an informative dialogue among those with differing points of view.

While the guide was in preparation, CRF launched, in 1964, the first of an annual series of Bill of Rights Teachers Contests to encourage more secondary school teachers to venture into the field. Modest cash prizes and state-wide recognition are offered to teachers who have developed effective classroom approaches to constitutional liberties.

Among the first year's contest winners, the direct approach appeared to be most popular. For instance, Gregory L. Goodwin, a Bakersfield American history teacher, reported how he had presented to his classes "a petition to insure personal liberties."

He wrote at the top of a sheet, "We, the undersigned, urge that the following points of personal liberty be considered legal and binding upon the government of the United States of America. If necessary, they should be added to the Constitution in the form of Amendments." He then listed seven brief statements which, with minor word changes, accurately identified seven provisions in the Bill of Rights.

Few of his students volunteered to sign the paper, and even fewer recognized that the petition had been drawn from the Constitution. He then asked his students to offer petitions to a few neighbors and relatives. Only one-fourth of the adults recognized the source of the wording. Goodwin used this shocking demonstration of ignorance as an effective introduction to case studies of the application of the Bill of Rights to specific individual liberties.

Even more realistic was the first-prize entry submitted by Joyce Fulton, history teacher at Woodside High School, San Mateo county. Convinced that the increased concern for Bill of Rights protections in recent years has been the result of the dramatic exposure by Negroes of the freedom gap between principle and practice in America, Miss Fulton used as the core of her study "The Due Processing of Asbury Howard," an article by Jeffrey Fuller, which appeared in The Reporter of April 16, 1959. Fuller's account tells of the arrest, courtroom "trial," and subsequent courthouse beating of the Alabama Negro by angry whites. Howard had committed the "crime" of ordering, for a voter registration drive, the drawing of a poster showing a chained Negro in prayer.

Miss Fulton took her students step by step through the gripping, tragic story of Howard's experience to enable them to understand the practical applications of due process, search, and seizure, and Fourteenth Amendment protections. She plunged her students into vigorous discussion of human rights and liberties to illustrate the complexities of Supreme Court interpretations in relation to state laws. And after using these methods for two years she had ample evidence that this realistic case study approach had helped her students to understand better the true meaning of the Bill of Rights.

FEW teachers, however, are as imaginative or as informed as Miss Fulton and Mr. Goodwin, and the problems of presenting the subject in the classroom are many. As Miss Fulton pointed out, when she was invited to speak before the State Board of Education last June, there are numerous barriers to good teaching and learning in the field. The complexity of the issues (often stumping well-trained lawyers), the necessity of obtaining and using pertinent and current materials, and the difficulty of translating fast-changing policies and events into appropriate study units, all present obstacles that must be overcome.

Furthermore: "To teach the Bill of Rights meaningfully," she said, "the teacher must make a conscious choice, immersing himself and his class in controversy. The teacher becomes a target for critical parents—and many teachers are understandably reluctant to open up Pandora's box.

> NO STUDENT SHOULD leave our schools without a lively knowledge of the American Constitution, for here are found the main principles of our heritage. Our democracy can be kept strong only by the dedication of every new generation to the discipline of liberty. In knowledge of the Bill of Rights and in loyalty to its propositions rests our faith in the future.
> We believe the teaching in this field, no matter how controversial the issue, should be conducted within the framework of free discussion. Not only the history of the Bill of Rights should be taught, but contemporary issues it raises, such as the debate over separation of church and state embodied in the First Amendment, and the privilege against self-incrimination as provided in the Fifth Amendment, should be discussed. Now is the time to help our young people to become aware of the risks, the privileges, and the personal demands of freedom.
> We urge all school superintendents to give this subject the highest priority. We hope that the very conduct of the classes studying the Bill of Rights will reflect its spirit and be a demonstration of civil rights in action.
> —Excerpt from Policy Statement, California State Board of Education

"Discussing the Bill of Rights with highly verbal students who enjoy a clash of beliefs is stimulating and challenging," she continued, "but the young people we must be concerned with are the vast majority of average or remedial students who leave high school—and they couldn't care less about interpretations of law by the courts. Hundreds of students are marching into society with little true understanding of the tolerance they must have if freedom of the individual is to prevail."

In order to meet these and related problems in classroom presentation, CRF is cooperating with educational agencies in sponsoring a variety of programs. In cooperation with the State Department of Education and a number of colleges and universities, CRF has sponsored, since 1964, a series of summer workshops for teachers interested in improving their teaching of the Bill of Rights. During the summer of 1966 workshops will be held at UCLA, Humboldt State College, San Diego State, San Fernando Valley State, and the California State Colleges at Hayward and Los Angeles.

As soon as adequate financing is secured, another effort to develop effective teaching materials and procedures, and to identify the best means for introducing them into all high schools in the state, will be launched. The new Bill of Rights Source Book will be thoroughly tested in two representative school districts during the next two years. In El Monte and in Riverside high schools all social studies teachers will participate in a pilot program supervised by CRF staff members and consultants. Not only will the guide itself be refined and improved, but new methods for training teachers and techniques for introducing the subject in the classroom will be developed.

To help provide better community understanding for teachers who raise controversial issues about individual rights in the classroom, the California Teachers Association and the State Board of Education are cooperating with CRF in sponsoring a series of conferences and institutes for teachers, administrators, and community leaders. The objective is greater public and professional awareness of the importance of such teaching, and increased understanding and support by the public generally.

Finally, to help make sure that more children in the state are exposed to teaching about the Bill of Rights and its meaning for contemporary life, CRF is joining with education agencies in sponsoring two programs. The first is a cooperative effort of the State Department of Education and the CRF staff and consultants to develop a Bill of Rights teaching program at the elementary school level. The State Department of Education has just received financing from the U.S. Office of Education for exploratory work on this project. The second project, in cooperation with the Los Angeles Public Schools and the National Urban League, provides weekend programs in a camp environment for students from six senior high schools in the curfew area of Los Angeles created during the "Watts riots" of last summer. These young people from one of the city's most depressed areas are introduced to the rights and the responsibilities that are theirs under the Bill of Rights. Both students and teachers, in a relaxed environment, have an opportunity to work out means of communication that will enhance effective presentations in the classroom. Financing for this project has been received from the Fund for the Advancement of Education.

California is not alone, of course, in recognizing the necessity for effective teaching about constitutional liberties. During the past year bar associations in New York, Wisconsin, and Illinois, as

WHAT ABOUT THE "SINFUL" STUDENT?

—M. D. Paterson.

"The student would rather consider that morality is a matter of personal choice not to be affected by inflexible authority."

—Hugh Rogers.

"Today's student has a deep interest in a meaning for life far more fundamental than the issues of sex, cheating, and excessive drinking."

—Hugh Rogers.

By EDWARD D. EDDY, President, Chatham College.

IF ONE were to take at face value the popular press these days, he might well explode hourly with derisive comment about college students. The magazines scream to us that youth has gone to hell in a sexual basket. The student has been subjected to continued "revelations" regarding his deterioration. Article after article explores the sex life of the student, his drunken orgies, his ability to cheat without being caught or without feeling even a twinge of remorse, and his craving for "the magic fix."

The exposé is so persistent that one begins to wonder whether it is youth that is deteriorating or whether we are being treated to a purging of the guilt-ridden adult conscience. Like most questions involving education, the answer is not a clear-cut affirmation either for or against. Indeed, there is by no means unanimous opinion over whether or not colleges and their faculties ought even to recognize the charges.

We have, on the one hand, the disinterested approach of the articulate and widely read Jacques Barzun. In a little booklet, The Tyranny of Idealism in Education, Barzun concludes: "Because the persons to be subjected to our schemes are young and weak and have no money and no vote, we think we can force them to embody every ideal imagining that occurs to us. The fact that no school has ever succeeded in imposing anything but superstitions and prejudices does not daunt the theorist." Barzun goes on to accuse those interested in stressing values of being guilty of panting "at the task of procreating an ideal type" of their own choosing. He terms this a remote kind of artificial insemination, which fails in its purpose at the same time that it "leads to the neglect of everything properly scholastic."

On the other hand, many educators join Albert Norris in concluding: "We do have an obligation to the student. . . . We need to help him look inside himself, to examine his own thoughts and feelings, to help him to confront and not to evade his own anxiety and loneliness, to treasure the idea, the hope that is his alone. The development—not just the care and feeding of the individual—this should be the ultimate goal of a university, of a society, of each one of us." And this development cannot take place, of course, without conscious emphasis on articulated values—against which the student may react.

Where does all this leave the "evil-ridden" college student? In the midst of such discussion, accusation, and national hand-wringing, the college student sits bemused and occasionally intrigued. "What's the matter, fellers?" he asks. "Can't you remember when you were young?"

In all fairness, we must admit that there are cogent reasons why the college student is accused of being a voraciously immoral tiger. More than at any other time in our history as a nation, we talk openly and almost continually about immorality. Curiously, we do not also talk as openly or continually about morality. In any case, the college student is far more outspoken and does not particularly shy away from talking about matters that previous generations preferred to conceal and snicker over. So, too, the colleges as a result are more aware of the problems of students. We are all being more honest in attempting better identification of what actually happens to a student as he passes through college.

In keeping with this trend, we are also providing better facilities for help. People have always had problems; college students, strange as it may seem, are people. But colleges have not always felt an obligation to help students help themselves to solve their own problems.

At the same time we cannot ignore the plain fact that there is in our society a noticeable decline in the influence of family and of church. In particular, the church has failed badly to answer the moral questions of youth. Many young ministers, priests, and rabbis, fresh from their training, are unprepared to answer with cogency the pleas of young people for honest, intelligent reasoning on these questions. And many of the older ministers, priests, and rabbis are content merely to attack students from the pulpit and disappear behind the chancel as soon as the service is over.

Those who used to put their faith in "the right community setting" are also at a loss. The mobility of modern youth is a fact of life. Even in some of the most rural areas of America, "the old home town" has ceased to be the confining, protecting atmosphere many of us knew in our childhood. "The old home town" is a place to get out of, particularly during the times when temptations toward excess are greatest.

FINALLY, youth today is far more clever than many of us wish to acknowledge—possibly because when we were their age, we had neither that degree of cleverness nor sophistication. Today's student plays a game with adult reactions—a truly fascinating game. He knows which button to push to elicit anger, shock, sympathy, or pity. When an eager-eyed reporter descends on a campus to pry open Pandora's box, he is met by veteran button-pushers. If the reporter is silly enough to believe all that a student tells him, the student is sure to tell him all—and quite a bit more.

Thus the books and articles flow forth with apparently ever increasing intensity. Dr. Max Lerner, who ought to know better, wrote the introduction to a volume entitled Sex and the College Girl. In it, he asserted authoritatively that the world of the college girl "is that of motels, parked cars, drive-in movies, fraternity houses, dormitory rooms during 'parietal' hours, apartments loaned for the weekend. . . . It is a world of buzzing booming internal confusion, of sex without bed, of bed without love, of hedonism without joy.

This may be true for a few unfortunate students—as it always has been—but somehow the good Professor Lerner has not peeked into college libraries recently. He has ignored the pressures on every college librarian to keep the reading rooms open almost twenty-four hours a day. He has ignored the statistics that indicate an enormous jump in book circulation in practically every college library. And he has ignored the far larger number of students who are plainly disgusted and dismayed by their contemporaries who do indeed seek bed without love, and hedonism without joy.

Last fall, as an example, the headlines were captured by "college student riots" at Hampton Beach in the East and several California beaches in the West. I cannot recall seeing a single item that noted that, at the same time several hundred American students were also on their way back from Operations Crossroads Africa after giving two and a half months of service to those less fortunate than themselves. I cannot recall a story or a picture about the thousands of college students who spent the summer working in settlement houses or psychiatric hospitals.

All of this does not deny, of course, the very real fact that moral questions do figure largely in the life and thinking of students. Errors in human judgment are bound to occur, and regrettably the nation is so intrigued with the student that it cannot seem to resist the temptation to overdramatize and sensationalize the occasional stubbing of the student toe.

Those of us who believe that the American college has a larger responsibility for the student must be realistic about the moral problem. When Paul Tillich visited Chatham College recently, he stated that "the moral life is not slavish conformity to an unrelenting code." And yet, this notion of a code and of slavish, unquestioning commitment to it prevails on the surface of our society.

The student would rather consider that morality is a matter of personal choice, not to be affected by inflexible authority. Many students are unable and unwilling to comprehend and to make significant in their lives what they term to be the "vestiges" of a God-centered system of self-discipline to which their grandparents had subscribed and their parents less so. They contend that this system of moral taboo has been diluted by generations of growing questioning. And it involves more compromise and hypocrisy than they wish to tolerate in themselves.

Thus the student finds it relatively easy to rationalize a double standard in many aspects of morality. On the campus, one may separate life here from living later on. There are those who think it's perfectly acceptable to cheat now on an examination—but it would be all wrong to give false information on an income tax return later on. There are those who profess the conviction that integrity must be a fundamental value for the human race—and then use another's identification card to buy beer or bourbon. Or who think it is within reason to have their kicks in the name of love while they are in college—but who would consider adultery later as a denial of the sacred institution of marriage.

It is this curious blend of plain old rationalization with a basic lack of trust in a "moral code" of any sort that leads the student to intellectualize morality. In turn, it is the intellectualizing rather than the ready acceptance that leads others in our society, perhaps especially the clergy, to conclude that immorality among college students is far more widespread than it actually is. The college student has every right to subject anything he wishes to questioning, provided only that the questioning is consistently intelligent. We must not misunderstand this questioning and interpret it to be doubting. Unfortunately, the closed mind does not always sense the difference.

Today's student has an especially deep interest in meaning—indeed, in a meaning for life which is far more fundamental than the issues of sex, cheating, and excessive drinking. In his volume, Human Nature and the Human Condition, Joseph Wood Krutch observes that we have become a nation of "generous materialists—in the very simple sense that we believe everything worth having can be had if we are willing to spend enough money to get it." Krutch goes on to identify the nature of our values and concludes, "What philosophers used to call 'the good life' is difficult to define and impossible to measure. In the United States today . . . we substitute for it 'the standard of living,' which is easy to measure if defined only in terms of wealth, health, comfort, and convenience."

MANY students today are engaged in an often desperate and usually naïve search for what philosophers used to call "the good life." How else does one explain the fact that the issue of civil rights has done more to arouse college students to fervent concern and action than any other single problem in the memory of most of us? Or that the Peace Corps has succeeded in convincing youth of the usefulness of youth?

Nevertheless, the situation thus far seems to offer little comfort to the fretful parent and restive alumnus. In response, I do not believe that any problem of immorality on a college campus is solved by public, presidential proclamations. Too many colleges lean on such professed standards in order to protect their own good name, without first placing emphasis on the individual human being. If institutions have any value to society, they will survive the occasional incidents of human weakness—but the individual so involved may not be as lucky. In other words, people are far more susceptible to damage than institutions—and the college's primary, overriding concern ought to be for people, not for its institutional image in the mirror or in the local mind.

Perhaps the student is best served by the opportunity and encouragement to take a hard look at societal assumptions. Colleges need to press home the truth that all choice is not necessarily the reflection of environment and that one need not capitulate to the contagion around him. Recognition of this truth is the first genuine step toward any return to personal responsibility among educated people. The ancient Greeks noted emphatically that the crucial test is the ability to make a critical response within one's self when alternatives are presented.

Again, Krutch has observed that "our seemingly great growth in social morality has oddly enough taken place in a world where private morality—a sense of the Shall Our Schools Teach about Venereal Disease?

By SIMON PODAIR, Chief, VD Education Unit, Department of Health, New York City.

FOR MANY YEARS the venereal diseases were among the leading unmentionables in our society: one did not speak about syphilis and gonorrhea in polite conversation. VD to most Americans was lewd and loathsome and talk about it was restricted to the street corner or the smoking car.

Then, in 1937, Surgeon General Thomas Parran made the first breakthrough in bringing the subject from its secret corner out into the open spaces of community discussion. His Shadow On The Land, sought to arm the American public with the basic information on VD and to delineate a practical program for its eventual control. Above all, Dr. Parran wanted to replace public apathy with public action.

Today, almost thirty years later and despite extensive progress in diagnosis and treatment, VD is still a threat to the nation's health. According to the United States Public Health Service, there has been a nationwide increase of more than 200 per cent in infectious syphilis among teen-agers since 1957. The American Medical Association recently termed venereal disease the nation's most critical communicable disease problem. Actually, there is now a VD epidemic throughout the country: over 22,000 cases of infectious syphilis and over 290,000 cases of gonorrhea reported annually. Syphilis, especially, can kill, cripple and blind, if untreated.

Many of our middle-class citizens see VD as a problem primarily of the poor. Yet—like crime and other antisocial manifestations—VD is increasing in the suburbs. The New York State Department of Health, for example, reports that infectious syphilis has increased tenfold over the past seven years in the leading suburbs of New York City. Syphilis and gonorrhea are found not only in the noisy, dirt-infested slum, but also in the quiet, tree-shaded suburb. The sons and daughters of the business and the professional man as well as working class youth need education on the subject.

A study conducted by the American Social Health Association revealed that —despite AMA support of VD control— approximately 90 per cent of infectious venereal disease treated by private physicians is not reported to state health departments. Including unreported cases, infectious venereal disease afflicts over 1,400,000 Americans annually—55 per cent of whom are under twenty-five. Similar statistics for polio, measles, or other communicable diseases would most likely have resulted in an outraged citizenry clamoring for immediate action.

After World War II, the discovery that penicillin cured the venereal diseases lulled public health agencies and the medical profession into a false sense of security. Governmental appropriations for VD education and control programs were drastically reduced. Penicillin was to lead us, once and for all, to victory over the spirochete and the gonococcus, the two organisms which cause syphilis and gonorrhea. But penicillin turned out to be only a skirmish in the battle: in the 1950s the number of cases began to increase. Weighted against the therapeutic powers of penicillin were the social forces unleashed in the post-World War II years: family disorganization, changes in sexual attitudes, increased mobility. VD as a medical problem was solved,

Psychiatry & Jobs

Should Employes Have to Submit Findings to Their Bosses?

By HERBERT G. LAWSON

PITTSBURGH — John Torrence, a state social worker, lost his job here last June because he refused to submit to a psychiatric examination. His legal battle to get back on the payroll ultimately could touch the lives of all employes.

The issue, as Mr. Torrence's counsel from the American Civil Liberties Union sees it, is how far a government agency legally can go in prying into the life of an employe in order to determine his fitness for his work.

The Torrence case may be settled by the Civil Service Commission on the relatively narrow ground of whether refusal to take a psychiatric exam is "just cause" for dismissal under state civil service rules. But if the dismissal is upheld, the ACLU is expected to appeal the case to the courts on the broader Constitutional question of invasion of privacy.

Whatever happens, it's clear that the case adds fuel to an increasingly fiery national controversy over the right to be left alone. Attorneys on both sides of the case here find no precise legal precedent to guide a decision. But Federal courts and labor arbitrators recently have blazed a new trail in defining the citizen's right to privacy.

The U.S. Supreme Court last year struck down Connecticut's anti-birth control law, asserting that it violated both the First and Fourth Amendment guarantees of privacy. The court said the state had no right to involve itself in such individual decisions of a husband and wife. Several relatively recent labor cases have upheld the right of an employe to refuse a polygraph, or "lie detector," test. In one, involving two discharged Illinois Bell Telephone Co. employes, the arbitrator said, "To punish for refusing to consent on the basis that this is a lack of cooperation appears to supply an overtone of being required to self-incriminate, a proposition repugnant to Anglo-Saxon legal codes."

"Eavesdrop at the Couch"

On the other hand, courts have upheld an employer's right to require a medical exam and certification by a doctor that an employe is able to work. The question is whether this right extends to requiring psychiatric tests and full disclosure to the employer. To the ACLU, the latter meant for Mr. Torrence that the welfare agency wanted to "intrude itself into the examination room and eavesdrop at the couch."

At the heart of the case—now pending before the Pennsylvania Civil Service Commission—is Mr. Torrence's contention that the Allegheny County Board of Assistance, a state agency, demanded that he authorize a psychiatrist to examine him and to discuss his findings with the agency. His attorneys contend this would destroy the cherished confidentiality of the doctor-patient relationship as well as violate Constitutional rights.

"If it is truly necessary to the functioning of good government that a welfare case worker must allow his employer to probe the innermost recesses of his mind, it is much later than we think," argued attorneys James Carter and A. E. Lawson in a brief before the commission. "If the perimeter of a man's skull cannot draw the boundary of governmental invasion of privacy, then the right is utterly lost."

The fears voiced by the civil liberties group here are similar to those that have found a wide national audience in two recent books, "The Naked Society" by Vance Packard and "The Brain Watchers" by Martin Gross. Mr. Gross attacked the widespread use by industrial personnel men of psychological tests that probe an employe's fears, tastes, sex habits and other personal factors. Mr. Packard described the "moral squalor" arising from employer use of lie detectors and other psychological spying techniques.

It's possible that the dangers have been exaggerated, of course, but a close look at the details of Mr. Torrence's experience does little to reassure one about the threat to the right to reasonable privacy.

Mr. Torrence, formerly a practicing attorney, joined the Allegheny County Board of Assistance as a case worker in November 1962. He won several promotions and his written performance ratings by his superiors were uniformly "good" or "excellent." No one told him before his suspension in June that various supervisors were questioning his mental stability.

On June 28, Mr. Torrence submitted a report to the board at its request from a medical doctor who stated Mr. Torrence was in good health. The doctor told a personnel official of the board that he couldn't make a psychiatric diagnosis. Mr. Torrence was asked to consult a psychiatrist and refused. On July 9 Frank Setcavage, executive director of the board, told Mr. Torrence in a letter that he would be removed from his job unless he saw a psychiatrist and authorized the psychiatrist "to discuss his statement and recommendation with the executive and personnel officers." Mr. Torrence again refused and lost his job.

At the civil service hearing recently testimony of the board's personnel supervisor, Evaline Chalfant, was revealing. She disclosed that the agency "has had a great many telephone conversations with psychiatrists who are treating staff members in order to determine whether or not it is wise, from the standpoint of both employe and department, for them to continue in their present assignment."

Miss Chalfant was asked whether the Torrence case differed from any of these previous instances. "No," she replied, "except with this one exception—that we had to let Mr. Torrence go because he refused to provide us with the information."

Miss Chalfant's statement buttressed the ACLU's contention that refusal to undergo the psychiatric exam was the sole reason for dismissal. The agency, however, sought to broaden the case by asserting the dismissal also stemmed from the fact that his superiors considered Mr. Torrence's behavior as a case worker unusual. One, for example, said she observed Mr. Torrence leafing through files in a "highly disturbed" manner and "slamming them down on the floor."

Psychiatry Used Elsewhere

The Pennsylvania agency is by no means unique in using psychiatry as a personnel tool. Raymond M. Hilliard, director of Cook County's big public aid department, which includes Chicago, says, "I think an agency has the right" to demand psychiatric examination and disclosure in order to "prevent turning a psychotic loose in this welfare area." Mr. Hilliard adds that he sees "absolutely nothing wrong" with polygraph tests for employes.

In the Los Angeles County Department of Charities, W. I. Witherill, chief deputy superintendent, notes that psychiatric exams can be required of civil servants there. Refusal "can result in disciplinary action but I'm not aware of any employe who has refused," he says. Upwards of 20 employes a month in Los Angeles County undergo psychiatric exams, but Mr. Witherill insists that the county never requires anything more than a certification from the doctor of an employe's fitness for work.

Strangely enough, at least one top Pennsylvania personnel official disagrees with the Allegheny Board of Assistance. Bernard Bertolino, who heads recruitment and employe services in the Department of Public Welfare, declares, I think we're obligated to respect" an employe's refusal to see a psychiatrist. "I don't think we can force someone to have an exam, but we can insist that an employe measure up to certain work standards." Local agencies of the department, he notes, have considerable autonomy in personal practices.

Whatever Mr. Torrence's fate in all this, there is at least the consolation that the right questions are being insistently asked—perhaps for the first time—about the proper role of psychiatry in personnel administration. The ACLU's challenge here may well speed the process whereby rules and legal precedents emerge to restrain society from invading the sanctum of the individual's mind.

The Obscenity Decision

Will Supreme Court Get Mired in a Flood of New Cases?

By LOUIS M. KOHLMEIER

WASHINGTON—The Supreme Court, having arrived at a plateau in its civil rights and reapportionment achievements, may be ready for a new great crusade: Protecting the nation's morals from corruption by the books and magazines and movies. Or, as Justice William Brennan put it, guarding the people against "exploitation by those who would make a business of pandering to the widespread weakness for titillation by pornography."

There were times in the past year or so when the Supreme Court seemed to be turning to a less activist role, less disposed than in the decade past to make history—or, as its critics like to say, "make law,"—by extending the law to reach novel ends.

Moreover, the court's liberal bent had led scholars to predict that, when it got around to deciding the three obscenity cases on its calendar, it would further weaken the power of Federal, state and local censors of obscene matter. Thus one authority predicted: "The suspense is not over whether the court will rule against censorship, but whether it may go so far as to make further prosecution impossible."

The Supreme Court last month not only ruled for censorship, but went so far as to make further prosecution inevitable—and further Supreme Court involvement a certainty. The court proved itself as activist as ever; Earl Warren at 75 appeared as much an activist as the younger Earl Warren who is credited with leading the court to its civil rights and voting law accomplishments. But there end the parallels. The court's stand on the obscenity issue necessarily curtails individual rights, arousing the wrath not of the conservatives who decried the school desegregation and school prayer decisions but of the liberals who applauded them.

The Court's Image

And the difference may involve the image of the court in another quite different way. However popular or unpopular the court's decisions on civil rights and the like, the nine black-robed justices were dealing there with matters of high purpose and fundamental import. Will that image remain intact as the justices are obliged to rule on an endless parade of dirty books and sexy movies that in themselves are inconsequential? Thus friends of the high court worry about its new concern with obscenity.

The First Amendment to the Constitution says there shall be no "abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press." But for many years there have been Federal laws censoring the publication and distribution of obscene material. The question always has been how to reconcile these restrictions with the Constitutional guarantees.

Those justices (notably Douglas and Black) who believe all sex censorship laws to be unconstitutional have long been in the minority, but even the majority — until last month—consistently voted to keep the censors tightly reined.

True, their reins were progressively loosened, but ever so slightly. In the 1940s the Supreme Court said the First Amendment doesn't protect utterances that present a "clear and present danger" to society. In the 1950s, trying for the first time to write a specific definition of obscenity, it said material dealing with sex does not enjoy First Amendment protection if it is "utterly without redeeming social importance," if it is so offensive on its face as to deviate from the contemporary standard of decency, and if its "dominant theme appeals to the prurient interest."

That attempt at clarification was less than successful. Indeed, the justices themselves in subsequent cases differed greatly on what was meant. Still, the majority consistently held the three "ifs" to be large indeed. The censors had won not a single Supreme Court case since the 1957 Roth decision.

Little wonder, then, that the Supreme Court astounded legal scholars last month by finding a hard-cover book, the slick magazine Eros, a newsletter and 50 paperback books obscene, and ordering to prison the two entrepreneurs who published the assortment.

The two rulings made history with a novel extension of obscenity law, saying "the publications themselves might not be obscene" but if the purveyor advertised, packaged and distributed them "solely as a claimed instrument of sexual stimulation . . . that fact may be decisive in the determination of obscenity." In all the anticensor rulings since 1957, the decisions were based on content alone, not on motive for distribution. Even in last month's third obscenity decision, a finding that the 1749 novel "Fanny Hill" was not obscene, the court remarked that only the book was on trial, not its publisher or distributor; "evidence that the book was commercially exploited for the sake of prurient appeal . . . might justify" a finding of obscenity, Justice Brennan declared.

All three cases presented the Supreme Court as much a moral as a legal decision. Five of the justices quite apparently had decided in their own minds that the court's zealous protection of freedom of expression was to blame for a flood of girlie magazines, sexy paperback books and worse that threatened to subvert the public morals. Justice Brennan, a Catholic, did most of the talking for the majority. But the personality and the convictions of Earl Warren seemed to some Washington court-watchers to be the force that moved the majority to crack down on "those who would make a business of pandering to the widespread titillation by pornography."

"The Chief Justice has his puritanical strain," said one such court scholar. "Maybe he saw the junk that's for sale right here on Ninth Street. But he and the four others were disturbed by the amount of questionable material that's for sale. They felt there was a problem and they were going to be blamed for it." Not very surprisingly, Tom Clark, a sort of homespun Texan, and Byron White, who tends to conservative views, went along with the Chief Justice and Mr. Brennan. It was surprising that Abe Fortas, President Johnson's sole appointee to the court, who looked like a real liberal, also went along.

A Flood of Prosecutions?

Without question, Justice Department officials predict, Federal, state and local prosecutors throughout the land will run with their new power. And the possibilities look large indeed. The Government told the Supreme Court that as much as 90% of the material Federal prosecutors have challenged is worse than Eros magazine. Moreover, books the courts in other years have held not obscene—not only "Fanny Hill," but "Tropic of Cancer," "Ulysses" and "Lady Chatterley's Lover"—might be banned now if they are purveyed in ways that judges or juries find objectionable.

And, beyond that, where might the prosecutors run? Will art theaters be closed for "pandering"? a Justice Department lawyer wonders. And what of advertising? "The advertisements of our best magazines," Justice William Douglas remarked in dissenting from last month's decisions, "are chock-full of thighs, ankles, calves, bosoms, eyes and hair."

Justice Hugo Black in his dissent predicted the prosecutors will run wild, trampling on the First Amendment with a ferocity the majority never imagined. "It is obvious," said the 80-year-old justice, "that the effect of the court's decisions is to make it exceedingly dangerous for people to discuss either orally or in writing anything about sex."

Justice Black probably went too far. But it is certain that now the Supreme Court will have to rule on many, many more obscenity prosecutions, and in the process will have to define the outer limits of the crackdown. Those scholars who have expressed concern lest the court become a "high court of obscenity" will have a great deal more to worry about.

LEGAL ASSISTANCE:

How Is It Being Supplied To Those Who Can't Afford It? With What Results?

The decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Gideon versus Wainright has started a revolution in the traditional ways of doing things with reference to legal procedure and law enforcement. The Court's judgment in this case, identified officially in the records as 372 U.S. 335 (1963), held that state and local governments must provide indigent criminal defendants accused of a felony (i.e., crimes subject to a year or more imprisonment) with free legal assistance. It has started innovations and reformations the ultimate consequences of which may stretch far into the future.

If the practical results of Gideon were merely the assignment of a lawyer at time of trial to some defendants, then we could hardly call the change revolutionary. After all, even before Gideon, many states already were providing public defenders for those who could not afford legal counsel. The Supreme Court's opinion, however, had wider implications which flow from its major premise that "in our adversary system . . . any person haled into court, who is too poor to hire a lawyer, cannot be assured a fair trial unless counsel is provided for him."

Let's follow a few of the developments that occurred in one American city, New Haven, Connecticut, since the Supreme Court's action.

SOME DEVELOPMENTS

In early 1963, a few concerned New Haven lawyers were advocating a modest increase in the budget of the city's Legal Aid program to raise it to $25,000. In 1966, those same persons had succeeded in establishing a pair of so-called neighborhood law offices (with four more contemplated) working on a budget of $358,000. Each neighborhood law office was located in one of the city's impoverished areas. Staffing each office were two lawyers, with full-time secretarial help, investigators, and access to specialists in fields ranging from psychiatry to chemical analysis. The free services of these offices were available to "indigent" persons (i.e., single persons whose weekly income was less than $35, married persons whose weekly income was under $50). The idea of several "neighborhood law offices," as distinguished from a single legal assistance center, was that the relationship of one lawyer to a small, neighborhood population would result more quickly in cultivating the necessary trust between the attorney and his impoverished clientele. By taking advantage of shorter patterns of communication within the neighborhood, his reputation for usefulness would spread more rapidly and attract needy persons sooner.

Whether all the poor in New Haven who need legal services are now being served by these neighborhood law offices is doubtful. Ignorance of and reluctance to use the neighborhood lawyer are still widespread. But what is undoubted is the considerable increase of services to some of New Haven's poor. To understand the consequences of this increase, let's look at an incident occurring in early 1966. Fictitious names are substituted in this and the other example given, to protect the actual participants, and the descriptions somewhat altered for the same reason, though the circumstances remain the same.

One day in January the New Haven police arrested a young man named Jones for burglary. The police, concerned about the spread of narcotics, chose to make a deal with Jones. In return for not prosecuting on the burglary charge, they asked Jones to inform on the narcotics traffic in his neighborhood.

Jones agreed, and when a young female addict asked him if he would drive her and three friends to Bridgeport to pick up some "stuff," Jones informed the police. The police urged him to undertake the drive in order to locate the Bridgeport source. Furthermore, the police planned a pick-up of the passengers after the narcotics were in their possession. Jones was to drive the four to Bridgeport, make the purchase, drive to a friend's home, phone the police to tell them he was en route, then stop at a certain gas station in New Haven, where police would surround the car and arrest the occupants. It was a well-planned and perfectly executed maneuver. Jones' car did pull into the gas station; two police cars did box the car in; and three policemen on foot did succeed in apprehending the occupants.

The only trouble was the split second between the time when the occupants of the car saw the police and when the police could reach them. In that time the suspects swallowed the drugs, glassine bags and all, with the exception of one defendant who threw his under the front seat. The police arrested the four suspects, searched the car, and retrieved the drugs under the seat. Later, one of the suspects, suffering withdrawal symptoms from lack of narcotics, made a confession as to his part in the purchase, and implicated his cohorts.

Now, once upon a time, that would have ended it. On the evidence of the narcotics found in the car, on the admission by one of the suspects, by the evidence of narcotics that could have been "pumped" from their stomachs, on the basis of statements elicited by grilling the suspects, the suspects would have volunteered a plea of guilty or been convicted forthwith; sentence would have been passed; and they would have been sent to prison for the term given to a second narcotics offender — not less than ten nor more than fifteen years. The police could be satisfied that they had rid the neighborhood of the potential (and highly likely) menace of a peddler of dope and committer of petty crimes. Each of the suspects had a criminal record as long as his arm, mostly consisting of the burglaries, forged checks, and petty thefts necessary to finance the heavy expense of his addiction.

But such was not the ending of this story in the era of the "neighborhood lawyer." One of the defendants, named Winfield, "hired" his neighborhood lawyer, i.e., simply called him up and asked for help. The prosecutor's office in New Haven, like all such offices, is overburdened with cases. A prosecutor depends on pleas of guilty in well over 80% of the cases. Were every defendant to insist his case be tried, the whole present process would break down. There would be too few judges and courtrooms and juries. Every defense lawyer knows that the prosecution, except in the rarest instance, cannot afford to go to trial, and he bargains with the prosecutor to reduce or drop the charge altogether by threatening to have a trial. An unrepresented defendant does not know this fact of life, and he will frequently "cop out" for no or substantially no reduction of charge.

The neighborhood lawyer, when he got Winfield's case, did what he should do. He defended Winfield with all the resources available to him, just as if he were representing a client wealthy enough to hire a lawyer. He objected to every constitutionally suspect action of the police: the use of an informant to inform, the use of the informant's car to enable the defendants to perpetrate the crime, the elicitation of the admission, the apprehension of the suspects before a formal arrest was made, and the search of the car and the arrest without warrants. In addition, the defense filed and argued motions for pre-trial discovery of out-of-court statements made by prospective government witnesses. It asked for a sample of the narcotics seized by the police so that it could make its own independent analysis. It employed psychiatrists to examine the defendants themselves, providing a basis for a plea of legal insanity (the compulsive need for narcotics). It argued the unconstitutionality of the Narcotics Drug Act that permits a person "in possession" of drugs for his own self-administration to be imprisoned in the face of a Supreme Court case holding that punishment of addiction by imprisonment is an unconstitutional, cruel, and unusual punishment.

The result was that one suspect was never prosecuted at all; the other three were sent to a state hospital for "treatment," and after a few weeks were released back to the street. Unfortunately, in the absence of sufficient counselors to advise them, and lacking jobs and good habits, they soon were back on narcotics, soon were committing an array of petty offenses, and soon were ready for arrest again. But the lawyer had done his job. He had given his poor defendant the same kind of legal defense a rich defendant could have purchased for $2500 to $5000. The injunction of the Constitution that the protection of the laws be "equal" had been satisfied.

But one must look at the real disequilibria established by the neighborhood lawyer. A perfectly planned arrest of persons violating the law, in which the police used no coercion (except to take advantage of a suspect's self-induced discomfort to get a confession), was rendered a nullity. Offenders were back on the streets, swiping from liquor stores, thieving from used car lots, smashing car doors to steal valuables inside, forging stolen checks, making sales of narcotics, breaking and entering homes. Those were all petty crimes, never resulting in theft or profit of more than $30 to $100 at any one time, and all committed in order to finance each individual's drug habit. But though of a penny-ante nature, they were nevertheless crimes, and served to spawn new victims.

The above story is pertinent to the statement that the Gideon decision is of revolutionary proportions. It is becoming evident that the defense of poor defendants by these neighborhood lawyers is beginning to induce changes in the law which all the reformers of the past could not bring about. These changes are and will be in the substantive law governing narcotics addiction and use. The present pattern of federal and state laws dates back to 1914, when the federal government prohibited the unauthorized use of narcotics. These laws have never substantially been changed, largely because no feasibly economic alternative has been developed to cope with the problem. Well-intended plans to treat addicts as sick rather than bad persons have foundered on the fact that society believes that other social problems are prior and more urgent in demanding funds. After all, a hospital bed given over to the care of an addict is one not given over to an elderly person or a polio-stricken child. Thus, despite serious concern about addicts, no political effort has been mounted to alter the care of addicts. Yet the frustration of police efforts to enforce the law, as a result of the efforts of the neighborhood lawyer (and his increasing number of counterparts throughout the United States) is and will continue to be the stimulus to innovation and improvement that has long been lacking. When the neighborhood lawyer enters the enforcement picture, present law forbidding use of narcotics becomes almost impractical to enforce, and the difficulties of successful prosecution are demoralizing for police forces. The activity of the neighborhood lawyer has required a rethinking of the narcotics problem by the police chief and the prosecutor and by those others who would not otherwise have had time to bother about it.

What is true of narcotics law in particular is to a lesser extent true for the criminal law in general. The big problem of what to do with the so-called criminal is questioned more searchingly, for the plight of the poor is represented in criminal courts more and more touchingly, and the underlying causes of criminal behavior gain more frequent exposure. Reasserted day in and day out by the neighborhood lawyer, the vicious story of poverty gains drama and eloquence.

THE EVEN WIDER IMPLICATIONS

Gideon, as we have intimated, had an even wider meaning than merely application to the criminal law. If the poor were not fairly served as criminal defendants (where the customary safeguards are very great), they were not being represented at all in their day-to-day skirtings with the law: with the bill collector, the installment seller who seizes the television or automobile for delinquency in payments, with the landlord who fails to comply with building standards, and with the social worker who dispenses or withholds welfare checks.

It was this civil aspect of legal representation with which the "neighborhood lawyer" hoped to cope. And it is a case like Vincent Rossi's that illustrates what the neighborhood lawyer can do. Rossi had a small shoe repair shop in the "Hell" district of New Haven (one of the lower middle class areas served by a neighborhood law office), a hard-working wife, a son of whom he was immensely proud, and a lot of friends. He was urged to leave the "Hell" district and set up a new and larger repair shop in a new shopping center in New Haven. He drew a deep breath and took the risk. For six months business increased. To cope with his increased business he bought new machinery, and undertook a lot of debt which, based on his earnings, was not unreasonable. Then he was evicted; he had no written lease with the shopping center, and when the center became more profitable and rental space more valuable, Rossi was asked to leave. He went to a lawyer, whom he then paid $1000 to contest the eviction to no avail. Desperate, he moved his equipment to the most available space he could find. It was an unwise move: the rent was excessive; he was far from his old friends in the "Hell" district; and he no longer had adjacent shops that attracted customers. Within three months, he accumulated debts of $8000. His son, in the Navy, came down with an acute illness which the Navy refused to attend to, asserting it was a pre-service illness. What was more, Rossi's wife was hurt in an accident when her car was struck by a negligent motorist who carried no insurance.

Now Rossi was a man of industry and vitality, whose business judgment had led him to take a risk. The risk turned out far greater than expected. He was trying to make a living, and the world had sideswiped him.

He came to the neighborhood lawyer in his old district. The lawyer welcomed him. Rossi's plight was an opportunity for the neighborhood lawyer to show his usefulness in non-criminal matters. First things first: the neighborhood lawyer called up the Navy Hospital, and with threats of court action cajoled the Navy Hospital to provide the operation and hospitalization which Rossi's son needed. Then he turned to Rossi's business. Rossi was quick to be persuaded that his commercial future lay in getting back to the old district. The lawyer obtained store space at low rent. He called the creditors, and by persuading, threatening, and pleading, arranged for the $8000 of debts to be paid off after a period of years and not on the original rigid time schedule. He sold some of the now unnecessary equipment. Lastly, he turned to the wife's problem, saw how the Workmen's Compensation Law could be construed so as to cover her injury, and referred her to a private lawyer for representation (the neighborhood lawyer does not take plaintiffs' injury cases).

The major work on the Rossi case took a full week of that lawyer's time. The problems involved, in the legal marketplace, would have cost the shoemaker more than $1000 in legal fees. Such a bill would not have been unreasonable by any stretch of the imagination; a private lawyer's time is his only resource.

Vincent Rossi was a comparatively easy case. He had sound economic habits. He had a pretty good education. He knew how to raise a family and to make good economic decisions. He had skills and knowledge to start with. But the next family to enter the neighborhood law office might not be so well-off. Suppose the family had never ever budgeted. Suppose there were a multitude of children. Suppose there were children involved but no fathers. Suppose the debts were more out of proportion to potential earning power than they were in the Rossi case. Suppose there were a racial dimension to this problem, causing housing shortages and high prices and commercial discrimination. One can imagine that a neighborhood lawyer, once started on straightening out a family's affairs, could have a month's or even a year's work ahead of him.

SOME QUESTIONS

The Rossi case highlights some of the questions raised by the neighborhood law program. Who should benefit? The market system is a device for rationing out time efficiently. The private lawyer with a limited amount of time has to allocate his time productively. Simplifying this tough task of rationing time is the price he charges for his services. Since every client wants to hire the best lawyers, the best lawyers charge a premium for their time, thereby discouraging persons with less complex problems from seeking their time. The good lawyer whose time is in far more demand than he can satisfy protects himself by putting a high price on his services. In this way only important problems come to him, important as indicated by the client's willingness to pay extra.

Now when one introduces poverty into this mechanism, one has a problem. Suppose the neighborhood lawyer is talented and intelligent, and his time is demanded. How is he, without making a charge, to allocate his time? Should it be to the Rossis, or to persons who are less productive than they are, or to the two-time losers like Winfield? If he devotes time to the Winfields, then he cannot help the Rossis, and vice versa.

If he helps the Rossis, is he really helping the poor, the really poor? After all, Rossi was a thriving little businessman who just hit bad luck. By chance, his plight so reduced his income that he fell within the indigency standards of the neighborhood law program. Should the neighborhood lawyer be set up to deal with hard-luck entrepreneurs? Good citizens, and well worth helping, but could not the Rossis' problem be dealt with in the marketplace rather than by charitable institutions? Yet anyone who knew the Rossis and knew what that week of help meant to this excellent family could not but feel that the neighborhood law program was functioning properly.

Not only does the mix of private legal representation and legal charity cause some tough problems. So does the question of paying for the legal charity. Should the State provide funds for it? Right now, the neighborhood law program in New Haven is paid for with federal funds and private grants. And is the provision of legal services in New Haven worth the cost of $358,000 per year, or would those funds be better spent on cheaper medical care, better schools, water pollution, or prison reform, or more extensive social services for narcotics addicts?

Obviously, there is no pat answer to this economic question. Yet it is important to point out the benefits of the neighborhood lawyer program. In addition to those already mentioned, perhaps the most dramatic benefit will be the unearthing of information about poverty in our society. This information will not come in synoptic, comprehensive research reports. It will come through articulation of the plight of the individual poor by lawyers in courts, before legislatures, and in judicial opinions. If the poor's lawyers are subsidized, they will refuse to shut up, and as a result the problem of poverty will be brought home again and again to a wealthy society. With neighborhood lawyers the plights of the Rossis and the Winfields can never be forgotten, and as long as their problems cannot be forgotten, they can be addressed and dealt with: piecemeal, yes, but nonetheless dealt with. Now it will be impossible to forget legal reform of the narcotics laws, for the prosecutor is being driven frantic with work and the police are being demoralized. And it will be equally impossible to forget the problems of medical care, housing, prejudice, ignorance, family instability and psychological disorder. Like a good protagonist, the neighborhood lawyer raises far more problems than he will ever solve. But his very contentiousness may help keep American society from becoming smug and static.

THE KEPT WITNESSES

RICHARD H. ROVERE

At least eighty-three people have been set up by the government in the trade of "professional witnesses." One calls it "a racket" . . . three are confessed liars . . . and all of them are exempt from security clearance.

ON FEBRUARY 3, 1955, a press conference was called at the Hotel Biltmore in New York City for the purpose of providing a young man named Harvey Matusow with an opportunity to make a public confession of fraud and perjury. Along with the confession—and necessary as a foundation for it—went some items of biography.

In 1947, Matusow, who was then twenty, joined the Communist party. He claims to have taken this step as a dedicated revolutionist. Within a year or two, he said, he became disillusioned and penitent. The way of transgressors is hard. Matusow did not leave the party he no longer believed in. Instead, he stayed on as a voluntary agent of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. In 1951, he abandoned this masquerade and in 1952 appeared as a witness for the prosecution in the trial, in Federal Court, of thirteen leaders of the Communist party charged with conspiracy under the Smith Act.

Matusow's performance under oath—some 700 pages in the trial record—pleased the government attorneys, who won their case, and gained him an honored position as a kept, or professional, witness. That is to say, he made his living—and a very good one, he now maintains, for a man of his age and station—by being sworn and saying what those who paid him wished to have him say. Between 1951 and 1954, his services were sought, and easily obtained, by the United States Department of Justice; the Subversive Activities Control Board; the Permanent Investigations Subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Government Operations; the Internal Security Subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee; the House Committee on Un-American Activities; the Ohio Committee on Un-American Activities; and the New York City Board of Education. He claims to have testified in twenty-five trials, deportation proceedings, and the like, and to have made 180 identifications of Communists, or of persons he chose to call Communists, for the various agencies that employed him. He found a good deal of additional employment. He hired out as a speaker in Congressional campaigns, in which, for a fee, he would damage this candidate or that one with intimations of subversion. He composed memoirs and revelations for the Hearst newspapers, lectured on the American Legion circuit, and now and then exploited himself and his past as a night-club entertainer and radio disc-jockey.

In his New York press conference and in subsequent testimony before a Federal Grand Jury and two committees of Congress, Matusow repudiated his career as a professional witness. He

Civil Liberties and the Court

Not long ago, Professor Samuel A. Stouffer announced the results of a poll showing that some 60 percent of the people questioned opposed permitting an individual to speak against religion in their communities.

An even higher percentage replied negatively to the question: "Suppose an admitted Communist wanted to make a speech in your town, should he be allowed, or not?"

Two similar polls, taken by professors at the University of Wisconsin and at Northwestern, produced the same results. Less than two percent of those interviewed agreed with all of the provisions of the Bill of Rights.

The reactions of those polled indicate that while the Bill of Rights may be accepted from a theoretical standpoint, applied at the practical level, the civil liberties it seeks to insure are often condemned and criticized.

This was certainly true when a copy of the first ten Constitutional amendments was removed from a state house bulletin board because an official thought it "too controversial" for the state's employees. Although the amendments had been posted only as a reminder of Bill of Rights Day, they were not returned to the bulletin board until approved by the governor.

The trouble with civil liberties and civil rights is that they are too often abstractions. Cold war tensions abroad and desegregation decisions at home all too often overshadow philosophical beliefs and principles. Even when traditional liberties and rights are not forgotten altogether, they can be subordinated in the interest of seemingly more pressing problems.

Today, the question of relative importance as between individual liberties and internal security is being debated with only slightly less fervor than during the heyday of McCarthyism. What was once an attack on the legislative and executive branches of our federal government has now been transferred to the judicial arm.

Those who criticize the Supreme Court claim that since 1956, it has been "too soft on communism." They are joined by others whose distaste for the Court stems from its 1954 school integration decision. The attackers include extremists as well as responsible and honestly concerned men. Many are convinced that the Court has gone too far in protecting the individual at the potential expense of society. While the cries of the extremists are to be expected, the reasoning of prominent lawyers and legislators must be answered.

Early in February, the American Bar Association's House of Delegates adopted a series of resolutions calling on Congress to write new anti-subversive laws as the answer to recent Court decisions.

Long considered a bastion of conservatism, the ABA's action was unexpected only in that its resolutions were sharply critical of the Court's actions. In effect, the resolutions told the Court it was wrong in its judgment and urged Congress to amend internal security legislation to plug the loopholes used by the Court.

Harsh as the resolutions were, they proved to be weaker than a report supporting the resolutions that was presented to the ABA by a special Committee on Communist Tactics, Strategy, and Objectives.

The report—which was never actually endorsed by the delegates—contained little detailed criticism of individual cases and less in the way of specific suggestions on how the cases should have been decided. Instead, it contented itself with a general charge that the Court was too lax on subversion.

It asserted that "many cases have been decided in such a manner as to encourage an increase in communist activity. . . . The paralysis of our internal security grows largely from construction and interpretation centering around technicalities emanating from our judicial process which the Communists seek to destroy, yet use as a refuge to masquerade their diabolical objectives."

While the resolutions adopted by the House of Delegates sustained the criticism found in the report of the committee, they tried to make sure that this criticism would not become ready ammunition for those who would place restrictive limits on judicial review.

ABA Action

A preamble to the resolutions stated that the ABA disapproved "proposals to limit any jurisdiction vested in the U. S. Supreme Court by the Constitution." As if to show that the House of Delegates was not a reactionary body, before adjourning it elected as its new president, Whitney North Seymour, a lawyer who once successfully defended a Negro Communist before the nation's highest tribunal.

Despite the ABA's separation of the committee report from the resolutions it adopted, the interested public—based on press reports—failed to see any real difference. In Congress, the association's action was hailed as a "scathing criticism" of the Court and the committee report was twice reprinted in the Congressional Record.

Local Groups

To combat this impression, a number of local and state bar groups have since publicly declared that they oppose curtailing Court jurisdiction.

Typical of such action was a statement made by the New York County Lawyers' Association that "if anybody construes the [ABA] resolution as an effort to curtail the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, we don't agree with the resolution.

A similar stand has been taken by Attorney General William P. Rogers, who defended the ABA's attitude toward the Court, claiming that "there is a lot of misunderstanding on this." Rogers told reporters that the ABA's president had assured him that the organization's call for new anti-subversive legislation did not attack the Court.

Rogers' view was apparently not shared by either Chief Justice Earl Warren or Warren Olney III, director of the administrative office of the U. S. Courts and former chief of the criminal division of the Justice Department. Chief Justice Warren resigned from the ABA late in 1957, presumably over the group's criticism of the Court, while Olney resigned this March after terming the ABA's Court resolutions "discreditable."

Six Decisions Opposed

The attack on the Court stems from six specific decisions. These are the opinions criticized by the ABA and by a number of Congressmen and Senators who have introduced legislation to correct the Court's actions and limit its jurisdiction. The decisions include:

- A ruling that only the federal government—not the states—may act against Communist subversion;
- A ruling that mere advocacy of violent overthrow of the government—as an abstract idea —is not sufficient ground for conviction of a violation of the Smith Act;

• A ruling that confessions of a defendant cannot be admitted as trial evidence if the confession was made during a period of "unnecessary delay" between the arrest and arraignment of the defendant;

• A ruling that witnesses before Congressional committees cannot be convicted of contempt for refusing to answer questions if the committee has not spelled out its authority and its mandate from Congress;

• A ruling that government employees in non-sensitive jobs need not answer all loyalty questions asked by Congressional committees or by authorized officers of the executive or judicial branches of government;

• A ruling that an alien cannot be deported for Communist membership if he was not a member of the party after his last entry into the country.

In criticizing each of these decisions, the ABA—speaking for those who urge more effective control over communism — has urged remedial legislation.

Without questioning the integrity of the association's committee, it is interesting to note that a number of the committee's members were far from being disinterested spectators in these decisions. The chairman is a former member of the Subversive Activities Control Board and was also a counsel of record in one of the cases cited.

Another committee member was a counsel of record in two of the cases criticized and argued as an amicus curiae (friend of the court) in a third case. Given these circumstances, it is hard to be objective.

The decision that aroused the greatest opposition involved the Court's ruling that only the federal government can act against subversion. Steve Nelson, a Pennsylvania Communist leader, was convicted of violating the state's sedition act. Under the language of the state law, he was charged with "bringing the government of this state or the United States into hatred or contempt" and sentenced to 20 years in prison and $23,000 in fines.

Although the state sedition act was so restrictive of free speech that its constitutionality was doubtful, the Pennsylvania Supreme Court did not consider the constitutional question. Instead, it reversed the conviction on the ground that the Smith Act had pre-empted the field of subversion for the federal government and made similar state statutes unenforceable. The U. S. Supreme Court upheld the state court's opinion.

Opponents of the Nelson decision have proposed two specific pieces of legislation. One bill—introduced by Senator Styles Bridges (R., N. H.)—would permit the states to enforce their own laws against advocacy of the federal government's overthrow. The other bill—introduced by Representative Howard Smith (D., Va.)—would use the Nelson ruling as an excuse to prevent the Supreme Court from holding that Congress has pre-empted any field of legislation.

Smith's bill, H. R. 3, would not only narrow the jurisdiction of future courts, but it is written to be retroactive. Because of its natural appeal to the advocates of states' rights as well as the probability that it would drastically affect labor and welfare legislation, H. R. 3 passed the House last year by a 241 to 155 vote. It was defeated by only one vote, 41 to 40, in the Senate.

This year, H. R. 3 has again been introduced and has already been approved by the House Judiciary Committee. Despite Administration disapproval, 11 Republicans joined with eight Southern and border state Democrats in sending the measure to the Rules Committee.

Since the bill's chief sponsor is chairman of this committee, the measure is expected to receive prompt attention and provide the House with its first major test on anti-Supreme Court sentiment.

The Bridges proposal, with its less sweeping features, is considerably less controversial, but still raises important questions. Deputy Attorney General Lawrence E. Walsh—who opposes H. R. 3—has testified that he favors the Bridges bill because it permits more people to enter the anti-sedition fight. He admitted, however, that he does not know of any gap opened in our national security by the Nelson case and that he could think of no one deserving prosecution who had escaped as a result of the decision.

Constitutional Problems

Although Walsh could see no philosophical objection to the Bridges bill, civil liberties groups were quick to point out constitutional problems. These organizations charge that state prosecution brings with it an interference with an essentially federal responsibility and a real danger of the persecution of those who hold unpopular but harmless views.

The American Civil Liberties Union has asserted that "there has been no illuminating evidence that sedition can ever be a purely local concern which does not affect the nation as a whole and does not require united federal protective action.

Pointing to the past as well as the present, the ACLU has warned that the wave of post-World War I persecutions of unpopular opinions as well as the present Southern state statutes aimed at preventing desegregation are indications of what can and will happen when state sedition laws are given free rein.

As an example, the ACLU asserted that in the Carl Braden case, a Kentucky citizen was prosecuted for sedition under state law after he sold a house in a "white area" to a Negro and defended the Negro's right to occupy the dwelling. "In view of the record of Southern legislatures in the last four years," the ACLU has said, "such laws . . . will be used as a serious deterrent to the implementation of the Fourteenth Amendment insofar as it applies to desegregation in the public schools and other facilities."

Even more dangerous in the ACLU's eyes is the proposal of the bar association to make illegal the "theoretical advocacy of government overthrow as well as the present prohibition against incitement to action."

Legislative measures to end the distinction between an expression of free speech and actual incitement spring from the Court's 1957 Yates decision. In this case, the Court held that the Smith Act could not be interpreted to ban theoretical opinion.

The ACLU has charged that the passage of any law crossing over the "danger zone into unconstitutionality" would seriously hamper free speech and association and would be "unwise" and "ineffective."

Other groups have taken a similar position in regard to the so-called "Mallory bill"—a measure designed to overcome the Court's objection to confessions obtained after "unnecessary delay." Such a bill, they declare, might make it easier for law enforcement agencies to apprehend criminals, but this help for the prosecution must be balanced against the denial of civil liberties to the accused.

Best Protection

The ACLU has asserted that its major objections to the suggested laws center on the deprivation of individual rights in the name of national security. Attacking the bar association's resolutions, the ACLU declared that "our real security might be weakened by being unnecessarily restrictive of our civil liberties. The best positive protection for our security is scrupulous observance of our Constitutional guarantees. . . ."

If this argument is to be denied, those who seek strong legislation at the expense of civil liberties must be able to show that the security of the nation demands such sacrifices.

The record proves, however, that such a position will not stand up. Early this year, Representative James Roosevelt (D., Calif.) analyzed the House Un-American Activities Committee's own report of achievements from 1941 through 1958.

Representative Roosevelt pointed out that of the 79 recommendations made by the committee, 34 were duplications of proposals made in various sessions of Congress. He said that of this net of 45 proposals, relevant legislation was adopted in 35 instances.

After checking these 35 pieces of legislation, the California legislator concluded that "the only legislation . . . which it can be said that the House Un-American Activities Committee was directly responsible for, is the Internal Security Act of 1950 and 1954 amendments thereto."

While it is true that Representative Roosevelt's measuring rod is not the sole test of a committee's values, the passage of only one major bill during a 20-year period does indicate an extremely ineffective operation.

Balanced against this one bill is the hardly debatable fact that the committee's activities have seriously invaded the area of civil liberties and impaired the nation's prestige among the people of the free world.

The numerous witch-hunting expeditions of the House Committee, the sponsorship by its chairman—Representative Francis Walter (D., Pa.)—of an immigration law with racial preferences, and the similar tactics of the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee, have done little to convince the world that the United States is proud of its tradition of individual rights and liberties.

Proposals to limit free speech in a nation that points with pride to its Bill of Rights appear paradoxical in the uncommitted countries that judge democracy and communism by what they see and read.

To these countries, a legislative move to permit the government to deport an individual who at one time, perhaps many years ago, entered the United States as a Communist, but who later returned to this nation as an anti-Communist, seems to defy logic. Such a bill, aimed at overcoming the Court's Bonetti decision, appears to discourage Communist defectors, not help them.

To the people of the free world, restrictions on civil liberties in a time of national emergency is nothing new. But while these people may be convinced democrats in the cold war, they understandably see few examples of the United States being threatened internally.

To date, Congress has refused to support the Supreme Court's school desegregation decision—a decision made five years ago. Not only has it rejected all efforts to enact necessary civil rights legislation, it has harassed the Court with legislative proposals aimed at overcoming civil liberties as well as civil rights rulings. Such harassment has been termed both "scandalous" and "appalling" by lawyers who have argued civil liberties cases before the Supreme Court.

Joseph L. Rauh, Jr., one such attorney, has declared that the assault on the Court is a "know-nothing attack" and that neither the desegregation decision nor the subversive decisions could "reasonably have been decided any other way."

Justice William O. Douglas has also voiced concern with the criticism of the Court. Speaking at the Columbia Law School, he warned that "despots dislike an independent judiciary." The Associate Justice stressed the importance of an independent judiciary holding the confidence of the people as essential to the continued success of American democracy.

No Back Seat

Douglas asserted that the Court "could not take a back seat" without disrupting the judicial check on executive and legislative action. He added that the American system has stability because the judiciary is viewed as a "great rock" unmoved by storms breaking over it, even when they lead to attempts at nullification."

Unfortunately, the logic of Justice Douglas is often swept aside by some who honestly believe their way of life is threatened. To these people, fear—based either on prejudice or a feeling of insecurity—overcomes the supposedly fundamental principles of civil liberties and rights.

Since the ABA's criticism and the reintroduction of H.R. 3, the Court has taken what the Washington Evening Star termed "a small turn to the right." Early in June, in two 5-4 decisions, the Court restricted the interpretation of two of its most controversial civil liberties rulings. Both of the new rulings amended decisions that had been under bitter attack.

In a case involving a state's right to enact laws prescribing state sedition, the Court upheld New Hampshire's right to convict Willard Uphaus of contempt for refusing to give its attorney general the guest list at a summer camp meeting of pacifists. The Court majority declared, in effect, that each state has an obligation to defend itself against subversion when such subversive activities are applied against the state rather than the federal government.

The second case involved the question of whether an individual could claim the first amendment as a constitutional reason for refusing to answer questions raised by the House Un-American Activities Committee.

In this case, Lloyd Barenblatt —a former Vassar psychology professor—was convicted of contempt for refusing to tell the committee whether he was then (1954) or had ever been a communist. In refusing to testify, Barenblatt claimed that under the First Amendment he could refuse to divulge his "religious" and "political" beliefs or any other "personal and private affairs" or his "associational activities."

Without ruling on whether the Fifth Amendment would provide a witness with the Constitutional protection sought by Barenblatt, the Court held that it is necessary to strike a balance between the interests of the individual in remaining silent and the interests of the government in obtaining information which it might need for its own self-preservation. The Court majority made it clear, however, that its ruling in favor of the government was based on the circumstances of the Barenblatt case and was not to be construed as opening the door for unlimited Congressional investigations.

Despite these two decisions, the opponents of the Court have not noticeably eased up on their cry of "soft on subversion." Only days after the Court's Uphaus opinion, the 33-member House Republican Policy Committee endorsed H.R. 3 as "a logical vehicle for the elimination of the doctrine of presumed federal preemption of state sovereignty." Conservative Democrats also have reiterated their intention of continuing to fight for passage of the Smith bill.

The supporters of the Smith bill and other legislation aimed at restricting the Court fail to recognize that America's real security lies in its freedom. In the long run, curbing the Court can only destroy that freedom.

Once the nation begins to give up pieces of the Bill of Rights, it will have started down the bleak road of repression that leads to eventual totalitarianism. America needs above all else to understand that total security is the antithesis of freedom.

Civil liberties and civil rights can never be lightly modified. This, in essence, is the reasoning behind the Supreme Court's desegregation and subversion decisions. It would be well for those who condemn the Court to think twice before using national security as the axe that chips away at America's Bill of Rights.

Labor Arbitration— A Dedicated Calling

By Arthur J. Goldberg

General Counsel, Industrial Union Department, AFL-CIO

I must frankly say that I regard the IUD Digest article entitled "Our Avaricious Arbitrators" to be an unfair and unwarranted attack upon an honorable and dedicated calling of men. Certainly there are arbitrators who are "avaricious" just as there is this type of so-called "labor leader" or politician or doctor. Yet surely an article dealing with the "avaricious labor leader" would properly draw labor's united condemnation.

Just as it is wrong to distort the impression of the labor movement by implying that its sinners are typical, so is it a disservice to permit an impression that arbitrators generally are guilty of the list of "crimes" depicted in the IUD Digest article.

The fact is that arbitrators have made an enormous contribution to labor-management relations, to union stability, and to the welfare of American workers. The arbitration method is not used by labor because of fear of strikes, but because we know that arbitration is the most beneficial way to settle unresolved disputes.

Labor gains more from arbitration than from grievance strikes in the long run. Arbitration is the best way to assure that gains won in contract negotiations actually accrue to the benefit of the members of our unions. This is especially true of labor's dealings with big and economically powerful corporations.

Competent arbitration is not easy to achieve. Naturally it requires an able man as the arbitrator, one who can grasp a wide variety of problems, understand facts often peculiar to a particular industry or plant or operation and exercise fairness, independence, and courage. Often management is absolutely convinced it is right and cannot conceive how an impartial person can conclude otherwise. Perhaps even more often union members involved in a dispute believe beyond doubt that they are right beyond honest, fair question.

Yet the arbitrator must be prepared to decide against one party or the other. Inevitably great displeasure results from some decision. To protect the independence of the arbitrator, we should avoid undercutting the reputation and prestige of those who do a good job. The independence and courage of the arbitrator are important to us because the most important disputes that must be decided are usually the ones about which management feels most strongly. An arbitrator who curries favor instead of meting out justice as he honestly sees it will not stand up when the big test issues do arise.

Sharing Responsibility

The adequacy of the arbitration process is not determined by the arbitrator alone. The parties share a major responsibility. If a company seeks to undermine the process and goes about doing this cleverly, the arbitrator cannot defeat such efforts. He might try and can be helpful, but ultimately the union involved has the major responsibility for bringing the company to terms. If the union is helpless to do so, then we have a truly troublesome problem, but it is hardly fair or helpful to blame arbitrators for our own unresolved difficulties with a company that resists a mature, wholesome collective bargaining relationship.

In all honesty I must also note that a union can also block the effectiveness of the arbitration process. If the union's representatives do not present the facts and arguments adequately, the arbitrator has a difficult time determining the case fairly. Both parties have a major responsibility to the arbitrator: they hire him; he is not imposed on them. He is entitled to help from the parties so that he can reach a fair conclusion. He has no source of information or of understanding of the context in which to view contract clauses except the parties themselves.

The problems of costs and of delay do exist. These problems are not created primarily by arbitrators; where they exist, it is because of trends in the labor-management relationship itself.

A growing volume of arbitration and of more use of the process has led to overloaded arbitrators. Parties want a relatively select group of men, widely known and with extensive experience. These men feel an obligation to resolve problems for parties with whom they have worked and many times their refusals are met with pleas—"Can't you squeeze it in?"

Naturally this concentration of cases among the so-called "top men" in the field invites delay—delay in getting a hearing date acceptable to many people (counsel for each side, officials of each side, and the arbitrator). And then the arbitrator has to find time somehow to study the case and write a decision which is fair, clear, simple, and convincing. Everyone knows it is harder to be clear and brief and simple and convincing than merely to record impressions and opinions as they first come out.

Delay is bad. It threatens the value of the whole process. Yet, there are many times when an arbitrator is blamed for a delay of several weeks or months when the parties themselves have piled up their own delays two and three times or more than the arbitrator's actual time in arriving at his decision. There are delays in the grievance procedure, delays in selecting an arbitrator, delays in preparation, delays in filing briefs or data. It is often convenient to blame all these delays on the arbitrator when in fact one or the other party or both have been to blame.

Make Views Known

If parties do not want delay from the arbitrator, they can make their desires known beforehand. If the arbitrator is not able to meet the proposed schedule, then another man can be selected. If an arbitrator does agree to meet certain time limits and fails to deliver, then the parties need not use him again if that is their desire. After all, the parties initially decide who is to be appointed—and no one but the parties.

Agreement on Fees

Then there is the matter of fees. Some arbitrators have higher fees than others. The parties are free to decide what they are willing to pay. A union need not agree to a man whose fee is higher then they are willing to pay. A union need not agree to a man whose fee is higher than they are prepared to pay. And if an arbitrator's bill is too high in a union's opinion—be it because of alleged padding or any other reason—the union is free to refrain from using that person again. Most arbitrators, in fact the overwhelming majority, are honest and most scrupulous in their financial arrangements.

If a man charges an improper fee (as distinct from one based on a rate higher than you care to pay), then there are ample means to bring the matter to light. Between the National Academy of Abitrators (a professional group), the American Arbitration Association, and the Federal Mediation Service, arbitrators guilty of improper practices would soon be former arbitrators for all practical purposes.

What we need desperately are many good arbitrators whose fees are moderate. This would help solve both the delay problem and the cost problem for those who need economical arbitration.

One of the major things we in the labor movement can do is work with other interested groups in recruiting, training, and assuring the use of more young arbitrators. Small locals cannot afford the higher-priced men and much as these men try to adjust fees to ability to pay, they cannot be expected to provide the solution in this manner. The top men among the arbitrators recognize the problem and we ought to help them devise appropriate relief.

However, there are other matters of cost primarily controlled by the parties. Transcripts often cost more than the arbitrator's fee. Use of procedures so elaborate as to require countless witnesses and leisurely days of filibuster all boost costs.

If arbitration hearings are not made expeditious means to grapple forthrightly with issues at hand and drag on at great expense to the union, it is not the arbitrator who is at fault, it is the union which permits such tactics to go unchallenged. No union need sit idly by and watch what should be a simple and direct process turned into a self-defeating, drawn out, overly expensive farce.

Union Responsibility

In short, unions must assume the burden of shaping the arbitration process. The arbitrator should be fair and competent; if not, get another. The fees should be those within the ability to pay of the union; if this is important, then this matter should be set forth clearly at the outset and no one should be hired if his fee is unacceptable.

The hearing should suit the parties and the case. If transcripts are wanted, they must be paid for. If not wanted, vigorous opposition should be made and the union can refuse to pay. Attorneys should be used only when needed. Insofar as arbitration is a rehash of the grievance procedure, competent grievance men usually do a good job.

If speed is wanted, the entire procedure should be designed to provide speed. And the arbitrator should be a man readily available for the hearing and in a position to decide the case promptly.

There are many difficult problems connected with arbitration of labor-management disputes. Unions have the major responsibility in solving them. We cannot watch the process undermined. We ought not to contribute to loose, if clever, talk of a nature likely to undermine the whole process.

Perhaps a union will run into obstacles with an employer not willing to cooperate. If this happens, the union has a tough problem just as unions have many difficulties not easily overcome. But the real argument is with the employer, not "arbitrators" as a group. The arbitrator is truly the creature of the parties, fashioned by our mutual desires. To some extent the nature of the arbitrator's role results from our pressure and the skill and potency of our participation in the process.

Thus, the union's role is a matter of major concern. To get the best results for our members we should arrange to learn the most from each other's experiences and views. Generalized complaints and name-calling will serve no useful purpose.

We want to get at the crooks. We assume that's what Congress wants to do. We respectfully suggest that we get on with the job.

THE VANISHING RIGHT OF PRIVACY

Ever since man first learned to communicate with his fellows, somebody not included in the conversation has been trying to listen in.

The difference today is that the motive for eavesdropping has changed from idle curiosity to an all-consuming desire to know everything you do or even think. And the stakes are about as high as you can go. On the line are your personal dignity, your good name and reputation, your job.

Big business, big government and big education are all in on the act.

Do you work for a living? Own an insurance policy? Carry a credit card? The file on you is growing.

Ever use the telephone? Members of your own family or your employer may be listening to every word you say by means of a completely harmless-looking item called a telephone extension. It is without question the most widely used eavesdropping device in the world.

Beyond that, the bugging business is so brisk that it now honeycombs the nation's communications network. A professional estimate made

Your privacy is getting less private all the time in the electronic era.

By Lee White

in May 1965, for example, reveals that the city of Miami, Fla., has as many as 10,000 telephones tapped at any one time.

But even wiretapping—universal as it has become since the early 1940s—accounts for only a portion of the surveillance in commerce, in government, in everyday life that is infiltrating and destroying privacy from the cradle to the grave.

The super-snoopers are collecting information about millions of private citizens by the use of a wide variety of sophisticated techniques, including personnel questionnaires, polygraphs (the so-called lie detectors), hidden microphones no bigger than a sorority pin, tape recorders that look like a pack of cigarettes, two-way mirrors, peep-holes in the most unexpected places, cameras and spy-glasses that see as well in the dark as in broad daylight, the mail watch, penetration of secret places by laser beam, computers—and dozen of others.

All of this may make privacy totally obsolete in our own lifetime.

When George Orwell's "1984," gave us a new and frightening prediction of things to come, just four years after World War II ended, the public did take notice. "Big Brother Is Watching You" kicked up such a storm of discussion that any prognosticator could see it would have a profound effect on at least one full generation of Americans.

Yet the fact is that today, when "somebody" really is watching most of the time, the public seems unaware of or indifferent to what is happening.

The arrest by computer of a housewife in New York who failed to pay up after getting a ticket for passing a red light, got the circus treatment in the tabloids, but at least one sober editorial noted the resemblance to Orwell's nightmare.

And somewhere, already, they may be watching Big Brother.

The situation does have its amusing side—for example, the Internal Revenue Agent who couldn't answer satisfactorily a question about his use of the super-snooperscope: Was he watching the suspect on the roof of that house, or the nude sunbathing of the suspect's wife? But it's really not funny.

Vance Packard made a valiant effort to arouse public indignation with his book, "The Naked Society," published just a year ago.

Packard's picture of a reasonably successful family in a typical city of the Land of Liberty, 1964, showed that by telescoping time just a bit, these examples of surveillance could all be happening simultaneously:

While Mom is trying on a new dress in a department store, her every move is being watched via closed-circuit television.

Dad, a junior executive at the company where he works, is being watched by an undercover agent who seems to be just another employee but is in reality a private detective; the company wants to keep tabs on its key subordinates. At the same time, Dad's bank account is being investigated by an insurance company because Dad recently applied for an insurance policy on his personal property.

Meanwhile, young John is taking a lie detector test as part of applying for a job as a salesman.

Some of the snooping devices in all-too common use, complete with an infra-red spy glass and various forms of concealed microphones

This is supposed to probe his honesty, his possibly dangerous habits, and his manliness. And at still another location, John's college professors are being interrogated about the boy's political opinions. All of this will go into a lifetime record.

Now here is a direct quote from the book:

"Daughter Mary, sweet girl, is still only a sophomore in high school. She is in the classroom struggling with a 250-item questionnaire. It asks her to reveal whether her parents seem to quarrel a lot, whether they have ever talked to her about sex, and whether she is worried about menstrual disorders. If Mary's parents happen to hear about this probing, they would be denied any information as to her various responses and how they were scored."

This vivid dramatization of a growing trend in American society faded almost at once into the dark stacks of the public library.

Hardly anybody noticed it except a few of the "sick" comics who milked it for gags. And even the gags never got off the ground.

Obviously, the public was not up in arms about the loss of its privacy. As a matter of fact, it would be easy to build a case for the existence of a new breed of citizens who actually enjoy life in the goldfish bowl.

Among those who make up this new breed might be mentioned the teenagers who swoon over the Beatles (in front of the camera), ladies who identify with the "housewives" in TV commercials for soap, etc., voluntary participants in the "Candid Camera" television program, and all of those who have been corrupted by the presence of wiretap and eavesdropping equipment installed for "legitimate" purposes.

Now, it is over the use of the word "legitimate" that the real dialogue has begun.

As a basic part of its current investigation of invasions of the privacy of individuals by government agencies, Senator Edward V. Long's Judi-

What the well-equipped snooper uses for listening to other people's conversations ciary subcommittee is seeking to define, according to the New York Times, "the admittedly thin line that might separate legitimate law enforcement activities from unconstitutional snooping."

There are strong differences of opinion on the subject.

Law enforcement officers point to court action upholding convictions where mail surveillance provided vitally-needed leads to criminal activity including fraud, espionage, sabotage, organized gambling, racketeering and smuggling of drugs.

Specific examples: the Frank Costello income tax case, the capture in Mexico of a rapist-murderer, health insurance frauds that victimize elderly persons.

On the other hand, Judge Archie Dawson of New York termed the mail watch reported on Roy Cohn as "shocking," and the American Civil Liberties Union joined in the uproar caused by the revelation at Cohn's recent trial.

Defending wiretap for "selected targets" in the war on crime, Chicago Superintendent of Police W. W. Wilson said that the higher-ups in the Cosa Nostra, the syndicate, "or whatever name you choose to call it," are, under our present law, given complete immunity in their oral and telephonic communications.

Thus the only persons who are charged with crimes are the minor figures in the rackets, according to Wilson: "the lowly policy runner, the prostitute, or the narcotics pusher, all of whom are at the bottom of the ladder."

He points out that wiretapping is not unconstitutional. Even if it were, he maintains, "the Constitution does not make any of our rights absolute. Our homes are our castles but they are not immune against search and seizure—only against unreasonable search and seizure. And so it should be with our telephone communications."

Writing in the Christian Science Monitor, Superintendent Wilson posed a clear choice:

1) Put court-authorized wiretapping on the side of the prosecution, or

2) Recognize organized crime as a fact of life in the United States "for which society must continue to pay a frightful cost in life and property and ever-mounting insurance rates."

Answering for those who want more, not less privacy, Senator Long said, "Our country was not founded that its citizens might be spied upon at the whim of a government bureaucrat.

"Our Constitution was not framed by men who doubted the value of personal liberty.

"Our vast continent was not tamed and settled by persons who wanted to weigh every word of their every conversation against the possibility of its being overheard by official ears."

Feeling that the gain to be won by the legalization of wiretapping would never offset the loss of personal liberty, the Missouri Democrat concluded:

"Wiretapping for domestic law enforcement should be prohibited."

Organized labor is firmly committed to a policy of outlawing telephone tapping—except in matters of national security—and on a wider front is waging a determined battle against snooping on workers by employers in the personnel office, in the plant, and off the job.

So far the most effective means of forcing management to draw back on the use of peepholes and hidden cameras has been instant retaliation in the press and solid membership resistance to such practices, when discovered.

When members of Communications Workers of America found a hidden camera in the men's room of a telephone company building in New York, they promptly filed a grievance—and also called the New York Times. Result: no more hidden cameras.

In Baltimore, according to UAW Solidarity, management of the Chevrolet plant installed a closed-circuit TV surveillance system, with cameras all over the plant.

"They installed the cameras," UAW Vice President Leonard Woodcock recalled, "but the union chairman called up the UAW GM Department and said, 'What are we going to do about it?' We at the international said, 'Are your people prepared to fight?' He said, 'Yes, they are.'

"We said, 'Call a membership meeting and then go in and tell management—and we will tell Chevrolet here—that when the cameras go on, the plant goes down.' At this moment the cameras have not gone on."

The American Newspaper Guild found that Hearst management on San Francisco papers was monitoring telephone calls made by classified advertising employees. Admitting the charge but arguing that monitoring was "a constructive tool" of supervision, management refused to stop the practice. This and other developments in California have brought about one of the most heartening developments in the unions' concerted attack on spying and snooping of all kinds.

On July 27, 1965, the Public Utilities Commission of the State of California ruled that management could no longer listen in on monitoring, service observing and training equipment, without notifying those under observation of that fact.

This means that telephone company supervisors, classified newspaper sales supervisors, and all other management persons who use monitoring equipment, must "beep" at regular intervals or "by clearly, prominently and permanently marking each telephone instrument" indicate it may be monitored.

To all who have had dealings with supervision in labor-management affairs, the California Commission's instructions—to mark each instrument not only clearly, but clearly and prominently, as well as permanently—will remain a classic of its genre.

In another world altogether, the world of the supermarket where a good deal of the worker's income is spent, the peeping-tom techniques are eroding what's left of our average citizen's privacy.

"Heaven knows, the American consumer has for years been the object of an unrelenting scrutiny that measures everything from his salary to his saliva, from his pulse to his purse, from his libido to his liver," complained Marya Mannes.

"Now they've got a secret eye camera that checks up on your pupil dilations. A fellow looks at a package of Fig Newtons, say, and if he likes Fig Newtons, his pupils dilate, and if he doesn't, they contract."

It would seem that there is no place left to hide.

And if the citizen's right of privacy is, as Louis D. Brandeis said, the most comprehensive of rights as well as "the right most valued by civilized man," there is much to be done to protect it.

That is, by those of us who don't mind being overheard—and recorded—in defense of the First, Second, Fourth, Fifth and Ninth Amendments to the Constitution.

SOME THOUGHTS ON ACADEMIC FREEDOM

(An Address delivered by Regent Arthur DeBardeleben at the Fall Banquet of the AAUP, October 17, 1963, Madison, Wisconsin.)

Last May your president, Doctor Van R. Potter, for the express purpose of promoting a greater exchange of ideas between the Faculty and the Regents, invited me to speak on "academic freedom" at this banquet. I was delighted to accept the invitation. I do not flatter myself that these thoughts on academic freedom have not been presented and considered before this, but I do hope that these remarks will serve to show what one, I trust not too untypical, member of the genus regens thinks about academic freedom at this time.

Because I am a member of the Board of Regents of this University, I owe it to the Board and to its other members and to you to state, and I do state, without qualification, that in addressing you this evening I speak for myself only and not as a representative of the Board of Regents or of any other regent.

The guarantee of academic freedom, with the concomitant protection of tenure, is closest to the heart of the academic enterprise. Because certain groups and individuals have, while purporting to speak in defense of academic freedom, sought to destroy it by saying that we can't have true academic freedom until some creed or belief has been suppressed and because attacks on academic freedom have not been limited to persons who have been disassociated from our institutions of higher education, it may be necessary for one speaking on academic freedom, even though he be a regent of this University, to define the term to which he addresses himself. Permit me to do so, briefly.

In order to define the term, academic freedom, as that term is intended by me when used in these remarks, it is necessary to look first to the mission of the University — to look at the mission of the scholar. The objective of the University — of the scholar — is primarily the seeking and ascertainment of truth and is secondarily, although also of great importance, the dissemination of truth. Truth, in this sense, is that which is discoverable by man through his powers of investigation and the exercise of his ingenuity. Truth, in this sense, does not refer to any doctrine or belief depending for its origin or validity upon any source or theory of divine inspiration or disclosure. Attackers of academic freedom have often argued that the role of the educator, particularly in the areas of the humanities and social studies, should be that of merely presenting "the facts" and letting "the facts speak for themselves"; in short, that the teacher should not be concerned, in the classroom, with theories or conclusions. Truth, in the sense spoken of here, does not mean merely "getting at the facts". Truth, as the term is used here, is concerned with facts because of their significance, their relationship, within a system of knowledge. Truth thus consists, in short, of the body of conclusions, opinions, and even theories and beliefs, which the scholar draws or derives from his observations and investigations. Truth includes the scholar's explanation of the structure and relationship of things and concepts, and has the same meaning whether thought of from the standpoint of the humanist, the social scientist, or the physical or biological scientist.

In pursuing his mission to discover the truth, the scholar, merely by investigating, suggests that there are or may be grounds for questioning previously accepted precepts, and in the search for truth, the challenge to existing doctrines, conclusions, and beliefs is never-ending so long as there remain data, relationships, concepts, or other things which require explanation or which may seem to require explanation.

Society has an undoubted interest in seeing that you who are engaged in furthering knowledge shall be free to interpret your data and to announce your conclusions, in and out of the classroom, without the fear or reality of sanctions of any kind whatever, whether direct or indirect, or whether pecuniary or related to status or advancement, or whether from within or from without your institution. This societal interest is independent of and different than, although not superior to, the right of the individual scholar as a citizen to the exercise of freedom of inquiry and expression.

We arrive at the question: What has caused attacks upon or attempts to dilute academic freedom?

First, it is clear that the principal objective of the promoters of some of the attacks upon academic freedom during the last three-quarters of a century has been to still criticism of the exercise of unregulated freedom or license by certain economic interests. It is certainly no secret that there are educators who are critical of some aspects of the operation of the capitalistic system. Attacks on professors whose investigations lead them to question something old in the quest for something new which will be better than the old rarely take the form of direct argument, contention, or exposition upon the merits. Rather, the economic groups which may be affected, or which think they might be affected, by an educator's investigations or teachings, attempt to counter such activities by the use of bias words such as "fellow travelers", "pinks", "reds", or "statists", "socialists", or "un-American" or "anti-Christian". In using these examples of bias words employed by attackers of academic freedom, I do not intend any distinction depending upon whether the attack comes from the right or from the left, but it must be admitted, I think, that in this country and at the present time the attacks upon academic freedom are coming entirely, so far as I have observed, from right-wing groups, as the use of the bias words with which all of us are familiar so clearly shows.

The most unfortunate characteristic of attacks currently made against academic freedom, particularly in the area of the social sciences, is the tendency to equate nonconformity or unorthodoxy with communism or with the taint of communism. These anti-academic freedom pressure groups are run by a few individuals. They and their organizations consistently and insistently convey the impression that to either advocate economic changes or point out weaknesses in the working of the capitalistic system is about the same thing as supporting communism. They seek to impress academic people, indeed, our entire populace, with the credo that it "does not pay" to think, to dissent, or to raise the voice of conscience.

The noteworthy thing about these attackers of academic freedom is that although their number is small they do have the capacity of painting themselves as the protectors of "free enterprise" and of thus appealing to considerable numbers of persons in the business world who, because their interest in education is solely as a means to a practical end, that is, the earning of more money than they could earn without it, have never been inspired by the challenge of acquiring knowledge for its own sake, and who are, therefore, susceptible to the argument that the academic social scientist is "impractical" or "unreliable".

The outstanding leaders in the business world, the leaders in the professions, some of them members of the boards of trustees or regents of colleges or universities, of course deplore such attacks on academic freedom and recognize that any curbing of freedom of thought or inquiry in our universities or on the part of our faculties strikes at a major resource of our democracy, strikes in fact, at the very groundwork, tradition, and meaning of the United States.

Are there other sources of attacks upon or attempts to dilute academic freedom?

The answer to this question, unfortunately, is yes. All of us have been disturbed, at one time or another, about the attacks made upon our institutions of higher learning in the name of religion — attacks which range all the way from characterizations of universities as being "godless", "atheistic" or "anti-religious" to demands that professors be appointed who will "Christianize" the students. Often those who attack academic freedom in the name of religion are also active in the attacks upon our scholars in the name of economic nonconformity. As Professor Robert M. MacIver in his book, Academic Freedom in Our Time, points out, " . . . it seems to be as easy for certain minds to identify the divine law with their economic predilections as with their religious tenets."

Another source of attack upon academic freedom comes from those who, although they would concede that the scholar should not be fettered by religious dogma and, indeed, cannot be constitutionally so fettered, nevertheless believe that there should be an establishment of morality, a conventional wisdom governing social relations, which may not be questioned by the scholar, either as investigator, teacher, or citizen. The more generally troublesome problems in this area are those that center about views concerning sex relationships, for example, birth control, premarital and extramarital sexual conduct, and related subjects. The attack on academic freedom in the name of protection of the mores of sexual conduct is doubly outrageous because in addition to involving an attempt to destroy freedom of inquiry (common to any attack on academic freedom), it involves, in most instances, an utter disregard on the part of the attackers, of the gulf which exists between the so-called mores sought to be protected and actual prevailing social practice. The removal of Assistant Professor Leo F. Koch from his position at the University of Illinois about one year before the expiration of the term of his appointment is a case in point.

In announcing his reasons for dismissing Professor Koch, President Henry fell back on the old cliches:

> " . . . I consider Professor Koch's letter a grave breach of academic responsibility. The views expressed are offensive and repugnant, contrary to commonly accepted standards of morality and their public espousal may be interpreted as encouragement of immoral behavior. It is clear that Mr. Koch's conduct has been prejudicial to the best interests of the University."

I ask that you bear with me a little longer on the Koch case because, it seems to me, that it is illustrative of the form which attacks on academic freedom may be expected to take in the future, whether these attacks originate from distaste for a professor's views on so-called moral subjects or his views on social, economic, or political subjects. For example, in the June, 1963, issue of A G B

Reports, published by the Association of Governing Boards of State Universities and Allied Institutions, a synopsis of remarks made at a panel discussion of regent responsibilities shows one regent (not from Wisconsin) advocating the fostering of an "academic climate which guarantees freedom of responsible thinking and research." Another trustee (not from Wisconsin) who said, "It is fatal to select or promote only those faculty members who conform to an acceptable political, social or religious code," saw no inconsistency in declaring that trustees and regents have the duty of "initiating dismissal proceedings for a faculty member who may be found to be a member of the communist party." I have read the reasons given by President Henry for the dismissal of Koch. What did the Board of Trustees have to say on the subject? After finding, among other things, that Professor Koch's letter "was not a reasoned statement, marshaling evidence in support of views held by him, and . . . that the language of that letter was not in keeping with those standards of temperateness, dignity, and respect for the opinions of others which should characterize public expression by members of the faculty of the University of Illinois," the Board concluded that it believed "that any responsible expression of views by the members of the faculty, even though unpopular and even, possibly, untenable, is in order."

The Ad Hoc Committee on the Koch case answered the Board's contention concerning irresponsibility by stating:

> "The concept of 'irresponsibility' is exceedingly vague. Any one of us can easily call to mind statements by our colleagues which might be termed by some as unrestrained, undignified, or lacking respect for the opinion of others. Any serious application of the standard would tend to eliminate or discourage any colorful or forceful utterance. More likely, as Mill observes, the standard would be reserved as a sanction only for expression of unorthodox opinion . . . "
> " . . . it seems clear to us that, had the letter dealt with any subject other than sex mores, religion, or some other acutely sensitive area, its language and tone would have passed unnoticed. We do not believe that a faculty member writing on these subjects should be held to higher standards of responsibility than one writing on less controversial topics."

One more word about the Koch case. Both Committee A and the Ad Hoc Committee referred, unfortunately in my opinion, to what Committee A called "academic responsibility" and to what the Ad Hoc Committee called "a standard of discipline." As Professor Warren Taylor pointed out in his dissent, teachers are citizens and are to be accorded the same freedom of expression as is allowed to all other citizens. He said: "There is no need now to seek or to create a new standard to silence teachers. To fire a teacher for his utterances the administrator cannot rely on such an ambiguous test as that of 'academic responsibility'. The opinions of a teacher as citizen are not enough to justify termination. The administrator will have to establish proof that beyond the utterance lies unfitness to teach: professional incompetence, dereliction of duty."

A recital of the sources of danger to academic freedom would hardly touch the more important points without mention of the influence of political controls and governmental activity upon freedom of inquiry. The iniquitous loyalty oaths and disclaimer affidavits still required by at least one federal enactment (not to mention the statutes which have been adopted by a few states) show the political influence in its most obvious and obnoxious form. The existence of such pernicious requirements underlines the need for effective liaison between our universities and the legislative and executive branches of the government if our universities are to receive the federal support necessary to enable them to perform their mission in a free society unhampered by restrictions which tend to negate the philosophy underlying the giving of support.

A good deal has been said lately about further implications of governmental support. John Speicher, in the current (October 10th) issue of The Reporter, says that the high degree of specialization in government-sponsored research has created divisions within the natural sciences that make the cultural gap which has been said to exist between the humanists and the scientists seem paltry by comparison. There can be no doubt that the federal government now determines the subject matter and direction of the majority of research going on in our universities. It is entirely appropriate that the federal government should support higher education not only in research and the area of graduate education where the universities may serve a need more national than local, but also in the support of instruction and the construction of physical facilities. The appropriation and acceptance of such support should be, however, conditioned in such a manner as not to deflect scholars from productive work of a theoretical nature in favor of research which offers the promise of practical results and benefits over the short term. In my opinion, it cannot be considered other than an infringement upon academic freedom when a scholar can only get support for research likely to lead to fairly immediate practical results or when the ebb and flow of support for research and scholarly investigation depends upon the current fashion in weaponry, space technology, or the existence or absence of crises in foreign relations. If the universities are to pursue their mission with effect, scholars in each discipline must be afforded opportunities of research and scholarly inquiry about equal to the opportunities of scholars in each other discipline. None of this means that research which may result in practical benefits should lack encouragement and support. The University of Wisconsin is justly proud of its outstanding scholars whose investigations and discoveries have made possible many great practical benefits to mankind just as it is proud of those whose scholarly inquiries have advanced knowledge in areas having no immediate apparent practical consequences. The encouragement of advancement of basic knowledge at this University should never be dominated by considerations of practicality, popular whim, or current crisis. Freedom in research and scholarly inquiry demands the provision of support, unencumbered by restrictions of any kind, sufficient to permit all faculty members having research competence and inclination to pursue the lines of scholarly inquiry which they decide are worthy of investigation.

Having considered the sources of attacks upon or attempts to dilute academic freedom — having considered some of the dangers to academic freedom, what are the proper respective roles of the governing board, of the administration, and of the faculty in meeting these attacks, attempts, and dangers? Let me discuss my conception of the respective responsibilities of the board, the administration, and the faculty in that order:

The governing board of this institution has, over the years, approved university legislation which establishes, I believe, rules relating to tenure which are fully in accord with the recommendations of the faculty and which are completely consistent with the statements of principles adopted by your Association. Aside from the matter of appointments, promotions, and dismissals, and the rules relating thereto, the governing board has the responsibility, in the area of academic freedom and tenure, of safeguarding and fostering an atmosphere — an environment — unqualifiedly conducive to the free and untrammeled search for truth. It is the duty of the governing board to resist and protect the faculty against the pressures, clamors, and demands of ideological and other special interest groups — against all who do not appreciate the goals of scholarship, whether alumni, politicians, private donors, the press, or segments of the public.

A president of a university protects and implements academic freedom by interpreting to the public the values and goals of higher education and the primary importance thereto of freedom of inquiry. A university president also protects and implements academic freedom by encouraging it and by resisting attacks upon it from without and from within the institution. A university president protects and implements academic freedom by normally following faculty recommendations concerning appointments and promotions, so long as they are within budgetary allotments.

When we think of what the faculty should do to protect and implement academic freedom, we are thinking of what the university itself should do because in reality and in the minds of the public and of other educators and institutions, the faculty is the university. We, here in Wisconsin, have a great university. It is without doubt the greatest resource of the State of Wisconsin and one of the most important assets of our nation. It overwhelms one to be a part of this enterprise. The greatness of this institution is directly attributable to the ability and attainments, the dedication, and the inspirational qualities of its faculty.

When we speak of what the faculty should do to protect and implement academic freedom, we can, I think, answer the question very simply and very briefly. The faculty must continue to exercise, and insist upon its right and duty to exercise, academic freedom without any qualification whatever. When an academic freedom question or issue is presented, it should be met head-on and forthrightly. No quarter, no accommodation, and no compromise can ever be given or made with the opponents of freedom of inquiry and expression. There have been some examples in the academic history of this institution and of other leading institutions where attempts at accommodation, avoidance, or compromise were attempted. Let us look at some:

The words on the plaque spell out Wisconsin's Magna Charta of academic freedom.

As Professors Curti and Carstensen have pointed out, it does not take away from the importance of the statement to recognize that it was not responsive to the inquiry before the regents' committee. Professor Ely was charged by the Superintendent of Public Instruction and tried by a committee of the regents for believing in "strikes and boycotts, justifying and encouraging the one while practicing the other." He was alleged to have threatened to boycott a local firm whose workers were on strike; to have stated that a union man, no matter how dirty and dissipated, was always to be employed in preference to a non-union man, no matter how industrious and trustworthy; and to have entertained and counseled with a union delegate in his home.

Unfortunately, in my opinion, Ely denied the charges rather than, in effect, demurring to them. Although Professor Ely had declared privately, according to Curti and Carstensen, that academic freedom was the vital issue, he did not mention this in his answer to the charges. In fact, Professor Ely stated that if the charges were true, they would "unquestionably unfit me to occupy a responsible position as an instructor of youth in a great university."

Although Professor Ely did have valuable allies throughout the academic world, at Wisconsin and elsewhere, it seems clear that except for the antipathy which the rest of the members of the board felt toward Ex-officio Regent Wells, except for the warm support and helpful guidance of President Charles Kendall Adams, and except for the sagacious suggestion of Professor Olin, this University's Magna Charta of academic freedom might have had to wait for another occasion. Professor Edward W. Bemis, who ran afoul of the authorities at the University of Chicago at about the same time on similar grounds, when he wrote to congratulate Ely, quickly perceived that although Ely had won the particular case, he had sacrificed the important principle. He stated, according to Hofstadter and Metzger, "that was a glorious victory for you. I was sorry only that you seemed to show a vigor of denial as to entertaining a walking delegate or counseling strikers as if either were wrong, instead of under certain circumstances a duty."

The California loyalty oath debacle of a decade ago is also instructive. This case points up emphatically the danger of making any concessions to or of any appeasement of opponents of academic freedom. It shows that concessions are not only wrong in principle but disastrous in application. Under the threats of the infamous Tenney Committee, the President of the University of California actually drafted and submitted to the Board of Regents a loyalty oath which was to be required of every faculty member. It was the hope, no doubt, of the President and his advisors that the taking of this step would stave off the more drastic assaults on academic freedom which were being threatened by the Tenney Committee. The result of the adoption of a requirement for the loyalty oath was to invite greater excesses by the Tenney Committee in its assaults on academic freedom and civil liberties.

On the other hand, in 1910 when the Regents of the University of Wisconsin undertook to make promotions and adjustments of salaries without the recommendations of the appropriate departments or the president and failed to make promotions recommended by the departments and the president and consulted directly with members of the faculty concerning their own work or that of other departments, thereby showing, as reported by Curti and Carstensen, "a disposition to take the initiative in strictly educational matters, even extending to the point where one regent attended and in a critical way took part in a doctoral examination," upon strong representations being made by the faculty, the regents backed off and concurred in a statement, as to the future, to the effect that they had "no intention of interfering with the customary methods of educational administration by the faculty; . . . they will continue to allow the faculty the initiative in formulating educational policy; . . . they desire appointments to be made through the regular channels as developed in the custom of the University."

The opposition to the Illinois Broyles Commission investigation of the University of Chicago and Roosevelt College by the administrations and faculties of those two institutions shows us, again, the effect of a solid faculty position on the matter of academic freedom. Eight of the proposed measures failed to pass the Illinois Legislature and the ninth, Broyles' major bill, was vetoed by Governor Stevenson.

An important part of the responsibility of the faculty to oppose, without equivocation, compromise, or accommodation, every assault upon or threat to academic freedom is the duty of faculty members to sustain each other. In this day of increased specialization, it may be difficult for a faculty composed of accountants, economists, fashion designers, home economists, military scientists, marketing experts, mining engineers, physicians, physicists, geneticists, chemists, botanists, political scientists, astronomers, and zoologists to see how violations of academic freedom that affect colleagues in departments remote from their own should be matters of great concern. In this connection we return to our original precept. Although each scholar has his own field and his own viewpoint, the University which brings all scholars together has no particular field and no particular viewpoint. The institution which brings all scholars together is concerned with the whole field of knowledge, with the whole body of truth; it has one goal, the discovery and the dissemination of truth. It makes one demand upon its members, but it makes that demand insistently and unceasingly — the demand for sincere and unremitting devotion to the cause of knowledge in all of its aspects.

CIVIL RIGHTS AND DIRECT ACTION IN THE URBAN NORTH

George D. Blackwood
Boston University

Prepared for delivery at the 1964 Annual Meeting of The American Political Science Association, Chicago, Illinois
Pick-Congress Hotel September 9-12, 1964

Although the values which characterize American society may be dismissed as commonplace platitudes by sophisticated observers, they must be the starting point in any analysis of the emergence of the American Negro--and what may be called "Negro syndicalism" or direct action for civil rifhts--as the central figure of domestic politics in the 1960's. Politics in the United States has always been shaped by a profound social ethos which is widely understood and frequently expressed; as Gunnar Myrdal pointed out, Negroes have always shared in American ideals if not in their realization.[1]

The essence of the American faith is a belief that democracy is designed for the common good as envisioned by a majority of adults at any given time. The underlying assumption is that there is a clear-cut identity between the interests of the individual, the interest of a specific group, and the interests of the nation as a whole; this principle of identity may be and in fact frequently has been threatened by a concentration on group interests. To mention three which will be central to the discussion in this paper: ethnic nimorities or "hyphenated Americans," labor unions and now American Negroes have all been seen at one time or another as groups which seem to stand out from the national interest.

These are all "minorities" which affect the "majority"--and basically the problem of civil rights in America today, the problem of demonstrations and "bloc voting" must be dealt with in terms of majority-minority relations. Although the great mass of voters is affected by varieties of political experience which are sometimes quite complex, they have a common perspective which might be called "majoritarian national interest." To this majoritarian ideology is added the corollary of America as a success story, as the land of opportunity for everyman, the land of abundance, optimism and progress. One of the best statements of American beliefs is found in a landmark document in the civil rights field, the report of the Truman Commission on Civil Rights, written under the direction of Robert K. Carr:[2]

> "The central theme in our American heritage is the importance of the individual person. From the earliest moment of our history we have believed that every human being has an essential dignity and integrity which must be respected and safeguarded. Moreover, we believe that the welfare of the individual is the final goal of group life. Our American heritage further teaches that to be secure in the rights he wishes for himself, each man must be willing to respect the rights of other men. This is the conscious recognition of a basic moral principle: that all men are created equal as well as free. . . ."

While the belief in the equality of opportunity has been badly shaken in the twentieth century (and the virtual shattering of that belief beyond repair is very important in the development of Negro syndicalism), it is still part of the classical framework of American ideology. One of the historians of the national character, although noting that his generalization does not apply to the Negro, asserts that "America has had a greater measure of social equality and social mobility than any highly developed society in human history."[3] Yet when faced with the role of the Negro in American life, as Alan P. Grimes has recently put it: "White Americans, unableto eliminate racial diversity, were faced with the alternatives of racial equality or white supremacy (with or without slavery); they chose the latter."[4] This fundamental contradiction is today at the very base of the civil rights struggle.

Closely linked to the beliefs in majoritarian national interest and equality of opportunity for all individuals is a belief in the sanctity of private property and the right of the individual to acquire and dispose of it, together with the value of competition. A rising phenomenon which has deep roots in our social ethos is "privatization," a significant characteristic of many suburbs and in fact large segments of our cities; this, it may be postulated, plays an important role in the rejection of Negroes, since privatized Americans like their neighborhoods as homogenized as their milk.[5]

The final article of the American faith that creates the frame of reference in which the current civil rights movement in the urban north must be viewed is what the semanticists call the "two-valued orientation," not so much an idea as a technique of thinking. Many Americans have viewed the world traditionally from a rather Zarathustrian perspective, with everything divided into good-and-bad, rich-and-poor, a world of light and happiness on one side and a world of evil and darkness on the other. And it is not going too far to say--James Baldwin is the major exponent in literary circles of this point of view but other Negro authors affirm it, and the Black Muslims, Malcolm X and various leaders of ACT also share it--that American whites have created at least the impression and perhaps the actual belief that they identify good things with white society. The other side of the coin, that non-white societies are not good, is something for which few white Americans would consciously argue, but they prefer that Negro Americans and for that matter other peoples in the non-white majority of the world follow the white American example.[6]

This two-valued orientation springs from American history, the differences between the United States and the Europe from which it evolved, and the fact that American abundance and some of its achievements were unrivalled. There is, however, a nagging element of insecurity always present. At its rawest, this has erupted into a hysterical suppression or attack upon dissident elements during both world wars (the first much more than the second, as John P. Roche has pointed out),[7] and the McCarthy era.

In two ways, what may be called the Zarathustrian complex which has structured the American way of thinking has had a strong impact upon the controversy over civil rights, especially as related to the cities of the North and West. First, it is a struggle involving white men and black, in a society where there have been traditional distinctions between whites and black in most areas of opportunity (certain occupations within government, and special skills in such fields as baseball, music and literature provides the exception.). Second, the very fact that the focus of the storm over civil rights is the great cities rather than the farm, the small town or even the medium-sized city (although the demonstrations and boycotts in Gary and Youngstown, the riots in Rochester, and the "welfare plan" of former City Manager Joseph Mitchell in Newburgh, New York, which was in fact designed to combat the flow of migrant Negroes into the city indicate that the problems are not confined to larger cities) is very important to the context of the problem. The city itself has long been regarded by some Americans as the real root of corruption, crime and immorality in American life, or closely associated with the real root. Urban culture has long been viewed as disastrous in its effects, not only upon sturdy country folk but upon the poor and unfortunate within the city itself; the cry has frequently been raised that city life 'crushes, enslaves and ruins so many thousands of our young men, who are insensibly made the victims of dissipation, or reckless speculation, and of ultimate crime.'[8]

These traditional American values have suffered a series of shocks in the twentieth century. In some respects the candidacy of Senator Goldwater and the "right turn" upon which the Republican Party has now entered reflects the reaction to these shocks--an attempt to return to fundamental values in much the same way that the Democratic Party in 1896 tried to return to the values of the pre-Civil War period.[9] It has been pointed out recently that the elections of 1894 and 1896 "mark the emergence of the Republican Party as the party of the rising cities," and this pattern of urban allegiance continued until 1928.[10]

At the very time that the Grand Old Party was achieving this urban domination, the rapid increase in the number and influence of immigrant groups and their descendants put an increasing strain upon the core of the American ideology. As Glazer and Moynihan put it in their study of several ethnic groups in New York, "the ethnic group in American society became not a survival from the age of mass immigration but a new social form."[11]

The experience of the various immigrant groups beginning with the Irish, is of substantial significance from the standpoint of the developing Negro political ethos in urban America. The Negro is always measured against the Irish, the Italians, the Poles, the Puerto Ricans, the Jews and other ethnic groups. Although Baldwin, Kenneth Clark, Adam Clayton Powell, and others deny that immigrant experience is really very relevant, the comparative approach used by Glazer and Moynihan has deep roots in the way of looking at minority groups. In 1932, for instance, Henry Cabot Lodge, jr. gave a frank analysis of the role of immigrants:[12]

> "The Irish wave, let us say, pushed up the level of the Americans already here. The Italian immigration enabled the descendants of these Irish to fare far better than their ancestors had done. Each succeeding wave pushed the others up. With unlimited land and with unlimited ignorant labor to do the dirty work, the task of providing good times for those who were already here was not insuperable. . . For many generations, therefore, we have actually had a proletariat. The distasteful word did not disturb us, because it did not seem to apply to Americans, but only to an alien group, still too ignorant and too helpless to make its wants known."

When Lodge wrote his book, most ethnic minorities from Europe could already protect themselves by the use of machine politics. Their backgrounds provided a system of values which interpreted politics and government in terms of persons rather than abstract laws and was "private-regarding" in outlook.[13] The Negro came into the urban scene in large numbers just as the immigrant-based machine was reaching and perhaps passing its peak; the first city to see the systematic organization of Negroes in machine politics was Chicago.[14]

Another test of the established value system in rapidly urbanizing America came with the rise of industrial unionism. Craft unionism had fitted into the framework with some difficulty; industrial unionism, at least in its early forms, was greeted with hostility and resistance. Strikes, boycotts and demonstrations of various kinds had always been central to the development of the labor movement. And with the rise of the Industrial Workers of the World a full-blown philosophy of direct-action tactics--syndicalism, American-style--came into being. Labor unrest reached a peak in 1919, with extreme elements expressing some admiration for the Russian Revolution and despairing of life in "darkest America."[15] Some militants advocated political action along with strikes, and a new Labor Party ran John Fitzpatrick, President of the Chicago Federation of Labor, for Mayor of Chicago in 1919. It was argued that "the people are done with the old times, the old ways and the old bunk. . . those who oppose the Labor Party are feeding the fires of revolution."[16] The appeal failed and Fitzpatrick ran third.

Some of the reactions to militancy were also extreme. One writer said that Samuel Gompers' dislike for the radicals was based on the fact that he and Lenin were "rivals for control of the United States."[17] After the Seattle General Strike, a newspaper advertisement advocated death for all union leaders and life imprisonment or deportation for all members.[18] By the early 1920's, militancy in the labor movement was in rapid retreat.

It was resumed with new tactics in the 1930's, with the rise of the CIO. The new tactics included sit-in strikes and an alliance (for practical purposes) with some arms of the government in Washington. Five patterns which were to be important for Negro syndicalism developed in the years from 1937 to 1941:

a. A reliance on mass action--huge meetings, sit-ins, massed picket lines, co-ordinated demonstrations.

b. The rise of new, young, idealistic leadership which became symbolic to many conservatives of radicalism (and some of the leaders did have radical backgrounds).

c. Vocal sympathy from liberals, tempered with some criticism about tactics.

d. A plunge into politics, culminating with the CIO-PAC.

e. The galvanizing of old organizations (in this case the American Federation of Labor) into broadening scope and increased vigor.

For the Negro leader of the 1960's, two lessons and a conundrum emerge from the rise of the CIO. One lesson isthat the great American middle class reacts to militancy and especially to violence, so that most "responsible militants" among the Negro leaders have a stronger argument for non-violence. The other is that there are always fears about Communist influences until it can be shown clearly how the problem is dealt with effectively. The conundrum is that workers organized into unions does not mean any guarantees of Negro equality in society; many union members appear to be strongly anti-Negro in non-union affairs.

One labor leader, A. Philip Randolph of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, is a major "Negro militant" as well as "labor militant." Randolph proposed a Negro "March on Washington" in 1941 and captured the imagination of thousands of Negroes with something new: "the spontaneous involvement of large masses of Negroes in a political protest without the collaboration of whites."[19] The march was called off when President Roosevelt issued an Executive Order establishing a Fair Employment Practices Commission.

World War II was a watershed in Negro history, with a transition from an overwhelmingly rural and agricultural population largely in the South to an increasingly urban population in the North, tied to the fringes of industry. The emigration from the South which thus began--larger than the emigration of World War I and the 1920's--witnessed the founding of the first group (the Congress of Racial Equality) directly dedicated to non-violent action for civil rights. CORE developed some new direct action techniques, including the forerunner of the "freedom ride" in 1947. As a result of the attempt to test the ban on segregated interstate travel laid down by the Supreme Court, several CORE members were arrested; Bayard Rustin spent thirty days on a North Carolina chain gang.[20]

However, with the exception of a few episodes such as the Montgomery bus strike, the mainstream of tactics down to 1960 was legalistic and political; agitation for Civil Rights bills and action in the courts. To many Negro leaders, it gradually became evident that action in Congress and the courts was not enough. Not only was resistance in the South painfully evident, but economic and social progress for the Northern Negro was very slow. The income of Negro families, while rising, did not keep pace with white income increases, and little was being done with respect to discrimination in employment and housing. Frustration rose as the skill-level of jobs rose with automation, and Negroes were hard-hit by the recessions of the 1950's.

The direct-action tactics which evolved into the non-ideological and badly co-ordinated movement of Negro sundicalism began with the Greensboro, North Carolina, sit-in of February 1, 1960. Before long, it was widely practiced in the South and then spread into the North. Protest demonstrations in the North were largely aimed at discrimination and segregation in employment, education and to a lesser extent housing. In 1963 alone, at least twenty-eight Northern and Western cities had some type of racial demonstration. Picketers demanding jobs for Negroes lay down in front of trucks, climbed cranes on construction projects, chained themselves to equipment, and issued leaflets attacking employers, unions and governmental officials. The climax of the widespread demonstrations came with the March on Washington of August 28, 1963; in many respects, this was an exercise in sentimentality and symbolism, with unity of the major Negro organizations, participation of white liberals, and the endorsement of a liberal President as hallmarks.

With the racial crisis the central question of domestic politics in the 1960's, a natural question arose concerning Negro voting. Could not the Negroes use the ballot to gain their objectives, instead of sit-ins, selective buying, and picketing? About the time of the March on Washington, there was widespread feeling, at least in some segments of the NAACP, that direct action could not destroy some of the main barriers to Negro equality and that it had become clear that direct action techniques had little real impact. This was demonstrated by the interest of the Kennedy Administration and private foundations in setting up such projects as the voter registration endeavor in the South; nothing comparable was done for the North, however.[21]

As Banfield and Wilson have made clear, the northern urban Negro in America has "numerical strength and political weakness" in the cities due to the "class structure of Negro society and the character of urban political systems."[22] Transiency, a high degree of social disorganization, and the lack of a strong sense of community attachment, either to the Negro community or the broader city community, characterize the Negro lower class. The relatively small Negro middle class has given little real leadership in effective civic action, in the view of most analysts of Negro problems. Beyond that, there has been a clear-cut failure by political and civic leaders in northern cities and states to develop any plans for training Negroes (and other new urbanites) for living in cities and contributing to them. Our folkways stand in the way, and, as has been said, ". . . if northern Negroes remain inadequately educated for urban living and fail to participate fully in the urban economy, the 'primitive folk culture' of the South can less and less be assigned responsibility, and northern cities will be suffering from the neglect of their own human resources."[23]

One tool for re-shaping the dynamics of American cities to meet the needs of newcomers has always been political organization, at least since the rise of Tammany. But Negro politics has for the most part been shaped by the city, rather than molding city politics to its own needs. James Q. Wilson suggests that "the structure and style of Negro politics reflect the politics of the city as a whole," and so cannot be viewed apart from it.[24] In Chicago, for instance, Negroes have long been organized as a sub-machine in which--until the Negro Revolt hits its stride in 1963-64--Congressman William L. Dawson has exerted firm control. This means that Dawson and his associates sometimes oppose the "race point of view," preferring the machine methods of jobs, favors and protection in return for votes. A much more personal type of following characterizes New York, with Adam Clayton Powell a militant far beyond the reach of party leaders and the press; in fact, their criticisms help make him a hero in Harlem because he defies "The Man" or "Whitey." Still a third type of situations in between the Negro as symbol (Powell) and the Negro as machine leader (Dawson), has emerged where Negroes are less numerous but still part of the political equation. Among these predominantly white electorates, Negroes are chosen as part of "balanced tickets" or for some personal qualifications rather than running as part of a well-oiled machine or on the principle of "race identification. Some recent examples of the emergence of this type of Negro official are Attorney General Edward W. Brooke of Massachusetts,[25] State Treasurer Gerald Lamb of Connecticut (who defeated another Negro for the office), and Supreme Court Justice Otis Smith of Michigan.

In the arena of national politics, Negroes have clearly demonstrated that in certain instances they can be the pivotal "balance of power." In 1948, they helped carry California, Illinois and Ohio for Harry Truman.[26] In 1960, Richard M. Nixon may have actually received a majority among whites, with Kennedy owing his victory to the Negroes.[27] The urban Negro in the North, as Oscar Glantz has demonstrated through correlations of census tracts and voting districts in eight cities, voted very strongly Democratic in 1952 (with Detroit Negroes hitting the peak, casting 89.9% of their ballots for Stevenson) and held fairly well for the Democrats in 1956--although Eisenhower did cut into the northern Negro vote, Stevenson held a good lead among Negroes.[28]

But the most essential fact about Negroes is that they are underregistered and fail to vote even when registered. Robert E. Lane, discussing the entire nation, estimates that in 1952 33% of American Negroes voted compared with 79% of the whites.[29] Even with the South eliminated, there is a substantial difference; the University of Michigan Survey Research figures indicate that 72% of northern whites and 54% of northern Negroes vote with some regularity.[30] The differential appears to be decreasing, however, and a recent estimate suggests that there is now about a ten to fifteen per cent difference consistently, and that 60% of adult Negroes in the North voted in the 1960 election (about 3,000,000 persons).[31]

The 1960 election, in which many Negroes appear to have voted for Kennedy at least partially in response to his actions after the arrest of Martin Luther King, signalled the beginning of a new era in Negro politics--an era of rising sophistication and of impatience, both closely linked to the Negro syndicalism which A. Philip Randolph, Bayard Rustin and others had nurtured and the Greensboro college students had brought into full bloom. The number of Negro officeholders across the country seems to be gradually increasing, with five Negroes now in Congress and pockets of legislative strength--always reflecting segregated housing areas. One Negro newspaper has put it bluntly: "For all the talk about residential integration, Negro political power today is based on residential concentration, and there would be very few Negro officeholders, elected or appointed, if this were not the case."[32] But beyond Negro officeholders, the northern Negro has become more of a "balancing" factor in city and state politics. In 1961, Negro charges of police brutality were important factors in the surprising overturn of incumbent mayors in Los Angeles and Detroit;[33] and Samuel Lubell has suggested that the victories of Mayor Robert

Wagner in New York and Governor Richard Hughes in New Jersey were due to substantial Negro backing.[34] In 1962 , most Negroes stayed Democratic but often split their tickets; liberal Republicans such as Rockefeller, Javits, Scranton, and Romney, and even the relatively conservative Rhodes, cut into the Negro vote in the big industrial states.[35]

But in 1963 the new era of Negro politics received a shock; the fact of the matter was that as evidences of Negro syndicalism moved northward and direct action techniques were applied more and more in northern cities, a reaction built up rapidly among whites. Sympathetic to the "Negro Revolt" as long as it stayed in the South, many northern whites reflected their "separatism" and "privatization" patterns with respect to Negroes in the same city. Negroes grew increasingly bitter as they realized that the demonstrations were not moving the whites, but seemed to be clearly reaffirming the widely-held belief among Negroes that "The white man does not 'know' the Negro, has never known him, and has never seriously undertaken to find out what the Negro is like as a person. . . For most of the history of biracial America the white man has considered the Negro to be a different order of being altogether."[36] A symbolic meeting occurred in late May between Negro leaders and Attorney General Kennedy; the fact that the latter's legalistic and political approach to the problems of Negroes was met with bitter reproaches on the part of Baldwin, Prof. Kenneth Clark and the other Negroes indicated trouble ahead; they were sure that Kennedy utterly failed--and thus represented the failure of white liberalism--to adjust to the new times and failed to comprehend the rising tide of racial conflict in the North.[37]

Two terms came into wide usage in 1963-64, terms which signified the widening gulf: "the white power structure" and "the white back-lash." The former phrase, evidently first popularized by Clark in early 1963, crystallized the resentment of Negroes against white-dominated society, but over-simplified the problem by setting up scapegoats and assuming that a few acts by white leaders could resolve long-standing problems. The latter was more alarming, reflecting as it did the emergence of latent prejudices among many whites with their reaction that Negro efforts were moving "too far, too fast." Louis Harris found the reaction to be so strong that he estimated a loss of four and a half million votes for President Kennedy on the issue.[38]

Practical tests of the "white back-lash" were provided in Kentucky, Philadelphia and Boston in the fall of 1963. One analyst believed that the Kentucky gubernatorial election, in which the usual Democratic margin was cut to 14,724 votes (50.8% of the two-party vote) was so close because "the racial issue influenced at least 50,000 voters either to switch parties or to vote for the first time, and against Democratic racial policies."[39] Philadelphia, a city which like many others in the North is witnessing a rapid growth in the number of Negroes and increasing restlessness over housing and unemployment, had a mayoralty election in which the Democrats clearly suffered from the white reaction. In Boston the woman who was chairman of the School Committee had become a symbol of the resistance of that body to demands that it recognize and correct "de facto segregation;" she was overwhelmingly re-elected.

While the white reaction to Negro demonstrations was becoming evident as a force in American society, it had a counter-part in the ferment within the Negro community. All of the major organizations, to some degree at least, were committed to direct actions--i.e., to some form of syndicalist endeavor. This was least true of the most conservative, the National Urban League, but its participation in the March on Washington indicated its movement into what might be called the "united Negro" approach and a deprecation of factionalism and ferment among the Negro leadership. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People has always stressed political participation by Negroes, but moved more and more into the direct-action arena from 1961 on, impelled in part by "pressure from below" within its membership. The newer organizations, including the Congress of Racial Equality, the Student Non-violent Co-ordinating Committee in the South and its associate the Northern Student Movement, and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference headed by Martin Luther King, were all oriented to direct action, although they differed to some degree among themselves about the efficacy of various tactics, organizational patterns, and other matters. All of the organizations were aware that there were strong currents pulling the masses of urban Negroes--most of them unschooled in non-violence and very badly organized if at all--away from their traditional moorings. These moorings had been accurately described by James Baldwin, at least with respect to Negro goals in voting, as "mainly economic and frequently personal, sometimes pathetic; bread or a new roof or five dollars, or continuing up the scale, schools, houses or more Negroes in hitherto Caucasian jobs."[40] The paradigm of the traditional approach to meet these needs was, of course, Dawson of Chicago; even before the rise of direct action as a basic tactic in the civil rights struggle, Dawson was in gradually increasing difficulty in the Negro community. By 1960, it was evident that new civic and political leadership was slowly emerging in the city, geared to what Wilson aptly calls "status politics."[41] Other cities, such as Detroit and Los Angeles, were even farther along in transition.[42]

Although Mayor Daley was re-elected with Negro votes, he and Dawson suffered severe and rising criticism. When six Negro aldermen associated with the organization opposed the school boycott in February, 1964, the Chicago Defender ran a cartoon attacking them as Uncle Toms" shuffling along in the dirt and their efforts were unsuccessful (172,350 children stayed out of school, with the number of Negroes in the Chicago schools considered to be 236,471).[43]

The continuing controversy within Chicago was evidence of the ferment in which all major northern cities were finding themselves in 1964. There was a growing realization of the fact that neither "Negro syndicalism" with its stress on picketing, protest and pressure nor old-line politics could be sufficient for the northern Negro. A sympathetic liberal summed it up: "The effect of the Northern groups' resolution to be aggressively and spectacularly militant has been that in city after city, from Portland, Oregon to Boston, civil rights campaigns have often tended to obscure of ignore the major problems of the Northern Negro and the causes of his special difficulties. . . The fact remains that real equality depends on his achieving political and economic power."[44] What was needed, and what may be emerging in some of the cities of the North, is "a new breed" of Negro politician-- something very different from Dawson, but also removed from the concentration on individual personalities such as Powell. This would mean an issue-oriented focus, with ideas which cross the whole range of the "culture of poverty" in the cities and call for much greater efforts in education, health care, employment and the whole gamut of the problems of cities, as well as civil rights.[45] Those who know the American Negro community are aware that a new Negro elite is emerging, very clearly distinct from and alien to the traditions of what E. Franklin Frazier called "The Black Bourgeoisie" and keenly aware of politics as a possible avenue to the achievement of their goals; the ultimate shape of the new elite is, however, undefined.[46]

This elite at the present time includes (but is not limited to) Baldwin, Clark, King, Jackie Robinson, and the leaders of CORE, SNCC, the Urban League, and the NAACP. It faces two fundamental questions: although it is sensitive to currents among the urban masses of the North (Whitney Young of the Urban League predicted that there would be trouble in "middle-sized cities" such as Rochester about a month before the riot there),[47] there is serious doubt that it can speak for them; and it faces a strong attack that it is appeasing the whites.

The tactical split among the Negroes is very wide, but the Goldwater candidacy has crystallized it around two poles: one which seeks a judicious "mix" of direct action and political action, with the former getting something of a moratorium and the latter great emphasis in the fall of 1964, and one which seeks mass militancy and stresses direct action while not ignoring political action. To some degree, the most militant of the Negro organizations fall completely outside the traditional American framework. Obviously, the Black Muslims fit this category. Since his break with Elijah Muhammed and the Black Muslims, Malcolm X has emerged as a figure who rejects totally the values of the American system but offers to build bridges to the groups striving for civil rights and provides an example of militancy and agitation.[48]

Perhaps the most relevant example of the "Negro syndicalism" which stresses continued militancy and direct action is ACT, formed on March 14, 1964 in troubled Chester, Pennsylvania. Without the Islamic ideology of Malcolm X and still inchoate in its philosophy, ACT is as syndicalist in nature as the Industrial Workers of the World, except that it does not reject politics as an avenue of problem-solving. One of its leaders, Stanley E. Branche of Chester, has indicated its political approach: "We are more interested in who is elected sheriff than who becomes president."[49] On another occasion, he predicted about Chester that "this mayor, this city council, this power structure, they're on the way out. In the next four years, we're going to have a black mayor in this town."[50]

Among others in ACT are: Laurence Landry, its president and the organizer of the Chicago school boycotts; Rev. Milton Galamison of Brooklin, a leader of the boycott in New York who has said that he prefers having the public school destroyed to having de facto segregation remain;[51] Jesse Gray, the rent-strike leader in Harlem who also played a role (or at least was blamed by the press and the police for doing so) in the background of the July riots, and Mrs. Gloria Richardson of Cambridge, Maryland.

The ACT point of view was summed up by one of its members, speaking of Chicago: "We are going to mess up this town until they treat us right. You have to disrupt this system. . ."[52] Like the IWW and all syndicalists, ACT works toward the general strike or its equivalent (Baldwin, who may be classified as close to ACT in some intellectual respects, has suggested that Negroes could disrupt the American economy by simply staying away from work); in the case of Negro syndicalism, however, the equivalent is unremitting warfare on the "white power structure"--sometimes peaceful warfare but if necessary violence will be used--and upon all manifestations of a white society which deprive the Negro of his rightful place. The "stall-in" and related aspects of the demonstrations at the opening of the New York World's Fair exemplified this approach. To complete the Sorelian system and adapt it to the 1960's, we may expect a Negro theorist to come forward with a theory of race as revolutionary social class, put within the American context. In line with this, a new group called RAM (Revolutionary Action Movement) has described itself as "revolutionary black nationalists (who) must act as a vanguard to show our people how to seize power so that they may gain sone control over their lives."[53]

Implicit in the principles of ACT and similar groups like the Black Nationalists, as well as the Black Muslims, is a rejection of the whole classical political theory of liberalism. In the realm of political action, the development of a "Freedom Now Party," which calls for a "mass awakening of the Negro people," is an indication of some dissatisfaction with traditional approaches.[54] It may be expected that this type of approach--independent political action, with even a third party in some areas--will receive some attention from the Negro militants during the next few years.

The predominant point of view among Negro leaders, however, still rejects both third-party action and the theme of unremitting and total militancy which I have styled Negro syndicalism. Militants who are not pure-blown syndicalists in any Sorelian sense, but rather follow the tactic of stressing registration, Negro education, and work with white liberals as well as agitation and direct action, form the mainstream of Negro leadership at the present time. This group, concerned over the nomination of Senator Goldwater, now faces the tactical question that demonstrations and other activities by Negroes and Negro-sympathizers may strengthen Goldwater's hand with a significant segment of the electorate. This concern led to the so-called "summit meeting" of July 29 when Negro leaders from several organizations sought a moratorium on demonstrations until after the November election.

In a sense, the Negro of the 1960's is at about the same place that organized labor was in the mid-1930's when the CIO challenge to the A.F. of L. was developing. Although the analogy may be too rough, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People is now somewhat comparable to the American Federation of Labor circa 1935.

The political philosophy of the NAACP is quite simple; as recently expressed by Roy Wilkins, its Executive Secretary: "a numerical minority must have allies if it is to succeed. ."[55] This means that the organization stresses registration and voting, the classical "balance of power" theme and advocates "elect your friends, defeat your enemies" like Samuel Gompers.

The rise of "Negro syndicalism," however, has brought about much the same reaction as the CIO encountered. The fact is that many whites see the whole fabric of American values threatened by Negro militancy; they usually grasp this very dimly, but when it applies to them on a personal or nearly-personal basis they give expression to this belief in one way or another. Just as the great American middle class felt that "sit-down" strikes, mass picketing and other activities of the CIO really undermined American values, so numerous white Americans react to Negro militancy. If anything, the reaction of the 1960's is more venomous; the theory of America as a white civilization has not been as explicitly expressed as the theory of America as a business civilization, but is probably even more basic to the thinking of the great mass of white Americans. The signs of resistance among whites in the North, especially among working-class whites of recent immigrant stock, were abundant in 1963 and 1964. For instance, Congressman John Lesinski of Detroit, who stood alone among urban Northern Democrats in voting against the Civil Rights bill, received a strongly favorable mail response from his working-class district.[56] More important was the support given to Governor George Wallace in the presidential primaries in Wisconsin, Indiana and Maryland.

In all three states--as in Philadelphia and Kentucky in the fall of 1963--local issues divorced from civil rights played a role. Both Governor John W. Reynolds of Wisconsin and Governor Matthew Welch of Indiana had signed tax bills and other measures which were controversial; since both were "stand-in" candidates in their states substituting for President Johnson, part of the Wallace vote was directed at them. In Maryland, some of the dissatisfaction directed at Governor Millard Tawes went to the Johnson "stand-in" in the Free State, Senator Daniel Brewster. The first of the primaries, Wisconsin, shocked many observers, since Wallace got 261,148 votes compared to Reynolds' 508,597. It was evident that many Republicans had "crossed over" to support Wallace, although perhaps as many or more voted for Reynolds; Congressman John W. Byrnes, the only man running in the Republican primary, polled 294,724 votes, well below the Republican potential. One reporter said that what began as "a ho-hum primary" became "a political re-run of the Civil War" in which "Wallace far outdid the most optimistic dreams of his backers or the most pessimistic estimates of his opponents in a state with relatively few Negroes, few Southerners and a presumably liberal history."[57] In Wisconsin as in the two later primaries, Wallace stressed the dangers of expanded federal government rather than civil rights.

The Wisconsin primary provided a significant test of the reaction of Catholics, predominantly of German, Polish, Italian and Slavic descent in this case, to the issues raised by school boycotts, open-occupancy laws, and other facets of the civil rights issue. The official diocesan newspapers in the state, such as the Catholic Herald-Citizen, carried editorials and articles critical of the Alabama governor, saying that "Moral evil is invading Wisconsin," with Wallace being "publicly known for promoting that type of racism which has been specifically condemned by Pope Pius XI."[58] The Milwaukee Journal, in attacking Wallace, cited an interview he was said to have given to a London Times reporter during which he had said that the South was stable because of its Anglo-Saxon heritage while the North was dominated by 'Poles, Italians, Germans and other lesser breeds.'[59] Wallace denied that he had made any such remark, and was at one point greeted by some of his supporters with the singing of "Dixie" in Polish.[60]

The strong Wallace showing in Wisconsin came from several sources: old centers of McCarthy support; various Democratic ethnic groups, perhaps especially Polish and Serbian, in Milwaukee and other cities; and suburbs such as Wauwatosa, River Hills Village, Brown Deer and Whitefish Bay. In the new Ninth Congressional District, encompassing Waukesha County and other Milwaukee suburbs considered to be strongly in the hands of the G.O.P., Wallace received 34.4% of the total vote. But it should also be noted that the resistance to the demands of the Negroes was evident among their immediate neighbors; in the Fifth District, which contains 70% of the state's Negroes, the Alabama Governor secured 30.2% of the total vote.

Immediately after the primary, a Maryland Democrat, Blair Lee III, warned that Wallace would do even better in his state "unless civil rights people themselves refrain from demonstrations."[61] In Indiana, Governor Welsh spoke of Governor Wallace as "a skunk," "a mortal enemy of President Kennedy," and a "man whose beliefs were responsible for the deaths of innocent children in the bombing of a Sunday School class."[62] As in Wisconsin, Wallace appealed to socio-economic conservatism, attacking the Civil Rights bill on the ground that it would "destroy every single neighborhood school in America."[63] A poll by Louis Harris indicated that Wallace would take 28% of the Democratic vote, but about two out of three of those voting for him would have been for Johnson is he rather than Welch were on the ballot.[64]

Wallace got 29.8% of the Democratic vote, and carried two counties--Lake and neighboring Porter. Lake County, which includes Gary, was especially significant, since it is estimated to be 45% Negro and Wallace easily swept all-white areas. Wallace had become a symbol; and Slavic, Italian and other ethnic groups voted for him in startling numbers. The Lake County Democratic Chairman noted that the "Wallace effect" did not carry down the ballot; a candidate who agreed with Wallace and ran on his coattails obtained only 10,340 votes in the county compared to the Governor's 41,629.[65]

Two weeks later in Maryland, Wallace almost achieved victory in Maryland, capturing 16 of 23 counties and almost defeating Senator Brewster. Brewster managed to stave off the Wallace thrust by carrying the Washington suburbs and by scoring heavily among the Jews and Negroes in Baltimore (in seventeen Negro precincts in Baltimore, Wallace got not a single vote). The CBS vote-profile analysis indicated that the Alabama Governor had a slight edge in the total white vote.[66] But again, others among the candidates who shared Wallace's position did not run well.

Through the spring and summer of 1964, other indications of strong feeling against Negro militancy were abundant. It may well have contributed to Senator Goldwater's victory in California; one writer noted that Negro districts voted for Governor Rockefeller, but numerous whites reacted to his advocacy of civil rights and tipped the balance to Goldwater.[67] The main issue in California in 1964 may well turn out to be the referendum to amend the state constitution so that the Rumford Fair Housing Act will be nullified. The California Poll indicated that 58% of the voters oppose the Rumford Act, and the signatures to obtain the repeal referendum rolled in quickly.[68]

Advocates of civil rights have begun to view the referendum process with some alarm. In addition to California, Maryland will also have a referendum this fall to repeal a legislative act--in this case, a public accomodations law. Of six referenda held to date in 1964, two (in Kansas City and St. Joseph, Missouri) have upheld public accomodation ordinances; three fair housing ordinances have lost--in Berkeley, California, Seattle and Tacoma, Washington; and in Cambridge, Maryland, with a Negro boycott of the vote led by Mrs. Richardson, a public accomodations ordinance lost 1,994 to 1,720. While the vote in Berkeley was close, fair housing lost in Seattle by two to one and in Tacoma by three to one.[69]

Illinois and Ohio political leaders were afraid of the substantial reaction to Negro activities in their states. In Illinois, the Property Owners Co-ordinating Committee secured over 550,000 signatures to obtain a referendum on the fair housing law. Negroes reacted bitterly, with Edwin C. Berry of the Urban League saying "If we had to put the Bill of Rights on a ballot, I'd be fearful we couldn't get it through," and Federal Judge James B. Parsons, a Negro, predicting that anti-Negro sentiment in the state was so strong that some candidates could be defeated on the issue.[70]

In Ohio, a strong segregationist, Richard Kennedy, got 35.1% of the vote in his race for Congressman-at-large in the Democratic primary (he died on the following day). On the Republican side, Governor James B. Rhodes was reported to have told Governor Scranton that he decided that the Ohio delegation to the national convention should turn to Goldwater because Cleveland and Youngstown would vote for the Arizona Senator in November.[71]

Thus there are ample indications of the effects of the "white back-lash" upon politics in the United States in 1964. The fundamental problem is summed up by Charles E. Silberman. After tracing the tremendously rapid growth of the Negro population in Northern cities, he says: ". . . the most serious social problem today is to be found in the heart of the big cities that are the nation's ornaments. . . and so the North is finally beginning to face the reality of race. In the process, it is discovering animosities and prejudices that had been hidden in the recesses of the soul."[72]

The "animosities and prejudices" which cropped out are undoubtedly due to the strong faith of white Americans in the values they cherish--property, stability, opportunity, material possessions, a home where hope and optimism prevail, and the neighborhood school. Thus the reaction to civil rights agitation is quite predictable, and it is understandable that the Republican platform pledges itself to the retention of the neighborhood school and Senator Goldwater decries "lawlessness in the cities." To quote Silberman again:[73]

> "Myrdal was wrong. The tragedy of race relations in the United States is that there is no American Dilemma. White Americans are not torn and tortured by the conflict between their devotion to the American creed and their actual behavior. They are upset by the current state of race relations, to be sure. But what troubles them is not that justice is being denied but that their peace is being shattered and their business interrupted."

Although many white liberals continue to rely upon the traditions of reason and compromise,[74] there seems to be an intensified squabble in the Negro leadership. The problem of "which way the Negro leadership?" is an important one for all Americans, given the growth of Negro population in the Northern cities. As Joseph P. Lyford has said ". . . the possibility exists that the large cities may take on the political coloration of the race as well as of an economic group. The prospect of political confrontations between black cities and white towns and suburbs is not promising for our country, especially when one considers the animosities that already exist between city and 'up-State' even without the 'poor versus rich' or 'black versus white' identification."[75]

What is the state of these two "backlashes"--the white and the black--which are dividing Americans in 1964? A discussion of events and opinion in one northern city--Boston--cannot fully measure the impact of either in all the cities of America, but can provide certain indications. Boston has a smaller Negro population than most comparable cities, and had a relative lack of conflict until 1963. But the Boston School Committee election showed that a wide chasm had opened.

An analysis of the vote, including a survey done during and immediately following the election, shows a number of very clear results:

1. About 17,000 of the 309,000 registered voters (5.5%) were Negroes. Approximately 40,000 Negroes were probably eligible to vote; this is based on the calculation that in 1960, Negroes numbered 63,165 in the city's population of 697,938 (9.1%), and that about 15,000 Negroes have arrived in the city since the 1960 census. The Negro is still "under-registered" in Boston--as in most Northern cities.

2. Negroes numbered a majority of the population in 24 of the city's 275 precincts in 1960. A 1963 estimate would place this at 26 in terms of registered voters (not population). In fourteen precincts, the voters are one-third to one-half Negro, in ten about one-sixth to one-third Negro. These fifty precincts contained 95% of the registered Negroes in Boston in 1963.

3. One candidate was a Negro, Melvin H. King; he ran seventh. But the greater the concentration of Negroes, he better he ran (as a rule); Mrs. Louise Day Hicks, the School Committee chairman who had led the opposition to the NAACP demands, ran poorly in the most heavily Negro precincts.

4. In predominantly white precincts adjacent to the Negro "ghetto" support for Mrs. Hicks was almost exactly in inverse proportion to the number of Negroes. This was her strongest area.

5. The depth of intensity of feeling against the Negro across the city was evident. The main concentrations were found in three ethno-economic groups, in almost equal proportions.

a. The lower-middle income group of Irish descent. Typical was Ward 16 in Dorchester, in which Mrs. Hicks ran five-to-one over King. A poll in this area indicated that the residents had followed the issues and knew the stands of the candidates better than low-income groups.

b. Low-income voters, primarily of Italian descent and to a lesser extent of other Southern and Eastern European backgrounds. These were only vaguely aware of issues, but Mrs. Hicks had a strong symbolism for them.

c. Those of Irish descent and low income could not identify King, but many knew the name of Mrs. Hicks.

To measure the continuing conflict and its impact in 1964, a poll was devised and executed in the spring and summer of this year. Only a summary of the main points can be given in this paper, since the poll is not entirely complete as of the time of writing. Three samples were drawn up: 60 Negroes, of whom 46 were located and interviewed; 120 whites in the city; and 200 whites from twelve surrounding cities and towns. As of August 10, about three-fourths of the last two samples had either been interviewed, had refused, or were unavailable for interviews. Each of the three samples was drawn up on the basis of seven variables: age, sex, occupation, party affiliation as recorded, ethnic background (judged largely by name), length of residence in the Boston area, and type of housing predominant in the selected area.[76]

The key questions on the poll for Sample #1, the Negroes, were as follows:

If the election were held today, how would you vote for President?

How did you vote in 1960?

What would you say are the two most important problems of the Negro in Boston?

Please give me your opinion--favorable, unfavorable, or no opinion--of the individuals and organizations included on this card (the list included national and local civil rights leaders and organizations).

Have demonstrations such as the school boycott helped or hurt the Negro in Boston? How?

The main problem encountered in administering the survey was some failure to respond to white interviewers, while Negroes got a better reception.[77] The results clearly indicated:

1. A stronger percentage of the vote for Johnson than for Kennedy in 1960. Of those interviewed (all of those selected were registered to vote), 36 were for Johnson, 2 for Goldwater, 8 were either undecided or would not vote.

2. The two main problems were employment and housing; frustrations associated with the cost of living ran third.

3. It was clear that there is a rising tide of feeling about discrimination, with most respondents being more aware than they were a few years ago.

4. Most of the organizations were known only vaguely. The NAACP and to a much less extent CORE were viewed favorably, but all others scored higher on "no opinion" and "unknown" than on "favorable" and "unfavorable" combined.

5. Only one individual, Martin Luther King, was known by name to a majority. Five others, three local figures and two national, were identified by about a third of the respondents.

6. While the majority of respondents were not really militant about civil rights, they felt that boycotts and other demonstrations were good and could not understand why there should be strong white reactions to them.

Certain responses to questions about civil rights formed a definite pattern of socio-economic relationships among Negroes:

1. Negroes in younger age groups, especially females, have little knowledge about these questions but often feel strongly.

2. Low-income, unskilled males are quite apathetic about civil rights questions, but feel strong hostility toward white men, and are cynical about participation by Negroes in political affairs.

3. The level of schooling is an important factor in civil rights interest, knowledge and activity; those with an eighth grade education, especially females, are far more involved than those below that level.

The second sample, composed of whites from ten different sections of the city, provided less homogeneity than Negroes in their responses.

Among the questions addressed to this group (and also to the third, or suburban, sample) were:

If the election were held today, how would you vote for President?

What do you like most and least about Johnson? Most and least about Goldwater?

How did you vote for President in 1960?

Do you feel that discrimination against Negroes exists in Boston?

Some people criticize the use of demonstrations on civil rights--school boycotts, sit-ins, picketing, etc. How do you feel about this?

Have you thought about issues relating to civil rights, demonstrations, and the relationship between Negroes and whites as they affect your political ideas? For instance, do you feel strongly enough about these issues so that they might make a difference in how you vote for President?

How would you feel, and how strongly, if:

a. A Negro moved into this block?
b. A Negro was hired to work with you?
c. A third or more of the children in your child's school were colored?
d. A Negro was hired to teach your children?

With respect to whites in the city of Boston, the tentative findings can be summed up as follows:

1. The Democratic margin in the city is still substantial although cut from 1960 (when John F. Kennedy of Boston was the presidential candidate). 72% of the sample were for Kennedy in 1960. As of August 10, 56% were for Johnson, 32% for Goldwater, 12% undecided.

2. The main effect of the reaction to civil rights and of general antagonism to Negroes was to ensure that 1960 votes for Nixon would go to Goldwater, rather than bringing "switches" from the Democrats.

3. There is resistance to some degree among all white elements in the city to Negro demands. The greatest resentment, felt by those most clearly undecided or "in conflict" about their vote, comes from normally strongly Democratic persons of Italian and Irish descent, especially from females. Most of these knew little about Goldwater, disliked him and the Republicans in general, but also felt some resentment against Johnson--mostly on issues relating to civil rights. Rarely, however, did they see Goldwater as a symbol of resistance to the advancing Negro.

The suburban sample appeared to show slightly different overall results. Johnson ran about even with Kennedy in these suburbs, primarily because of what was clearly "liberal Republican" feeling; the vote split 59% to 41% for Kennedy in 1960, while in 1964 those contacted were 52% to 35% for Johnson, with 13% undecided, or in a few cases declaring they would not vote. About a third of what might be called the Kennedy-Goldwater voters seemed to be affected by civil right agitation, riots (some of the interviewing was done during and soon after the Harlem and other riots), etc. In general, the suburban picture is much more complex ~~and probably~~ than the city picture.

To summarize the views presented in this paper, a widening chasm exists between the American Negro and the American white, with each firmly convinced that his position is soundly grounded in the basic values of our society.[78] As Negro militancy rises, it meets increasing white resistance which may turn into an awesome political force. But Negro syndicalism may well, in the not too distant future, yield to a more sophisticated political approach; such an approach would lead toward the day when the urban Negro under a new generation of leadership plays his part in developing more responsive government for the urbanized society. The next few years may see the emergence of what Mentoff calls "a powerful neo-Populist alliance."[79]

America has embarked upon a fearsome venture--the venture of great urban areas becoming more heavily Negro year by year. But it has undertaken new ventures before, some of them replete with direct-action overtones; during the last great direct-action movement, one participant wrote of the new industrial unions:[80]

> (Industrial unions) can be likened to nothing so much as the settlement of a new territory. It was always a few pioneers who ventured into a new country. . . Following came the less courageous to share in the benefits. Today the unions, with strikes and arbitration as their weapons, are fighting to make their surroundings habitable; and they too, like the pioneers are sharing their gains with the less courageous. The strikers are, in reality, the peioneers of social exploration, taking the only path of progress open to man--the overcoming of poverty and social inequality.

In many respects, as has been frequently pointed out, the frontier of the United States today is in the city. The question is whether or not our values have become so solidified that the urban frontier will be a failure--a failure which would doom the Northern (and certainly therefore the Southern) Negro to poverty, frustration, increased bitterness, and redoubled violence--or whether the Negro can become the foundation-stone for a new venture of "pioneering in social exploration".

The U. S. Commission on Civil Rights

The U. S. Commission on Civil Rights is an independent, bipartisan agency established by Congress under the 1957 Civil Rights Act and authorized by the Civil Rights Acts of 1957, 1960, and 1964 to:

Voting

. . . Investigate complaints alleging that citizens are being deprived of their right to vote by reason of their race, color, religion or national origin.

. . . Investigate allegations of vote fraud.

Equal Protection of the Laws

. . . Collect and study information concerning legal developments constituting a denial of equal protection of the laws under the Constitution.

Clearinghouse

. . . Serve as a national clearinghouse for civil rights information.

Reports

. . . Submit reports of its activities, findings and recommendations to the President and the Congress.

The Commission is not an enforcement agency and has no power to provide specific remedies in individual cases. It refers complaints of denials of rights to the appropriate Federal administrative agency for corrective action.

Six Commissioners, appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, determine policy for the agency. A Staff Director, also a Presidential appointee, supervises the professional and clerical staff of more than 100.

The Commission's field offices in Memphis, Tennessee and Chicago, Illinois, aid the agency in all of its programs.

STAFF ORGANIZATION

Commission programs are implemented through four major staff divisions. The Federal Programs Division evaluates Federal civil rights policies and their implementation and serves as liaison with other Federal agencies on civil rights matters. The Field Services Division directs field activities for the agency and is responsible for the coordination of field offices and the supervision of the 51 State Advisory Committees. The Research Division maintains a library of civil rights materials and develops short term as well as more extensive research projects. The Office of the General Counsel handles the agency's legal work and directs its voting projects. Complaints alleging denials of equal protection of the laws should be forwarded to the Office of the General Counsel.

The Commission also includes an Office of the Staff Director, an Office of Business Administration, and an Information Office which maintains liaison with news media, public and private groups, and the general public and, edits Commission publications.

PUBLIC HEARINGS

The Commission travels throughout the nation for fact-finding hearings relating to civil rights problems. Such hearings have been held in Jackson, Mississippi; Montgomery, Alabama; New Orleans, Louisiana; Atlanta, Georgia; Chicago, Illinois; Washington, D. C.; Los Angeles and San Francisco, California; Detroit, Michigan; Phoenix, Arizona; Newark, New Jersey; New York, New York; and Indianapolis, Indiana. Hearing rules safeguard the rights of every individual who appears before the Commission. Using the subpena power granted by Congress, the Commission seeks facts from local officials and other citizens representing diverse interests and points of view. The Civil Rights Act of 1960 and 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965 and some presidential executive orders reflect findings and recommendations resulting from Commission hearings and studies.

REPORTS

Major investigations and research projects have been conducted by the Commission staff relating to the denial of equal protection of the laws in voting, education, employment, housing and the administration of justice. Published Commission studies also deal with differences in the opportunities available to Negroes and whites in the armed forces and in programs of the Departments of Agriculture; Health, Education and Welfare; Labor and other Federal agencies.

CONFERENCES

The Commission sponsors national, regional and state conferences as part of its fact-gathering function and as a method of disseminating information to specialized audiences. These conferences bring together Federal, State and local officials, representatives of business, labor and civil rights groups, and community leaders to consider school desegregation, employment, equal housing opportunities, the 1964 Civil Rights Act, and other civil rights matters.

STATE ADVISORY COMMITTEES

More than 600 citizens from every state and the District of Columbia who are familiar with state and local civil rights problems serve without compensation on the 51 Advisory Committees to the Commission. These committees constitute a unique resource for securing information based on the experience and insight of persons with first-hand knowledge of problems in every part of the country. The committees also disseminate information on Federal law and policies.

The Commission often publishes reports prepared by the State Advisory Committees.

CLEARINGHOUSE

The Commission is a national clearinghouse for information relating to denials of Federal rights because of race, color, religion or national origin, including—but not limited to—the fields of voting, education, housing, employment, the use of public facilities and transportation and the administration of justice.

Under the clearinghouse function assigned by the 1964 Civil Rights Act, the Commission collects, publishes and disseminates information to promote a better understanding of constitutional and statutory requirements relating to civil rights. Commission conferences and staff consultations help Federal, State and local governments as well as private institutions and individuals develop techniques for dealing with specific problems in the civil rights field.

PUBLICATIONS

A complete listing of Commission publications—statutory reports, interim reports, staff reports, state advisory committee reports, and transcripts of hearings and conferences—can be obtained by writing the Information Office of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights. Most of the agency's published works are available in depository libraries throughout the country.

THE GREAT QUESTION

A GUIDE FOR COMMUNITY ACTION

DESIGNED BY SAUL BASS

CIVIL RIGHTS and UNION RIGHTS

They go together

Mr. Mitchell: The following statement represents the position of Mr. Roy Wilkins, executive director of the NAACP; Mr. A. Philip Randolph, president of the American Negro Labor Council; the Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr., president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference; and Mr. James Farmer, national director of the Congress of Racial Equality.

We support H.R. 77 and urge swift action to repeal Section 14(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended.

The simple truth is that the slogan "Right to Work" is nothing more than the old phrase "open shop" which the powerful industrialists of America used in the early days of the 20th century to prevent trade union organization. At that time the open shop was the ideological weapon which was used to justify violence and terror in the attack against trade unionism, and which for a period resulted in a kind of industrial barbarism associated with the tragic names of Ludlow, Colo.; Homestead, Pa.; Harlan County, Ky.; and the infamous 1938 Memorial Day massacre of steelworkers in Chicago when Negro citizens as well as white workers lost their lives. The issue then was the right of unions to exist and function in American society and the right of workers to secure collective-bargaining agents of their own choosing.

Much time has passed. Trade unionism is now an established institution in American life, but there is still a sizable group of recalcitrant employers who persist in their efforts to destroy unionism or to make it entirely ineffective. They refurbished the old discredited "open shop" concept and, employing the techniques of Madison Avenue hucksters, are now selling the new slogan "Right To Work."

Do these laws provide American workers with any guarantee of employment? They do not. Do any of these right-to-work laws embody a code of fair employment practices? They do not. Do these laws attempt to determine fair wages, provide decent hours of labor or other terms and conditions of employment? They do not. Do they provide for equitable distribution of work or guarantee that layoffs shall be in inverse order of seniority? They do not. Do they provide for vacations with pay, disability benefits, and retirement pensions? They do not.

What, then, do they do? In their commonest form they prohibit any kind of union security. They make it impossible for a labor-management agreement to provide for any form of union security.

The need to develop a firm and secure economic base within the Negro community is of the greatest importance, not for Negroes alone but for the stability and order of the American community. The growing disparity in economic status between Negro and white workers and the vulnerability of colored wage earners to long-term economic distress are clearly indicated by the cruel facts on unemployment and economic distribution. We believe that Negro workers, as do other Americans, need a strong, vigorous, and democratic labor movement.

On the other hand, we have worked with the leaders of the AFL-CIO and its civil rights department, and with the leaders of many affiliated unions of the AFL-CIO, on civil rights matters. They have marched with us in Washington, D. C., and in Montgomery, Ala. They fought valiantly for what is now Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964; and we freely acknowledge that without their help that Title would not have been included in the law.

We know after many long years of experience that so-called right-to-work laws do not give Negro workers the right to work. These laws are of no value in ending discrimination. We shall proceed, as we have in the past, in our efforts to eliminate discrimination by some employers and by certain labor unions, but we also wish to assist in helping to build a truly democratic American labor movement that is based upon the principles of racial and economic justice.

The NAACP welcomes the support of organized labor in the battle for full civil rights for all American citizens and is proud of its long years of cooperation with trade union organizations. We join with them in urging the repeal of Section 14(b) of the National Labor Relations Act because we believe that such action is in the best interests of all wage earners as well as in the interest of our country.

Rep. Glenn Andrews, who asked the following question is a Goldwater Republican from Alabama with a consistent record of opposing all civil rights legislation. His district includes Selma. Thus the "mutual astonishment" of Mitchell at Andrews' sudden concern for Negro rights.

Mr. Andrews: Mr. Mitchell, I am frankly astonished that you, Dr. King, Mr. Randolph, and a group of your young people should be committed to the repeal of 14(b).

Mr. Mitchell: I do not know whether I could answer your question in a word but if you would indulge me to preface my reply by saying that our astonishment is mutual, I am equally astonished that you are defending the right of the colored people and I am happy that you are in that position, Mr. Andrews, and because we need all the help we can get.

I would say that I fear you have misunderstood the history of the American labor movement in relation to the colored people. This organization, the AFL-CIO and the constituent unions represent people who have worked with us for desegregation of public schools. They have assisted us in passage of the 1964 Civil Rights Act which has brought desegregation to the Senate of Alabama and they have helped us in trying to improve working conditions.

I would say that we are allies. We have not had from the employers as an organized group the kind of assistance in making America a better place for colored and white people as well as everyone else that we have had from organized labor groups.

Now I would say if anybody has a bona fide amendment or language which has a true purpose of correcting discrimination and which is really going to do the job, of course, all of us support it.

I am past the stage in my life when I am deceived by things that are done up in pretty ribbons and fancy paper because all too often when we open the box there is nothing inside.

WE IN THE AFL-CIO have always contended that union rights and civil rights go hand in hand.

For 20 years the backers of so-called "right-to-work" laws have been peddling the false notion that wiping out the union shop would increase job openings for Negroes.

This has been very selective peddling. They didn't (and still don't) use the argument among white southerners, whose votes put most of the present "right-to-work" laws on the books. (There is still a South Carolina statute forbidding integrated work forces in textile mills.)

But they did and still do peddle this poison among Negroes and other minorities, despite the fact that practically all racial discrimination, past or present, has been originated and enforced by employers. And practically all anti-discrimination provisions, by law or by contract, have been originated by unions.

As Clarence Mitchell, speaking for four major civil rights organizations—the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the American Negro Labor Council, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference and the Congress of Racial Equality—makes clear in these pages, civil rights and union rights go hand in hand.

LABOR AND CIVIL LIBERTIES

by Harry Fleischman

Organized labor learned the need for civil liberties the hard way. As early as 1806, when Philadelphia shoemakers went on strike, they were brought on trial and found guilty for forming "a combination and conspiracy to raise their wages." In 1894, in the Pullman strike, a labor injunction—called by union leader Eugene Debs a "Gatling gun on paper"—helped crush the strike and smash the American Railway Union. Lockouts, blacklists, yellow-dog contracts, labor spies to undermine and betray unions and the use of troops and deputized thugs to terrorize workers and organizers were all part of the employer arsenal in the past.

Even today, as the last AFL-CIO convention pointed out, "freedom of speech, assembly, association and solicitation of membership for union organizers and factory workers are virtually non-existent in the rural South and all efforts to exercise these rights have been and are being frustrated, despite the guarantees of the Constitution." In 1961, two organizers of the American Federation of Hosiery Workers were brutally beaten by hoodlums in Ellijay, Georgia, and then arrested for "fighting, disorderly conduct, inciting a riot and soliciting membership without a license." A union organizer was beaten and kidnaped by a mob in Franklinton, North Carolina, while the city police and the county sheriff turned their backs. When two organizers of the Textile Workers Union of America were knifed in Fitzgerald, Georgia, police blandly wrote this incident off with a report that they got into a fight and knifed each other.

The right to dissent, to hold unpopular views, to try to convince others and change existing practices by peaceful and lawful means is the very cornerstone of American liberty, laid down 40 years before the Declaration of Independence in the celebrated trial of Peter Zenger.

Zenger, an obscure German immigrant, was thrown into jail for printing in his small newspaper, the New York Weekly World, articles criticizing the governor of the colony. To his defense came 80-year-old Andrew Hamilton, one of the most prominent attorneys in the colonies, who traveled from Philadelphia to deliver his eloquent and successful plea to the jury. It was not just the cause of a poor printer he was defending, Hamilton explained, but the cause of human liberty—"the liberty both of exposing and opposing arbitrary power . . . by speaking and writing the truth."

Yet while every AFL-CIO convention has unanimously passed tough resolutions in defense of civil liberties, there are grounds for believing there is a gap between the positions taken at conventions and the views of rank and file unionists.

Back in 1954 the Fund for the Republic polled 5,000 rank and file Americans and 1,500 community leaders on their attitudes on communists and civil liberties. The survey's results were included in a fact-packed book, "Communists, Conformity and Civil Liberties," by Harvard Professor Samuel A. Stouffer. It included data on 1,500 rank and file unionists and local union leaders.

The next year a group of union education directors conducted polls of local union leaders at 14 union leadership training institutes. Questionnaires were filled out, without any discussion, by 647 union shop stewards, committeemen, local union presidents and other union leaders. Since then, similar polls have been conducted at union institutes, several as late as 1962, polling some 600 local union leaders at nine institutes.

The remarkable thing about all these polls was that the percentage varied only slightly.

HARRY FLEISCHMAN stresses civil liberties and civil rights in a column he writes as director of the National Labor Service, American Jewish Committee. He is co-author of the AFL-CIO booklet, "Security, Civil Liberties and Unions."

What were the results? True, the local union leaders scored high on their devotion to equal treatment of all, regardless of race, religion or national origin. More than nine out of ten insisted that unions should enforce equal opportunity in respect to apprenticeship training and job promotions. But they displayed considerably less enthusiasm for the traditional American principles embodied in the Bill of Rights. Their tolerance of people whose ideas and opinions differed from their own was lukewarm at best.

What is meant by "tolerance?" It does not necessarily mean approval. Tolerance means that, even if we disagree with other people's opinions, we uphold the civil liberties extended to them by the Constitution and the laws of the United States.

President George Meany of the AFL-CIO has stressed that "everyone devoted to democracy and human dignity must draw a sharp line of distinction between the democratic socialists and the totalitarian communists. One need not accept the doctrines of democratic socialism to realize that its adherents are true democrats who are uncompromising enemies of communism and all other forms of dictatorship. As a matter of fact, democratic socialists have often shared with free trade unionists the honor of being the first and main target of communist hostility, abuse, persecution and liquidation." And yet two out of five local trade union leaders would keep a socialist from teaching and one out of five would expel a socialist from his local union.

Although the Bill of Rights declares that Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, more than half of our local union leaders would deny an atheist the right to teach and one out of four would keep him out of the local union.

As to communists, four-fifths of local union leaders would prevent them from teaching. Two out of three would strip American-born communists of their American citizenship.

Interestingly, less than half of the local union leaders would jail admitted communists. Apparently they feel that loss of citizenship is a smaller penalty than a jail sentence. Moreover, while five out of six would fire a communist working in a defense plant, more than half feel that communists should be allowed to work in non-defense jobs such as clerking in a store.

During the McCarthy period, labor was fearful of the witchhunts which spread throughout the land. While labor has hailed such investigations as the LaFollette probe into labor spying, AFL-CIO spokesmen have criticized "loosely-conducted congressional investigations where unfounded accusations and unproved charges had the effect of character assassination of good, loyal Americans." These inquiries were criticized as wandering from any proper legislative purpose into attempts "to enforce uniformity of opinions and to stifle the traditional American right to dissent." Yet two-thirds of local union leaders polled insisted that Congress should investigate political beliefs and associations in order to determine whether they are "un-American."

While the local union leader may not rise to the defense of an abstract principle of freedom, he tends to identify with individual victims and to respond far more affirmatively to redress specific violations of civil liberties. Thus although a majority supported security tests in other than sensitive posts, nine out of ten local union leaders supported the right of those accused as security risks under federal security programs to confront and cross-examine their accusers. Perhaps the strong support for this position comes from labor's vigorous activity against abuses in the various government security programs, as well as from the publicity some cases have received in the nation's press and on TV. Among cases enlisting their sympathy were the following:

- One "risk" was accused of "leftwing talk." What he had actually said was: "I would rather be a second-class citizen in Mississippi than a first-class citizen in Russia."
- Another man was accused of teaching languages to "persons of the Russian embassy and Russian soldiers." He had taught Russian to U.S. Army and Navy officers during World War II.
- A Negro worker defending himself against "security" charges was asked whether he favored "the mixing of Negroes and whites."
- Another worker was asked if he had dated Japanese girls during the Korean War.

When former Republican Senator Harry Cain was Chairman of the Subversive Activities Control Board, he charged that the incompetence of many government security officers was at least as dangerous as conscious sabotage. Among the derogatory information they placed against American citizens, some of it in formal charges, according to the Providence Journal Bulletin, were:

- Testimony by a neighbor who said he saw the subject on several occasions walking around his own home without clothes on.
- Statements that blood in blood banks should not be segregated by race.
- Evidence of contributions to the United Jewish Appeal.

Other stupidities of security officers included the suspension of a bachelor for "having a communist wife." A defense plant engineer was suspended because the security officer charged that he and his wife teamed up to make streetcorner communist speeches in 1939—when the husband was 15, the wife 11 years old and when they lived in different cities.

The American Legion reported a member was fired from his government job because his wife accused him of personal misconduct. Later the wife was fired from her government job because it was found that she lied about her husband. But the government refused to reinstate the husband because being accused in public was considered sufficient grounds for dismissal in his particular department.

In one of the classic cases, a unionist was declared a "security risk" because he was too active a union man! As Jim Schuetz told the Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights recently, he had worked at Bell Aircraft since 1940. Chairman of the United Auto Workers' local stewards' council, he had held a government security clearance since 1946. In late 1950, Schuetz was called into the Army Air Force office at Bell and handed a letter withdrawing his security clearance. As a "security risk," the company then told him, he no longer could be employed at Bell.

After the union appealed, Schuetz learned months later that his clearance had been withdrawn because of "picketline offenses" in the Bell Aircraft strike a year and a half earlier, which the hearing board said had shown "poor discretion" and "lack of responsibility." Schuetz was not disloyal or subversive, they said, but they implied he was too active and militant a union man. When the hearing board refused to restore his clearance, UAW officers and the Workers Defense League took the case to the Secretary of Defense in Washington. Five months after he was fired, Schuetz was cleared of the "security risk" tag and reinstated on the job. But even then, it took almost a year to get his back pay.

In another case, when Julius P. Alston was denounced as a security risk and pulled off his job at the Lockheed missiles plant in Van Nuys, Calif., which makes the Polaris missile, the government kept identity of his accusers secret. The International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers helped him disprove the anonymous security risk charge that cost him his job back in April 1959. Union representative Hal Shean went with Alston before a hearing board in June 1959. Alston then learned that charges against him arose because he worked for an arms plant in Connecticut where communist infiltration had taken place 17 years ago. It took another 17 months to clear Alston even though Alston, with Shean's aid, showed at the hearing that the charge against him was groundless. His reinstatement order entitled Alston to $9,000 back pay.

Six days after the Alston hearing, the U. S. Supreme Court held the government's industrial security program invalid in an 8-to-1 decision because denial of confrontation and cross examination of government witnesses, without statutory authority, was illegal. Former President Eisenhower issued an executive order restoring the program with some changes to meet the court's decision, but did not apply the confrontation and cross examination principles to all cases. A bill to back up that executive order with congressional sanction went down to defeat in the last Congress as labor pitched in, along with other liberal forces and a small group of Republicans, to point up its dangers.

American labor traditionally has opposed blacklisting as an unmitigated evil. Labor history is full of examples of active union men fired from jobs because of union activity and blacklisted so they could find no other jobs in their trades. That is why unions campaigned so vigorously for a clause in the Wagner Act to make blacklisting illegal.

During the McCarthy era, a different kind of blacklist ran rampant—the exclusion of actors, writers and others in the entertainment industries because of alleged involvement with communist or communist-front groups. Blacklisters cowed the radio and television industry—networks and stations, sponsors and advertising agencies, even the performers' union—into accepting "political reliability" as a qualification for employment in broadcasting. In part, this was a reaction to earlier communist influence in the entertainment world, where communists and fellow travelers had worked together to blacklist anti-communist writers and actors.

In the mid-fifties, John Henry Faulk, a radio-TV personality earning $36,000 a year as a humorist, decided the blacklist wasn't funny. With several other entertainers he ran for office in the New York local of the American Federation of Television and Radio Artists (AFTRA) on a slate opposing both communism and blacklisting. When the slate won, a blacklisting newsletter, AWARE, charged that Faulk had attended some communist-front meetings years before. The late Lawrence Johnson, owner of a supermarket chain in Syracuse, N. Y., circulated AWARE's attack among Faulk's sponsors, threatening to remove their products from his stores. The sponsors deserted in droves.

Instead of bowing supinely to AWARE's power, Faulk sued AWARE, Johnson and Vincent H. Hartnett, author of the attack, for libel. Things happened fast. The Columbia Broadcasting System failed to renew Faulk's contract. Stations outside New York offered to hire him only if he dropped his suit. Faulk moved to Texas and opened a small public relations agency to try to keep going.

Finally, last year, when attorney Louis Nizer proved the AWARE charges were untrue, a jury awarded Faulk the unprecedented sum of $3.5 million in compensatory and punitive damages. How much he will collect is uncertain since multi-millionaire Johnson died just as the case went to the jury and a legal question exists as to whether his estate is responsible for his share of the damages. In the light of the Faulk verdict, other individuals similarly victimized may be expected to take similar legal action against their attackers.

Still another area of great concern to labor is the widespread use of wiretapping. As the law now stands, the Communications Act of 1934 makes it a federal crime for anybody, police included, to put a wiretap on somebody's telephone and disclose what was heard. The Supreme Court recently has ruled, in Mapp v. Ohio, that illegally obtained evidence may not be used in state or federal courts. Whether that ruling will eventually bar the use of wiretap evidence in all state courts is not yet settled.

To be able to move at top speed, the Justice Department now wants a law permitting the use of wiretap information in cases involving national security without having to request a court order. In cases where bribery, extortion, kidnapping or murder are suspected, the law would require specific court orders for permission to tap and use the evidence. State and local authorities have urged even wider use of wiretaps, leading the American Civil Liberties Union to demand a complete ban on wiretapping because "innumerable innocent people will have their privacy invaded by officials who, as Justice Brandeis said, at their best are 'men of zeal, well-meaning but without understanding' and, at their worst, susceptible to graft, corruption, extortion and other improprieties." The AFL-CIO, recognizing that wiretapping constitutes a serious threat to personal liberties and that technological developments have made it very difficult to control, has urged a law permitting wiretapping only to federal agents, under specific court orders, in an area clearly defined to cover espionage, treason and kidnapping. All other taps should be banned, said the last AFL-CIO convention, including a prohibition on divulging tapped information at congressional hearings.

In 1637, a stubborn English bookseller named John Lilburne stood trial before a star chamber, charged with having brought certain anti-religious books into Britain. Because he refused to testify against himself, he was sentenced to be whipped.

In 1641, the House of Commons voted this sentence "illegal and against the liberty of the subject." Lilburne's fight established in the English-speaking world the principle that no man should be compelled to bear witness against himself or be tortured into confession. This safeguard was later written into the American Bill of Rights as the Fifth Amendment to the U. S. Constitution.

The Fifth Amendment states in pretty plain language that in a criminal trial no man is required to testify against himself. It also includes the provision that "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law"—that is, without a fair trial. These principles go hand in hand with the assumption that a man is innocent until proved guilty.

Communists and fellow travelers have, of course, made frequent use of the Fifth Amendment. Newspapers headline cases of "Fifth Amendment Communist," "Fifth Amendment Teachers," "Fifth Amendment Gangsters" and "Fifth Amendment Racketeers." As a result, many people forget that the Fifth Amendment was put in the Bill of Rights not as an "escape hatch" for the guilty, but to protect the innocent.

The Fifth Amendment has been called "one of the greatest privileges a free people can possess." Like the rest of the Bill of Rights, it is a symbol of democracy. There were no such safeguards in fascist Italy or Nazi Germany. There is no Fifth Amendment in communist Russia.

"The reason for the guarantee is of such overwhelming importance," wrote President A. J. Hayes of the International Association of Machinists, in his union journal, "that few people would seriously contend we should abandon it and revert to the old practice, still used by communist and fascist dictators, of extracting confessions by physical and mental torture. Indeed, the Fifth Amendment is one of the basic concepts of freedom which distinguishes our form of government from communism and fascism."

Nevertheless, in October 1953 the Eisenhower security order was amended to state that any person who pleads the Fifth Amendment is automatically a "security risk" and not eligible for work on classified government materials. Some companies even dismiss any employe who has claimed the Fifth in a court case or hearing, whether he is working on defense contracts or not.

The courts have ruled that pleading the Fifth Amendment may not be interpreted as a confession of guilt. In a recent decision, the U. S. Supreme Court declared:

". . . The privilege against self-incrimination would be reduced to a hollow mockery if its exercise could be taken as equivalent either to a confession of guilt or a conclusive presumption of perjury.

". . . A witness may have a reasonable fear of prosecution and yet be innocent of any wrongdoing. The privilege serves to protect the innocent who otherwise might be ensnared by ambiguous circumstances."

There are many reasons which may lead an innocent man to plead the Fifth. He may fear becoming involved in a case although he has committed no crime. He may be frightened and plead the Fifth to avoid further questioning. He may feel that whatever he says will be a link in the chain of his own prosecution.

In April 1956, the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the Immunity Act, which permits the government to grant witnesses immunity against prosecution and force them to testify in national security cases. Under the law the government may subpoena a man to the witness stand and make him testify against himself and former associates. If he refuses, he can go to jail for contempt of Congress.

An editorial in The Wall Street Journal argued: "The law flies directly in the face of the Fifth Amendment, for the granting of immunity from prosecution is only another way to force a person to testify against himself or go to jail. No one can say what future prosecution may flow from forced testimony."

Three Bethlehem Steel employes—in plants which had no defense contracts—were fired when they pleaded the Fifth Amendment before a congressional committee. The Steelworkers Union took the case to arbitration but lost. Furthermore, the workers were refused unemployment benefits on the grounds that they had been fired for "just cause."

The executive board of the Steelworkers declared that invoking the Fifth Amendment "standing alone cannot be the basis . . . for failure of the union to protect employe rights under a collective bargaining agreement, including the right to be free from unilateral and arbitrary disciplinary action or discharge."

The International Union of Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers, the Newspaper Guild, the American Federation of Teachers and the United Auto Workers also have stated they would not go along with dismissals based solely on the fact that a worker claimed the privilege of the Fifth Amendment. If a local union has reason to believe that the individual in question is actually a communist, these national unions declare, he should be tried under local union procedure.

"From Jesus' injunction to swear not at all," noted Gordon M. Browne, Jr., past president of Local 460 of the American Federation of Teachers, "through the U. S. Supreme Court decision in Cummings vs. Missouri in 1867, which held that a test oath denying employment to non-signers was a bill of attainder and specifically forbidden by the Constitution, oaths have been despised and resisted. They have been the tool of tyrants seeking to coerce conformity, often on matters of religious belief."

Yet in the postwar era the prevalence of test oaths has grown mightily. Churches and other organizations in California enjoying tax exemption once were required to swear their corporate loyalty to preserve their tax exempt status. All over the country, teachers have been forced to sign non-communist oaths. Students must sign such oaths to receive federal aid grants. The Christian Century reported that a new subscriber had offered with his check a non-communist oath which he wanted the editor to sign for himself and all his employes before accepting the subscriber's money.

What have the oaths accomplished? They invariably are presented as a weapon against subversion, but communists and other totalitarians would have no hesitation in signing such an oath. After all, Lenin told them that lying, stealing and murder were justified because the end justified the means. The scores of teachers and professors who have been fired or forced to resign for refusal to sign such oaths have been people opposed to the oath on principle. The oath has punished no subversives but has made thornier the path of the non-conformist.

"But if you're not a subversive, why not swear loyalty to your country?" This is the classic question to which the only answer is "If we must suspect each other and be reassured only by oaths, how can a free society function?" Teachers have been special targets of oaths because their influence during the formative years of a child's development has been viewed with anxiety by oath proponents. Teachers, of course, resent such attention. They feel no more inclined to subversion than doctors or bankers—yet doctors are not asked to swear that they are not abortionists or bankers that they are not embezzlers.

What are some of the other civil liberties issues of concern to the trade union movement? Censorship and the McCarran Act are among them. The defeated Cunningham amendment to the postal rate revision bill would have banned from international and domestic mail all matter determined by the Attorney General to be communist political propaganda. The last AFL-CIO convention opposed such attempt at censorship, rejecting "the totalitarian philosophy that some government officials can judge better than the people themselves what they shall read, see or hear." Herblock, the political cartoonist, echoed this view when he suggested: "It seems to me that we were all better off when the postal department used to deliver mail and left it to a Higher Authority to deliver us from evil."

Junius Scales, a former Communist Party organizer arrested under the Smith Act in 1954, was found guilty of active and knowing membership in the Communist Party and sentenced to six years in jail. During the seven years the case was being considered by various appeals courts, a great deal happened in the world—and to Junius Scales. In 1957 Scales quit the party. In 1961, his conviction was upheld by the U.S. Supreme Court in a 5-4 decision. (On the same day the Court threw out the conviction of John F. Noto, an admitted and continuing party functionary, on the ground that the government had failed to present sufficient evidence of "illegal party advisory.") No other Communist Party member, past or present, has been convicted on the same charge that put Scales behind bars.

As The Washington Post put it: "What a laugh this must give the commies! The government of the United States . . . in effect joins hands with [communists] to punish an ex-member whom they hate for his apostasy. Moreover the absurdity of this paradox is heightened when one reflects that Scales is being punished for a political crime—holding bad beliefs and bad associations—which most Americans like to believe is punishable only in communist countries. If President Kennedy were to pardon Scales, he would be tempering justice not only with mercy but with equity and common sense as well."

And this did happen; in a series of Christmas amnesties, Kennedy set Scales free in commuting his term.

Last year, the U. S. Supreme Court, also by a 5 to 4 vote, upheld the constitutionality of the key clause of the Internal Security Act (popularly titled the McCarran Act). The U. S. Communist Party was ordered to register as the agent of a foreign power. When the party refused, it was indicted and was recently tried along with several of its leaders. A number of organizations, including one union, were designated "communist-infiltrated" as defined by the Act and prosecutions are pending. Several publications are under orders to label themselves as communist and are threatened with prosecution if they don't.

The four Supreme Court justices who dissented in the McCarran Act decision said:

". . . the freedoms of speech, press, petition and assembly guaranteed by the First Amendment must be accorded to the ideas we hate or sooner or later they will be denied to the ideas we cherish. The first banning of an association because it advocates hated ideas—whether that association be called a political party or not—marks a fateful moment in the history of a free country.

". . . Now, when this country is trying to spread the high ideals of democracy all over the world—ideals that are revolutionary in many countries—seems to be a particularly inappropriate time to stifle First Amendment freedoms in this country. The same arguments that are used to justify the outlawry of communist ideas here could be used to justify the outlawry of the ideas of democracy in other nations.

". . . This widespread program for punishing ideas on the ground that they might endanger the internal security of the nation not only sadly fails to protect that security but also diverts our energies and thoughts from the many far more important problems that face us as a nation in this troubled world."

It has been noted that on many of the civil liberties issues confronting the nation there seems to be a gap between labor's official views and the attitudes of local union leaders and the rank and file. Nor is it only unionists who share such limited views of democracy. A Purdue University poll of teenage opinions reveals that more than half of our high school students believe that wiretapping and the third degree should be legalized to help the police maintain obedience and that police should censor books, movies, radio and TV to shield citizens from improper thinking. Moreover, 41 percent would abolish freedom of the press and 34 percent would deny freedom of speech to people who hold unpopular views. Indeed, Chief Justice Earl Warren of the U. S. Supreme Court said several years ago that he doubted the Bill of Rights would win approval if it were submitted to this generation of Americans in a referendum.

In every union leadership training institute where civil liberties questionnaires were distributed, the replies—filled out without discussion—were disheartening. Yet in every case, after open discussion on the issues, support for civil liberties soared dramatically. Nor was this due to an indoctrination process of lecturing about the "right" answers. What was done was to elicit from the local union leaders their definition of democracy. Invariably, this included not only rule by the majority but protection of the rights of the minority—including freedom of speech, press, assembly and worship. Then as discussion was requested on the specific items in the questionnaire—and the students were asked how their answers related to the definition of democracy they had worked out—they realized the indivisibility of freedom.

When they understand the issues, American workers wholeheartedly support the principles of freedom and democracy. But how to bring about that understanding? Civil liberties should be stressed in labor's schools, press and meetings. And since union members only reflect the prejudices of the communities of which they are a part, labor must push for more intensive education in public schools and in all institutions on the values of democracy.

Many Ladies Went to Jail

It was not too many years ago that in Britain and the United States nice ladies of impeccable backgrounds and prestige families were being loaded into patrol wagons along with their placards of protest for their street demonstrations in behalf of the right to vote.

That stage of developing rights in the United States was one plateau. The first, of course, was the long, tedious and sacrificial fight for independence. Now we are engaged on another pleateu—that of full civil rights for each citizen. We tend to forget the others.

The Woman's Suffrage story of protest parades, pickets and demonstrations, in which police made arrests and jails received the ladies, did not end until 1920.

As a young student reporter, the writer was in the balcony when the Tennessee state legislature became the thirty-sixth state to approve the constitutional amendment giving women the right to vote. A tumultuous, emotional scene ensued. Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt, a brilliant, stubborn woman who had headed the national "suffragette" organization, was present and I interviewed her.

Ballot of Reform

There was much hope then that the women would "reform the ballot." There was disappointment when, in the early years after being given the vote, they seemed to vote as did their husbands or families. But as the years have moved and more and more educated women have become interested in politics, the early hopes have been vindicated. The so-called woman's vote has become increasingly independent. It no longer is merely a companion ballot to that cast by husband, father or brother.

The movement for woman suffrage began as early as the movement to abolish slavery. But it had a lesser priority. Some three generations were to pass before

There was much hope then that the women would "reform the ballot." There was disappointment when, in the early years after being given the vote, they seemed to vote as did their husbands or families. But as the years have moved and more and more educated women have become interested in politics, the early hopes have been vindicated. The so-called woman's vote has become increasingly independent. It no longer is merely a companion ballot to that cast by husband, father or brother.

The movement for woman suffrage began as early as the movement to abolish slavery. But it had a lesser priority. Some three generations were to pass before the drive became effective.

The campaign in America was electrified from about 1910 to 1915 by the determined efforts of women in Britain. There Mrs. Emmeline Parkhurst and her daughter, Christabel, after passive protests had failed, became militant. They and their followers set up boycotts and stirred riots which produced broken shop windows, fires and other disorders. They, and others, were jailed more than once. Each time they went on hunger strikes.

In America there were parades and protests and, in the early years, some violence. A number of ladies were arrested and jailed for demonstrations. The nation learned a new word—feminism. As the Negro's search for rights has moved out of the field of education to that of full citizenship, so did the woman's suffrage movement. There were demands to reform the laws which discriminated against women as litigants in courts. They had few property rights and were grievously exploited in wages paid and in hours worked.

Lady's Groom

One lady of wealth and position, in speaking for the right to vote, said: "I have no vote, but my groom has. He is a good man, but if I went to him and said, 'Jim, will you exercise the franchise?' he would reply, 'Sure, Mam, and we have no horse by that name.' "

The story of the press in those years is not a happy one. Most of it defended the status quo and opposed women voting. The editors solemnly condemned it as undermining the nation. When a group of women paraded from New York to Albany to dramatize a protest to the legislature, an Episcopal bishop denounced them as "silly and excited." In general the clergy was as sure as a majority of editorial writers that the vote for women was wrong.

A newspaper wit wrote a rhyme:

"Peter, Peter, punkin eater,
Had a wife and tried to beat her;
But his wife was a suffragette,
And Peter's in the hospital yet."

A map of the period shows that before adoption of the 19th Amendment in August, 1920, the Southern States, and Pennsylvania, were the strongholds of denial of voting rights for women.

In conclusion, it is only in 1963 that women have won the right, by statute, of equal pay.

Texas: Two-Fisted, Three-Party State

Democrats who used to have it all their way now must fight off challenges from two sides.

By RONNIE DUGGER

AUSTIN, Tex.

AMERICANS who can't get out of their heads the notion that Texas roads are intersecting cowtrails and that the most popular vehicle in these parts is the horse will be pleased to learn that Texas politics still has a gamy Western flavor.

This summer someone fired a bullet into the Democrats' headquarters in Dallas, causing a secretary there to reflect that Texans take their politics rather seriously. Then the Democrats' office in San Antonio was burglarized; the thieves broke through a wall and stole valuable political files and precinct lists, and $30 as well.

"In the process," said the Democrats' newsletter, "they defaced a picture of President Kennedy. It sounds like a page out of the history of Hitler's brownshirts. We hope this is not an example of a new right-wing political technique." Republicans have not yet apprehended any liberal marauders rifling their I.B.M. machines, but the season has just begun.

Actually, exciting things are happening in Texas politics. Texas Latin-Americans, Negroes, union people and independent liberals have hooked together a four-group "Democratic Coalition" that is like nothing that has been tried seriously in the South since Populism in the eighteen-nineties. Texas Republicans are making an earnest, impressive attempt to end the one-party system's pervasion of the state.

The two experiments are hostile in their purposes, but curiously complementary. The liberal Democrats get closer to controlling the Texas Democratic party every time a conservative Democrat goes over to the Republicans, and this makes enemies allies. The Republicans are luring the conservative Democrats into their party, the liberals are scaring them out of theirs; they work together, one side with carrots, the other with sticks.

A liberal strategist says that "if the South is gonna come out, Texas has gotta lead it out." It is one of the many neatly fitted ironies of the situation here that Republicans can agree with the words and mean something opposite.

IN between these somewhat feverish movements, frightened by the militant minorities on the left and by the gung- forces of Goldwater Republicanism on the right, loved by neither and badgered by both, are the custodians of the state government and the centrist defenders of the dropsical one-party tradition, the conservative Democrats, led by Gov. John Connally.

No one really believes that Texas can be a one-party state again. It's a three-party state now, two Democratic and one Republican. The question is when it will become a two-party state. Texas politics resembles three unstable chemical compounds, with the compound at the left taking on new molecules from a previously inactive base, and other molecules shifting fitfully from one compound to another—mostly toward the right.

SOMEHOW the idea has broken loose in the echoing reaches of the national press that Senator Barry Goldwater has Texas in the vest pocket of his conservative gray business suit. He is the strongest of the Republican Presidential contenders in Texas at present, but anyone who would try to simplify the dynamics of the situation here by predicting the election a full year from now simply doesn't have the picture. The outlook is especially clouded just now by the uncertain outcome of the referendum this Saturday in which Texans will vote whether to abolish their poll tax—before the Federal Government does it for them through a pending anti-poll-tax constitutional amendment.

An enthusiastic yokel, I cannot see how any state's politics can be as intriguing as Texas's. Consider:

We have the nation's richest extremist, billionaire H. L. Hunt of Dallas, the principal backer of "Life Line," a series of nationally distributed right-wing political broadcasts, and the deviser of the utopian cashocracy, "Alpaca," where proportional representation means the richer you are the more votes you get.

ON the oily western plains around Amarillo, in Dallas, in the central cities of the East Texas oilfield and in Houston, we have concentrations of more constitutionalists, Birchers, anti-U.N.-ers, anti-income taxers and other yahoos than can be found anywhere east of Southern California.

Ralph Yarborough, the liberal Democratic senior Senator from Texas, says, "I don't get time to listen to H. L. Hunt and Life Line and Rev. Billy Hargis, but I've seen the map, and Texas has more of these fellas spouting hate than any other state in the union. Some states look like they've got chicken pox, some small pox—but Texas looks like it's got scarlet fever."

We have not only German, Czech and Swedish areas; we have perhaps a million Negroes, mostly living either in the gradually integrating major cities or in rural East Texas, and well over a million Latin Americans, mostly living in South and Central Texas. The bilingual border culture near Mexico and the segregationist society in East Texas, a backwater of the Old South, conflow exotically in San Antonio, where one (Continued on Page 112)

SIGNS OF TEXAS—Car stickers and placards spell out issues that agitate Texans. Poll-tax repeal will be decided on in balloting this Saturday.

RONNIE DUGGER is editor of the fortnightly The Texas Observer, published in Austin. His work has appeared in many magazines.

ON THE "LEFT"—The liberal Democrats—above at a testimonial for Senator Ralph Yarborough in Austin—hope to gain most from repeal of the poll tax, which will ease voting for their Negro and Mexican-American allies.

ON THE "RIGHT"—Ambassador Stevenson's U.N. Day address in Dallas Oct. 24 brought out opposition pickets from among right-wing elements with which the state abounds. These are encouraged by well-financed propaganda.

NEW REPUBLICANS—A meeting of young Republicans at the University of Texas. The growing power of both Republicans and liberal Democrats has added two new groupings to threaten rule by conservative Democrats.

TYPES OF TEXANS—Ranch foreman, conservative businessman, Negro worker and Mexican-American farmhand.

The possibilities are endless.

We started with a teak on metal cylinder. Kept going. And ended up with a delightful trio of lamps. Top left: 5" long polished brass stem, $18. Top right: 19" high with angled chrome stem and 3¾" diameter extra heavy base, $35. Bottom: 24" long polished chrome stem, $35. All shades measure a sleek 9"x4". All shades are swivel mounted and give you light wherever you wish. Now, close your eyes and imagine the endless possibilities.

Three-Party State can see in any hotel or coffee shop the visual intimations of a multiracial future.

We have Lyndon Johnson, without whom our politics would lack much that many would miss, and that many wish it did lack. We have the well-heeled financiers of the political Establishment, who are now having to conduct novel, perhaps unprecedented, contests for authority with persons of their own stations and general approach, the feisty Texas Republicans. We have oil roughnecks and office hounds, farmers and apartment dwellers, Rotarians and even a few peaceniks.

And if this isn't enough, there are shapeless hints that the conservative Democrats may try to arrange a Red hunt in time for the 1964 elections — the better to preserve the one-party tradition, my dear.

FOR convenience, let's call the liberals of the Democatic Coalition, plus those not so connected who are, however, all-out for Senator Yarborough's re-election next year, the liberals; let's call the conservative and moderate Democrats who number themselves among Yarborough's opponents the tories; and the Republicans can be called by the name about which there is no complication, Republicans.

For many years, during which the tories have controlled the Texas Democratic party, there have been extra-official organizations of the liberals. Generally, while saying little or nothing about integration, these organizations have defended the liberal economic policies of the national Democrats. They have sought the election of liberal state officials, and they have crusaded for Texas Democrats' loyalty to the national Democratic nominees, especially after the day in 1952 when Democratic Gov. Allan Shivers led the Texas Democratic party into open and official support of Eisenhower.

Last year a liberal Houston lawyer with an evangelical speaking style but no political experience, Don Yarborough—related to Senator Yarborough not by blood but by politics—won 49 per cent of the vote against John Connally for the Democratic nomination for Governor. Thus encouraged, and with the Negro revolt cracking around the country, the Democratic Coalition began to form, and this summer it took on its most startling characteristic for the politics of a former Confederate state: a public commitment to the Negro cause.

"ONE-PARTY" CHIEF—Gov. John Connally heads the regular—or "tory"—Democratic party that has hitherto dominated Texas politics.

Each of the coalition's four groups selects one of its four state co-chairmen. At present they are Hank Brown, state president of the Texas A.F.L.-C.I.O.; W. J. Durham, a Negro lawyer who has handled many N.A.A.C.P. cases; Albert Peña, the chairman of the Political Association of Spanish-Speaking Organizations, or PASO; and a white, liberal East Texas lawyer, Franklin Jones Sr., representing independent liberals. The coalition has compacted with its Negro and Mexicano participants to include them in on all the dealmaking and to respond to candidates for public office without regard to their race.

THE Democratic Coalition is now trying to change the composition of the Texas electorate by putting more Negroes and Mexican-Americans in a position to vote. This may have more to do with Kennedy's chances against Goldwater in Texas next year than anything else going on in this state.

Texas voter turnout in 1960 was one of the lowest in the United States. Texas voters must register before Jan. 31 each year, long before campaigns start, and they must pay a $1.75 poll tax, Texas being one of the last five states to require one. The figures in some of the cities show that a Republican is twice as likely to vote as a Democrat is. Although it is difficult for inhabitants of Mr. Galbraith's affluent society to believe, $3.50 can buy a lot of coal oil in East Texas or a lot of tortillas in Laredo, especially if a couple has five kids and couldn't care less about politics in January.

THAT is why the Liberal Coalition is now trying to turn out the voting-age Negroes and Mexican-Americans in 15 key urban areas against the poll tax. The number of block workers signed up in Dallas alone is past 800, and the statewide goal one hears mentioned exceeds 10,000. These workers are to be called on again throughout 1964. The thought among the liberals is that if they win on Saturday they could keep on going through the primaries and November, 1964.

Labor chief Brown figures that only about one-fifth of the minority groups in Texas are registered to vote. Coalition spokesmen estimate there are 650,000 Negroes and 850,000 Mexican-Americans of voting age in Texas, a total of 1,500,000. Texas elections are often cliff-hangers; in 1960 Kennedy carried the state by only 46,000 votes. If just 30 per cent of the minorities qualified, instead of 20 per cent, there could be perhaps 125,000 more of them voting in Texas next year, a fact that would have vital implications for both Kennedy and his opponent.

And for the two Yarboroughs, as well. Both of them draw their main support from the pro-Kennedy Democratic Coalition. Don Yarborough wants to run against Connally again this spring. He and Senator Yarborough both support the President's civil-rights legislation, including public accommodations. Their fortunes are therefore bound up in the coalition's Populist-like experiment—an experiment that could wane under a reaction against the civil-rights movement or glide through Texas politics like an eagle on a norther.

ON THE FENCE—Vice President Lyndon Johnson keeps "in" with both national Democratic Administration and Texas regulars.

DEMOCRATIC LIBERAL—Senator Ralph Yarborough champions the cause of the anti-tory Democrats both in Washington and at home.

Texans have already had a preview of what it means if the minorities decide to vote in force. Crystal City is not only the name of a service town in the spinach fields of South Texas; it is also the name of events that have profoundly disturbed the once serene psyche of Texas politics. Although the town had been run many years by Anglo-Americans, the democratic fact of the matter was that four-fifths of the citizens were Mexican-Americans. This year they bought a majority of the poll taxes and elected an all-Mexican city council. Since then they have been redressing some of their grievances.

The coup was pulled off with the active support of the Teamsters' Union, which has a large packing-plant local in Crystal City, and PASO, which is a descendant of the Viva Kennedy Clubs of 1960. In Spanish, "paso" can mean "happened." Although Mexicanos hold political offices in many other South Texas towns, Crystal City was a happening because it dramatized what can take place anywhere, including the South, when members of minorities begin using their one sturdy lance in the power joustings of democracy: their numbers.

PASO organizers have learned that, since Crystal City, all they need do to shake up Anglos and newspapers of a small town is say they're going to organize a chapter there. Kenedy, a town south of San Antonio, is one PASO target. A restaurant owner was complaining to a friend there that too many people are voting these days. "Yeah," his friend, a wag, responded, "they may even prevent restaurant owners from voting."

When Senator Goldwater landed at the San Antonio airport last month, he was greeted by about 500 fans, including three matronly ladies who were carrying "Goldwater in '64" placards on sticks. One of them saw a man starting a car bearing a sticker that read, "Repeal the Poll Tax." "Oh, good!" she called out to him.

"No, no!" one of her companions said. "We don't want that!"

The first lady did a double-take and stood corrected. "I thought it said 'income tax,'" she said.

Then she advanced on the driver and told him to get right. "Our state is filling up with the wrong kind of people!" she exclaimed.

Although in burlesque, this story explains as well as anything why those who are active in the campaign for repeal of the poll tax believe "it's close." Nearly all the elected leaders of the three parties in Texas are on record for repeal, but public opinion is divided.

Although he is formally for repeal, Governor Connally gave the cause its worst actual blow from any political leader when he dramatically accused PASO's Peña, whom he called "Boss Peña," of using the issue to try to build a selfish political machine.

"We should be sure," said the Governor, "that we will not sow the seeds of political bossism."

Connally feels menaced by the Democratic Coalition on his left flank, as well as by the Republicans on his right. He has been Lyndon Johnson's right-hand man in Texas, but as Johnson, adapting to a national constituency, has moved left, Connally has moved right. The Governor is opposed to Medicare and Federal aid to education, and silent on most of the rest of Kennedy's programs. He is explicitly opposed to racial discrimination with public funds and has appointed middle-class Negroes of moderate political views to selected state jobs, thus becoming the first pro-integration governor in Texas history.

But Connally has also announced his opposition to the public-accommodations proposal, a primary symbol on this subject, and his attack on "Boss Peña" may have been another expression of a decision to ride the "white reaction" against Kennedy on civil rights. That this reaction may be a real factor was shown by a Texas poll of "the white majority"—excluding both Mexicanos and Negroes—that reported 75 per cent opposition to the public-accommodations bill.

Senator Yarborough's large and dedicated band of followers is organizing to re-elect him. Yarborough led them through the chilly Shivers years, and in the Senate he has been a tough-minded economic liberal. Only on foreign aid, which he wants to cut, and Kennedy's Telstar corporation, against which he filibustered, has he really broken ranks with the Administration. He appears to be running strong.

HOWEVER, there is an enmity between Yarborough and Johnson that goes back many years. They have different ways, and they are different kinds of men. Johnson has frequently compromised liberalism; Yarborough seldom does. Johnson has run with the Texas tories; Yarborough runs with the liberals. After Yarborough's biennial campaigns against Shivers had taken their effect, Johnson moved in and staged the decisive battle, pointedly leaving Yarborough off his command staff. In 1960 Yarborough was the only leading Texas Democratic officeholder who refused to endorse Johnson for President.

Johnson shows signs of concern for the Kennedy-Johnson ticket next year if this rift is driven too deep. But on the other hand there is much speculation that he will support someone against Senator Yarborough, which would embitter the Texas liberals and if Yarborough lost, could dispirit them for the fall campaign.

Texas briefly late this month, and he, too, will have to tread his way carefully through this treacherous three-party Texas. Senator Yarborough has been invited to accompany him and the Vice President. Governor Connally is reported to be upset lest this be taken as Presidential endorsement of Yarborough's re-election. Politicians' and pundits' antennae will be carefully attuned to pick up all the nuances, but if they are not forewarned, they may tune in on the nuances and miss the revolution. It's come to Texas, too.

IN part because it has, and because Goldwater has come to represent the reaction against it in Texas, nomination of the Arizona Senator would make Texas again a doubtful state rather than a Democratic one.

The Texas Republican party is officially supporting Goldwater, and John Tower, the Republican Senator from Texas, wants the Texas delegation to the national G.O.P. convention pledged to him. "We must serve as his power base," Tower says. If Goldwater is not nominated, the Texas G.O.P. will be badly shaken and Kennedy will be a substantial favorite to carry this state. Even so, the Republicans have been approaching a solidity of organization here that could transcend the commitment to Goldwater and serve as a challenge to one-partyism throughout the South.

TEXAS went for Eisenhower twice, and despite Nixon's losing here, the Republicans have been making steady progress. From 1960, when they had just four college clubs, 29 women's clubs and one significant public office, they have advanced to 27 college clubs, 93 women's clubs, a U.S. Senator, two Congressmen, and eight state representatives. They seem ready to take over Dallas politics entirely.

Republicans still labor under handicaps in Texas. This was a traditionally Democratic state up to the time of Eisenhower, and the tory Democrats were able to maintain their control of state level politics throughout the Eisenhower years, and still do. The important political money still rides with the tories in the elections to the statehouse jobs; in Texas it is not altogether a joke if a Republican contends he is a poor-boy candidate.

Beyond these considerations, Texas Republicans draw support from radical rightists and are often afflicted with a certain shrillness. G.O.P. Congressman Ed Foreman of Odessa says that support of foreign aid "borders on treason" and that the Kennedy boys have been "embracing the Communists more and more." Dallas's G.O.P. Congressman Bruce Alger warns that Kennedy will "make complete the destruction of capitalism."

The very few leading Republicans who prefer candidates other than Goldwater (such as two former county G.O.P. chairmen in Dallas) are not heard from much.

WITH so much changing, nothing is neat; political revolution is not a chess game. PASO has not found the going easy even among the Mexicanos, some of whom prefer to take their politics with condiments blander than PASO's jalapeños (hot peppers)—militant politics and control of city hall. Governor Connally is supported by a political organization of merchant-type Negroes, the United Political Organization. The Establishment itself seems to have lost, at least temporarily, its ability to act in concert on the basis of a community of financial interest.

Consequently there is a good deal of confusion of "role." Liberals drive for hours to meet Republicans in all-night cafes to exchange intelligence toward the downfall of the tories. Negro merchants and lawyers, wooed by Connally, tell reporters they don't have time to work on civil-rights demonstrations. White leaders of the Democratic coalition turn up in a civil-rights march on the state capitol. The national chairman of PASO, a Corpus Christi physician, bolts the state PASO convention in protest against the teamsters' part in Crystal City.

DESPITE his long association with the Texas tories, Vice President Johnson has been cooperating with the liberals on the poll tax. Once-loyal Democrats have edged into the tory camp—and even the Republicans'—because they cannot abide the Kennedys on civil rights. Conservatives have been moving, at an undetermined but apparently significant rate, from the tories to the Republicans. (In the 1962 Republican spring primary just 116,000 persons voted; in November 715,000 persons voted for the Republican candidate for Governor.)

Eugene Locke, a Dallas oilman and Connally's state Democratic chairman, says, "I don't think there's been a drain-out from the Democratic party toward the Republican party." It's a key question for Connally. In Texas the two parties' primaries are held on the same day; a voter cannot vote in both. Last year only 116,000 persons voted in the Republicans' primary, but their state executive director believes at least 200,000 will in 1964. Depending on how many such new voters were defecting tory Democrats, even an increase as small as this might be a disaster for Connally the same day: he beat Don Yarborough last time by just 26,000 votes.

ONE is impressed, though, watching Texas politics these days, by the vastness of the truth of events, beyond the possibility of ever encompassing it, and by the guesswork that must pass for analysis, before the analysis becomes history.

There is a judge in west Texas who was a New Dealer, but comes from Mississippi and damns the Democrats to condign obscurity now. There is a liberal in central Texas who so detests Johnson that he is crusading against Kennedy. There is a Negro merchant in Houston who is heading up the Republicans' drive there in the Negro precincts. There is a suggestion that some PASO people may consider bolting Kennedy with the teamsters, unless Goldwater is nominated against him.

Yet patterns also seem to be real. Texas minorities are on the go, and are mainly for Kennedy. The Republicans here are siphoning off Texas tories, and are bound and bent to make Barry Goldwater President. The patterns lead many observers to believe that Texas will be a two-party state in 1964, or no later than 1966.

High-school students protesting desegregation in Birmingham, Ala.

"Many attractive and voluble youngsters are eager to proclaim white superiority."

A Southern Teen-Ager Speaks His Mind

Disturbed by the militancy of young white Southerners in resisting school integration, a Southern writer and editor interviews an 18-year-old Mississippian.

By MARGARET LONG

OXFORD, MISS.

THE harsh and hating faces of young Southerners photographed in troubled scenes of the desegregating Deep South have shocked and baffled most other Americans, among them, indeed, many rational and peaceable people in Dixie. To investigate the ideas and feelings that fire many of these boys and girls I made a mission to Mississippi, the state where segregationist sentiment is most intense. Here I found many attractive and voluble youngsters eager to proclaim white superiority, Southern culture and Negro contentment. These high-school and college boys and girls exhibited a common innocence of the Negro movement, which they believe is fomented by outsiders and Communists. (The N.A.A.C.P., the only civil-rights organization most of them know, seems to them a blend of both.) They also showed intense emotions of both affection and revulsion toward Negroes.

The sweetly mannered young people I talked to seemed most of all gripped by a poignant loyalty to the precarious present and the easy past of the white South, a fealty uncorrupted by alien facts and ideas from beyond the tight and turbulent little world of Mississippi.

From here, the common ground fell away into varying attitudes, ranging from the valiant "Never!" of one Delta boy who would "die for" segregation, to the "It's coming" of several others and the pained confusion of a 17-year-old girl who thought, "It's awful Nigras can't come to our churches."

The Confederate dedication of one 18-year-old probably best expressed the adamant segregationist mood typical of many young people of the Deep South. He was Don Barrett, a Phi Delta Theta pledge at the University of Mississippi at Oxford, who answered questions at word-tumbling length, his replies replete with nice, old-fashioned "Yes'ms" and "No'ms." His forebears came to Mississippi from Virginia and South Carolina, and his great-grandmother, he said, gave $80,000 that she had hidden away to the Confederate Army after her plantation, Newstead, was used by Grant as headquarters during the Vicksburg campaign and then was sacked and ruined.

"She turned it over, lock, stock and barrel," he said, his round, rosy face glowing and his eyes dark with love. "That's the kind of heritage I come from—and I'm proud of it."

YOUNG Barrett's more immediate heritage includes a pleasant childhood of play in backyard pecan treehouses, fishing and hunting, adoration of a beautiful mother (she was beauty queen in high school, at Millsaps College in Jackson, and at Ole Miss) and a trusting attachment to his energetic and commanding father. ("He's got more sense in a minute than I've got in three weeks. He's the wisdom I draw on.") He also exhibits the usual masculine pleasure in two little sisters and pride tinged perhaps with rivalry, in an older brother, Pat Jr., who is taking psychology at Millsaps and planning to study law at Ole Miss.

"Yes, of course, I used to play with Negro children," he said. "We quit, well, we quit when . . . when we both realized the difference, and they went their way and I went mine. You may be surprised that our next-door neighbors were Nigras. They lived catty-corner across the street from us . . . the nearest neighbors."

Mr. Barrett spoke ardently of the good Negroes and his affection for them and their (Continued on Page 114)

profound loyalty to him and his. He smiled quickly and radiantly at the memory of these ancient felicities. Dora, who cooks and cleans up, is "a young 43"—like his mother. They were born on the same day and exchange birthday presents. Allie Mae, a registered nurse by correspondence course, "respected by the white community and venerated by the Negro community," nursed Don when he was born and promised his grandmother "she'd always take care of Sara," his mother. Allie Mae visits frequently in Miss Sara's bedroom and on the phone. Amelia, older, cooks on Sunday, and Pecolia, he confided with a flash of delight, "is making me a quilt." There are several Negro hands on his father's cattle farms who are also life-long familiars at the Barrett house in Lexington.

LEXINGTON is the seat of Holmes County, seven miles in the hills at the edge of the Delta, "the heart of Mississippi and the citadel of Southern rights," with "stark nekkid bluffs looking out to the Mississippi River." It is to him the most beautiful place in the world, a rich center of farming which produces the best crops and "the best people, too." The citadel of Holmes County has 19,600 Negro citizens and 7,000 whites.

"I feel, as do most of the white population of the South, that the Negro is inherently unequal," Barrett said. "Now they say it's lack of opportunity, cause and result, the reason men first took the fire and light of learning, that the Nigras never had the need in Africa because they could just pluck the fruit of the woods and all, and sustain life on that. But you can't say they didn't get learning and civilization because of the easy climate, because they've got a range of all climates and mountains and jungles. They came into contact with the Saracens in North Africa. And Alexander the Great and they never did catch the light of learning, nobody in the region. If they hadn't been taken over by the white man . . .

"Well, where they're not, they're still eating each other," he said, his voice vibrant with triumph and disgust.

"BUT the white South has taken the Neegra, fed, clothed, taught them how to speak and wear clothes and taught him Christianity. Still, look at 'em, their illegitimacy rate!"

Mr. Barrett was at such polite pains to say the respectful Southern "Nigra" and never to lapse into the easy and offensive "nigger," and I was so vigilant with my proper and hard-learned "Negro," that we quite rattled one another. Once, in the heat of exchange, he said "Neegra" and, again, "Neeger," and I once wildly pronounced it "Nigroo," to our mutual dismay. But we both behaved well upon these lapses, quite as if they had not occurred, and proceeded as nice as you please.

"In my opinion," he said, "the South made its biggest mistake—because they hated to do it out of our love and affection for the Nigras—but our mistake is in talking states' rights instead of anthropology."

"THE moderates" (and here Barrett used the term as it is widely understood in Mississippi, as equivalent to Communists or other enemies of order and freedom), "prophets of gloom and doom, say it's coming—we gotta accept it. I think if the Nigra is able to live on an equal footing after the troops leave, then we are wrong—wrong when we say the Nigra is not capable.

"Yes'm, I expect there'll have to be an occupation before there'll be integration in Mississippi, and the Kennedy twins are ruthless enough to do it without batting an eye if they're re-elected. It would probably be the most tragic thing that could happen to our beloved state. But afterward, when the troops leave . . ." Here he explained that white resistance to the troops would be so adamant that upon their despairing withdrawal, "everything would be just like before, only the poor Nigras would lose all the friendship and goodwill they had."

Barrett's uncle is a cotton planter and head of the Citizens' Council in Lexington and his father is a founder. Don himself is "a sort of honorary member" because he "wanted to give my $5," though he is under the usually accepted age. Contemplating the possibility of Negro political control in the Delta through its 65 to 70 per cent Negro majority—"although it would never happen" — Barrett said such a regime "without white man's control would be chaos."

"If we turned politics over to them, we'd have another Congo. It's not wild like that under the patient, restraining hand of the white man, when they behave reasonably well.

"Do anything to us? I don't think so, no'm. I don't believe the Nigras, if they got control, would have any reason to hurt people who have nurtured and cared for them, but it would be chaos. Yes, out of their incompetence. The economy would collapse, and it would be like Reconstruction. You remember the Nigras in power in Reconstruction were voting themselves carriages and all kind of luxuries. It wouldn't be out of malice—they're a kindly people—but out of inability to run things. The Southern code of hospitality, gentleness, kindness—they've learned it and accepted it. . . .

"IF the majority of Nigras with the vote there"—this was in reference to Charles City County, Va.—"haven't taken over, it's because they haven't got the initiative. But look at Memphis. Nigras are 32 per cent of the electorate. They're beginning to control politics, and Memphis is beginning to look like a dirty Northern city," he said in another spurt of disgust.

Barrett is also apprehensive about treatment of white women under black domination. "If the social system is thrown out of kilter, as moderates would do, there would be more danger than there is now under the patient hand of white leadership. I would certainly take up arms to protect our women. To me there is nothing more wonderful than a Southern lady. Gosh! It's really undefinable. But she's cultured, genteel, intelligent, beautiful — usually beautiful, anyway."

PATROL—Military police on duty on the University of Mississippi campus during the racial tension there a year ago.

In defense of the social and economic system, Barrett would not eat with a Negro, or call one Mr. or Mrs. or Miss, because "it's not socially acceptable, it's not done—anymore than I'd cut more than one piece of steak at a time or tuck my napkin under my chin."

NOR would he betray his manners for distinguished Negroes or for different customs in other places. In Milwaukee, where he visited an aunt and "a wonderful Yankee uncle—the only good Yankee I know," he did not desist from giving his bus seat to standing ladies, in the Mississippi way, just because it was not the usual practice in Wisconsin.

As for celebrated and accomplished Negroes, Barrett says, "more power to 'em." He cited "Gaston in Birmingham"—a millionaire Negro banker and property owner. "You can see he obviously has a very high I. Q., is well-mannered and a fine man, I'm sure. Well, it's just a combination of genes that worked out that way. But the chances are 1 in 5,000 that his children would be like that."

There are "exceptional" Negroes in Lexington, who own stores, cafes and funeral businesses, but no professionals. "We are courteous and treat them with the respect due their education," he explained. "There's none of this pushing around or 'Get outa my way' for them in stores or anywhere—or for the lowest field hand either."

Barrett scoffs at the outsiders' notion that it's deprivation and "brutality" which makes Negroes migrate from the South.

"That's ridiculous. It's economic. The Negro definitely was necessary to farming 20 years ago. My uncle owns a plantation where he had 60 families chopping cotton, borrowing money, depending on him — you know, old-style sharecropping. Ten of the 15 left live there now because they love my uncle and they depend on him, although he just needs five of 'em. But he gives them Saturday-night spending money and everything and he could say, 'Fred, go up the hill and kill me a big snake,' or 'Go cut off your head,' and Fred would do it.

"They don't help him. They're an economic liability. He supports 10 families out of love and loyalty. He's a fine fellow, president of the Tchula Citizens' Council. The others left because they had to sell their small farms—with mechanization, the Nigras can't make a profit on a little farm—and had no place to live. Now you just see old grandfathers and little bitty children, pickaninnies. The young ones have gone to Chicago.

"My girl, I talked to her on the phone and this horrible thing had happened. Houston was dead. Houston drove their tractor and she just loved him. Mr. Foose's father—that's his name, Mary's father, Mr. Foose—and Houston's father were always on the place together. Houston's father had worked for Mr. Foose's father all that time, and they loved him.

"THE Citizens' Council, Mr. Foose is a leader in it, is not like the Ku Klux Klan. We hate violence. But we are determined to keep our way of life," he declared with rapidly rising fervor. "Nobody can take it away from us, and I would die for it. I wouldn't do anything foolish, but we will not give up.

"People say Nigras are catching up—that's wonderful—but that's no justification for social change in 1963 for what might happen in 500 or 1,000 years."

Barrett is not much disturbed by the current Mississippi Negro drive to write in 15,000 or 20,000 Negro protest votes for Aaron Henry, state N.A.A.C.P. president, for governor, and the Rev. Ed King, a young, white civil-rights devotee, for lieutenant-governor, and to draw 200,000 disfranchised Negro votes in a straw election for Henry. Nor does he share outside dismay at intimidation of Negro voting aspirants — random violence, arrests of demonstrators, eviction of would-be voters from jobs and property, and a few killings.

"FEDERAL right to vote? No, the Constitution gives the states the right to say who shall vote and who shall not. There's no such thing as the right to vote. It's a privilege, earned only after qualifications set up by the state have been met. Instead of reducing voting requirements, we ought to make them more strict. I believe in the poll tax. Our $2 poll tax goes straight to the schools, white and colored.

"I don't think there's any harm in a few qualified Negroes voting. But you can't open the floodgates. I don't condone violence, but the state has the right of police power to protect the health, morals and general welfare of the people. And when feelings are running high and the spark is there, they could set off a riot.

"I think the police were right in Greenwood and Jackson [scenes of summer disorders and mass arrests of Negroes seeking the vote and other civil rights]. And about these peaceful grievances, they should not trespass on private property."

BARRETT went—"defending my state; no, not that, either, as an observer"—to the University of Mississippi upon the entrance of James Meredith to the university. He drove to Oxford with a friend, without his father's permission.

"I was close enough to the marshals to see what was happening," he related. "Some of the boys were armed, and one man was standing by the Y Building shooting out street lights with a .22 rifle. The students were jeering and sneering and occasionally tossing a cigarette butt at the marshals. All of a sudden, McShane [Chief U. S. Marshal James Joseph McShane] said, 'Gas 'em!' and from a clear blue sky, a patrolman got hit in the head, from behind, and knocked down by a marshal throwing tear gas—that metal case hit him.

"Barnett [Gov. Ross Barnett] made a mistake. That Sunday, if he'd issued a call to white males of Mississippi to stand firm at the gate, why, you'd have seen 600,000 men mustered at the gate. I know all of Holmes County would have come, except a couple of scalawags.

"I didn't attack the marshals, and I was not armed, it was not my place to. But if Governor Barnett had called the Citizens' Councils and other responsible citizens, and had said, 'Come, it is Armageddon, get your gun'—well, I certainly would. Yes, ma'am!

"Oxford seemed to me a nightmare. I felt I was not in the United States, but in Budapest or a Warsaw ghetto. If that was American action, then God save us."

If whites and Negroes attend schools together, he wonders "what's to keep little white Mary from bringing home little black Johnny from school some day, and that leads to mixed dating and mixed marriages."

Would either of his sisters grow up to choose a Negro husband? "Heavenly days, no! But girls who haven't had the upbringing would if we change the social order."

He considers Cleve McDowell, the Negro recently expelled from the University of Mississippi for carrying a gun, as "more dangerous than Meredith. The way he behaved, like I've heard people say, 'he's a good Nigra, he just wants an education.' And that would lead to acceptance. He behaved like a nigger, he would open doors, he had good manners and he scuffed his feet and held his head down. So, he could be the leak in the dike, and then the dams burst.

"Of course, Meredith was the most segregated Nigra in the United States. He was ignored. Yes." (He laughed in appreciation of the placard rhymes which appeared on the campus: "Ignore the Nigger with Vigor" and "Nigger-free in '63.") "Ole Miss has never really been integrated."

BARRETT was "not much impressed" by the Negro March on Washington. "It wasn't any different from what I see Saturday night in Lexington when they come to town to get drunk and cut up, except they're happier in Lexington." He smiled here at the remembered spectacle of Lexington police warning the tipsy Fred, "Now, Fred, how many times I got to tell you?" and at Fred's shuffling, laughing promise to stay sober.

He described Negro pleasure in Government "'modities"—the surplus foods that they get on welfare—and the willingness of "many, many, many" simply to collect relief and "'modities" rather than work. All the Negroes on the Barrett place "get real butter and cheese" from the welfare, and "we use oleo."

Barrett, a 96-average student in high school and on a scholarship at Ole Miss, would vote for Governor Barnett, "the most courageous leader of our time," for "dictator or anything." He is now more proud of being a Mississippian than an American, and laments our "Federal power, a crushing force, a rampage," under which we're "no longer the land of the free." He also deplores foreign policy which, with the United Nations, "is destroying the only pro-West governments in Africa. Katanga and the Union of South Africa, we stab them in the back."

He takes a grisly view of Federal aid to states and localities. His story is "not original," but he compares Federal aid to the starving hunter who whacked off part of his famished dog's tail, ate off the meat, and threw the bone to the beast. Whereupon the "whimpering dog," like recipients of Federal aid, gratefully "licked the hunter's hand."

SPOKESMAN—Don Barrett in his room at home in Lexington, Miss.

FOR all his lordly and loving attachment to Negro friends, Barrett sees an eventual solution in the departure of all Negroes for the North "to live on welfare," since the planters and automated land no longer need them. He also believes the Delta will be "forever agrarian," though partly industrialized with small, imported industries employing whites in a prosperous blend of his beloved old way of life and new Yankee paychecks.

This, then, is the romantic tradition and reactionary passion with which the young segregationists of a dwindling old South face the nonviolent Negro revolution. In love with the life long gone, they stand embattled, fighting change with talk of old times, planter-rulers and good servants happy in subjection.

FORMER ATLANTANS INVOLVED

Republican Congressman Charges Interracial Organization Set Up To Get Defense Dept. Contracts

A Republican Congressman from Michigan has charged that a civil rights research group, whose executive vice president is a former Atlanta integration leader, seems to have been set up to cash in on President Kennedy's antidiscrimination drive and five weeks after its formation was awarded a $106,000 contract from the Defense Department.

The Congressman, A. E. Johansen, R-Mich., made the charge before a House subcommittee inquiring into "reverse" racial discrimination.

The organization under scrutiny is the Potomic Institute whose executive vice president is Harold C. Fleming, former director of the interracial Southern Regional Council. Mr. Fleming resigned the post to go to Washington as the active executive of the Patomic Institute when it was formed.

According to testimony given before the sub-committee, Mr. Fleming's organization was recommended to the Defense Department by Philip Hammer, an economics consultant. Mr. Hammer is well known here in Atlanta as the father of the "Plan of Improvement." He came to Atlanta from Washington in the mid-1940's and resided here until last year when he returned to Washington.

Representative Albert W. Watson, of South Carolina, charged that the Potomic Institute was "a paper corporation" with no staff, except Mr. Fleming when is received its first contract from the Defense Department.

He charged that the institute obtained the contract because of Mr. Fleming's friendship with Mr. Hammer.

Earlier testimony revealtd that Mr. Hammer had been hired as a consultant on a daily basis by the Defense Department in the Spring of 1961 when racial employment problems came up at Lockheed with 32 complaints receied.
ceived.

In his charge against the Potomic Institute, the Michigan Congressman said that it (the organization) was set up about fie weeks before it was rtcommended for the $106,000 job. He said it appeared that Potomic officials might have known that a field was opening up for race relations work for the federal government and that the insititute looked to hime like "a product of planned parenthood."

The institute has had three contracts. Two related to recommendations for implementing the equal employment program among defense contractors in private industry. The third concerned ending job bias within the Defense Department.

The Potomic Institute, according to public records, was set up as a nonprofit organization working "to eliminate discrimination and to advance equal opportunity for all Americans."

The Southern Regional Council, which Fleming headed for a number of years, has long been a controersial organization for its race-mixing policies. It has largely been supported by grants from the Fund of the Republic, a Ford Foundation offshoot. The SRC staff is recognized as containing a number of ultra-liberals. Its work has been highly praised by many interracial groups.

THE NATIONA

A Changing View Of Civil Rights For Mr. Johnson

Free of the Sectional Ties, President Is Now Able To Take Up the Fight

"The (segregation) issue . . . is one that has been settled in a number of different forms by the courts and the executive agencies. Congress is no longer a meaningful forum for such debate."

—Sen. Lyndon B. Johnson, Sept. 2, 1955.

President Lyndon B. Johnson professed another view last week. "It is time now . . . to enact a civil-rights law so that we can move forward to eliminate from this nation every trace of discrimination and oppression based upon race or color," he told Congress.

When Mr. Johnson spoke in 1955, he was speaking to Texas voters, almost always white, usually segregationist, and the base of his considerable power as Senate majority leader.

No longer dependent upon Texas alone for public office, the President was talking eight years later to the nation's voters. One may suspect, he was also giving passing thought to 1964, when he must go before the national electorate to keep the office given him by an assassin's rifle fire. No Presidential nominee from a major party in recent history has felt he could win a majority of that electorate without a strong civil-rights stand.

No Sudden Change

Mr. Johnson has been thinking about that electorate for a long time. And his pro-civil rights stance last week wasn't a posture assumed quickly upon accession to the Presidency. It has been evolving since about the time he was making the 1955 comments.

On July 2 of that year Mr. Johnson was forced into inactivity by a severe heart attack. There was ample time for reflection as he lounged and read on his big Texas ranch. There are strong indications that he began to think seriously about seeking the Democratic Presidential nomination.

He knew neither major party, since the Civil War, had nominated a Southerner for the Presidency. Even as late as 1958 he was pooh-poohing any idea of seeking the job, saying he didn't believe a Southerner would be nominated in his lifetime or, if he were, would win election.

Despite this sort of talk, Lyndon Johnson had changed enough in 1955 to suggest that he thought a Southerner might win if he could build himself into a major national figure and play down his Southern background.

The Texas Image

This, for Mr. Johnson, was difficult. He is almost a living caricature of a Texan, big, drawling, backslapping, wary of anything he cannot see or feel, and uneasy around scholars.

But he began to change. Mrs. Elizabeth Carpenter, a reporter who knew him well and who is now press aide to Mrs. Johnson, sensed the change after the 1955 illness.

"Instead of the desegregation issue, Johnson talks of the steps in the struggle of minorities for status," she wrote. "He has come to appreciate the world of such thinkers in the Senate as Paul Douglas of Illinois or J. William Fulbright of Arkansas, men he once was apt to scorn as ineffective intellectuals."

At about this time, he began talking less to Texans about the Federal projects that were coming to Texas. He quit tabulating the Federal dollars being spent in Texas, with the implication that he was responsible for them. He started speaking more of helping foreign allies, more of building up the Air Force.

First Step in 82 Years

In 1957, as majority leader, he maneuvered through the Senate a civil-rights bill that was to become law. Though the measure had been shorn of most of its toughest provisions before Mr. Johnson took it under his wing, it was the first civil-rights law in 82 years.

"I am aware of the implication of my vote," he told the Senate in backing the measure. "It will be treated cynically in some quarters and misunderstood in others. But the Senate has dealt fairly and justly with this measure. This is legislation which is good for every state of the Union, and as far as I am concerned, Texas has been part of the Union since Appomattox. . . . The measure now before us seeks to resolve the problems of 1957 and not reopen the wounds of 1865."

In 1960, however, Johnson voted against cutting off a Senate filibuster on civil-rights legislation. And his vote on labor legislation was almost always opposite the wishes of organized labor leaders.

When he made his move for the Presidential nomination in 1960, he didn't have the delegates, though he had managed to keep most of the South with him despite his civil-rights stand.

John F. Kennedy did have the delegates and when he won the nomination, he accepted Mr. Johnson on the ticket as the Vice Presidential nominee.

Union leaders and many Negro leaders were appalled by the selection. Walter Reuther of the United Auto Workers objected vigorously. And now Lyndon Johnson, the man who had tried to soften his ties with the South, got the job of delivering the South to the Democrats. He was moderately successful and the election was so close that it was possible to say that he had delivered the margin of victory. But then Negroes in the big Northern cities could make the same claim.

The most violent reaction to campaigner Johnson had come from some of his fellow Texans. Four days before the 1960 election, a crowd had intercepted Mr. and Mrs. Johnson in a Dallas hotel. Jeering, booing, and calling Mr. Johnson a "Judas," they prevented the couple from moving on for a half hour.

Once in the White House, Mr. Kennedy put Vice President Johnson to work as chairman of the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity. Mr. Johnson cajoled many Southern industrialists with defense contracts into hiring some Negroes. And he spoke up vigorously throughout the country for the Kennedy civil-rights proposals he was again endorsing last week.

Cautious Acceptance

Negroes, ever wary of Southerners bearing civil rights, were slow to regard the Johnson conversion as genuine. But they did begin to come around. And last week both Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the NAACP, and Dr. Martin Luther King could speak of President Johnson with guarded enthusiasm.

Labor leaders have been much slower to warm to Mr. Johnson. A few weeks before Mr. Kennedy's death, a man close to labor councils said that about the most union chiefs could say for Mr. Johnson was that he was preferable to any Republican in sight. But last week Mr. Reuther could find Mr. Johnson's address to Congress "masterful, moving, and statesmanlike."

Mr. Johnson made quick overtures to the South after becoming President. He invited Gov. Carl Sanders of Georgia to sit in the Johnson family section of the House during the President's speech to Congress. (Another occupant of the section: Mrs. Zephyr Wright, the Johnsons' Negro cook.)

"The people are behind him," said Mr. Sanders after chatting later with the President. He added quickly that this does not mean he supports the Johnson civil-rights proposals.

Accent on the South

Rep. John William Davis, another Georgia Democrat, measured Mr. Johnson by, among other things, his accent. "The former President's clipped Boston accent never lost its strangeness on Southern ears, while the Texas drawl of President Johnson sounds almost exactly the same as a person from Georgia," said Mr. Davis, and when he discovered some Johnson kinfolk came from Georgia, it was enough to make the lawmaker think the President might somehow make civil rights palatable. "Though he has espoused the cause of civil rights on the national level, he . . . carries to the White House for the first time a personal knowledge of that peculiar give and take which has sprung up between the white and colored people in the South through generations of experience—a whole body of customs and folkways that has been completely foreign to every occupant of the White House over the past 100 years," said Mr. Davis.

The political opposition from the state of Washington is keenly aware of Mr. Johnson. Said William Walter, the Washington state GOP chairman: "This is the guy we feared in 1960 and we fear him now. . . . He is not a regional or parochial man but not in the Kennedy image either, though he will have to follow the Kennedy image to be elected."

Shrewdness and Ability

Philip J. Kuehn, a Barry Goldwater man from Milwaukee and former Wisconsin Republican state chairman, thought Mr. Johnson would get more accomplished than Mr. Kennedy because of his "political shrewdness and sagacity and . . . (ability) to get along better with Congress. . . . He will give any Republican a tough battle."

As Lyndon Johnson entered the Presidency, he appeared to be having his political cake and eating it too.

But he is barely into the Presidential crucible. The crucible is only beginning to warm over fires fueled by politicians, domestic and foreign; by nuclear energy sufficient to destroy mankind, and the friction generated by the diverse interests of 190,000,000 Americans.

The Lyndon Johnson who emerges from that crucible and stands before the electorate next Nov. 3 will, for better or worse, not be the same shaken man who became President at 1 p.m. Nov. 22 in Dallas, Texas.

The Boycott: Boon or a Bane To Integration?

Some Negroes Question New School Tactic; Results Debatable

Is boycotting schools to win racial disputes good strategy? Negro groups, which last week continued to employ the technique, are beginning to wonder. But whites in an Alabama county are finding that boycotts have helped them evade school integration.

Integrationists staged boycotts in three communities, Cincinnati, Cambridge, Md., and Chester, Pa., with questionable results. And plans went forward for boycotts later this month in Boston and Chicago, and one in New York City in March or April.

The theory behind the Negro boycotts is simple. Many schools in Northern cities have a majority of Negro students because they are in Negro neighborhoods. To dramatize the problem, children stay out of school for one day.

Why Results Were Inconclusive

Although Cambridge's problems are more in line with those generated by Southern segregation, Negroes there adopted the boycott as part of their continuing integration campaign. Results last week were inconclusive because the boycott coincided with a three-inch snowfall. School officials said only 40 per cent of the Negro students stayed home; Negro leaders said the figure was at least 75 per cent. They were pleased.

Integration leaders in Chester, an industrial city near Philadelphia, said 60 per cent of the Negro students stayed home. The schools said only that 30 per cent of all students were absent. Negro leaders in Cincinnati said 80 per cent of the Negro students were absent; school officials set the total of absentees at 35 per cent.

Some New York Negroes question the wisdom of a second boycott in that city. Their first was Feb. 3, when half a million school children stayed home. Normally there are 100,000 daily absences.

The Rev. Filton Galamison, a Presbyterian minister who heads the City-Wide Committee for Integrated Schools, chose the period for the next boycott—sometime between March 9 and April 17—to coincide with the period when the state takes attendance figures to plan its financial assistance to New York schools.

Some Call It Suicide

The Rev. Mr. Galamison reasons the boycott will be much more effective if it attacks the city's pocketbooks, and is not merely a demonstration. His opponents in the civil-rights movement call the plan suicide; less money for the city's schools, they maintain, aggravates the problem.

But the Brooklyn minister withstood the criticism. An effort to hold new elections for committee leaders failed, and the boycott will go on as planned. All that remains is to set a more definite date.

Still, many Negroes remain dissatisfied. The committee is composed of several civil-rights groups. Last week the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) withdrew from the committee. In a vague announcement, it said the 13 NAACP chapters in New York City would participate in the boycott under conditions set by them with their own plans.

In a vague announcement, it said the 13 NAACP chapters in New York City would participate in the boycott under conditions set by them with their own plans.

Opposing Another Boycott

In Chicago, the Co-ordinating Council of Community Organizations (CCCO) is planning that city's second boycott for Feb. 25. The first was held last Oct. 22, when nearly 250,000 students stayed home. Several member organizations in the CCCO oppose a second boycott. These include the NAACP, the Chicago Urban League, and six of the eight aldermen representing Negro wards. The aldermen formed their own group, the Assembly to End Prejudice, Injustice, and Poverty.

School boards in the North have come up with varying plans for obtaining more balance among the races, but none goes far enough to suit integration leaders.

Negroes who question the boycott technique note that it hasn't caused school officials to budge. And many Negroes fear that, far from accomplishing anything, the boycotts have disrupted their children's schooling, which the whole strategy was devised to improve.

The strategy of the white boycotts in Macon County, Alabama, has been decidedly more successful. They began last September, when a Federal court ordered integration of Tuskegee High School. White students left, leaving 12 Negroes. The state school board closed the school, saying it cost too much to operate.

A Federal judge then ordered one of the county schools, Shorter High School, to take 6 of the 12 Negroes remaining at Tuskegee, and he ordered Macon County High School in Notasulga to take the other 6. White students boycotted Shorter. When the six Negroes showed up at Notasulga earlier this month, Mayor James "Kayo" Rea forbade them to enter.

All last week neither whites nor Negroes attended school in Notasulga. On Thursday Federal Judge Frank M. Johnson, Jr., ordered Mr. Rea to let the Negroes into the schools. When the six Negro students showed up for classes Friday, they were alone.

2 SNCC Backers Here Once Identified as Reds

By BILL SHIPP
Constitution State News Editor

The tax-exempt Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee counts among its active supporters at least two faculty members of Atlanta Negro colleges who have been identified by an FBI undercover agent in public hearings before the House Committee on Un-American Activities as Communist party members.

Several other SNCC workers have been involved in Communist party-related activities.

Thirty-five-year-old James Forman of Chicago, executive secretary of SNCC, refused to discuss any possible relationship between SNCC and subversive activities.

SNCC, a national antisegregation organization with headquarters here, has spearheaded recent "direct action" demonstrations in Atlanta which resulted in violence, mass arrests and a resurgence of Ku Klux Klan activity.

AMONG THOSE arrested in the demonstrations was Mrs. Isobel Cerney, a teacher of public speaking and English at Morris Brown College.

Mrs. Anita Bell Schneider, an undercover agent for the FBI, identified Mrs. Isobel Cerney as a Communist party member in July, 1955, at hearings of the House Committee on Un-American Activities in San Diego, committee records show.

Committee files contain substantial information concerning Mrs. Isobel Cerney's activities in civil rights drives and in pro-Communist programs.

Committee records show that on Oct. 10, 1952, The Washington Star reported in a Tokyo-datelined story headlined "Two Americans Blast U.S. at Peiping 'Peace Parley:"

"The Chinese Communist radio said yesterday two Americans joined the anti-American campaign in speeches at the Communist-called Asian and Pacific 'peace' conference in Peiping. The two were identified as Mrs. Isobel Cerney, San Francisco writer and former labor schoolteacher. . . ."

THE SHANGHAI NEWS of Oct. 12, 1952, published excerpts from the "Supplementary Report on Korean Question by Mrs. Isobel Cerney," datelined Peking. She was quoted:

"Unable to defeat the people names when booked.

The day following Mrs. Cerney's arrest a Soviet Union Peace Committee came to Atlanta at the invitation of the Committee for Non-Violent Action (CNVA).

(Eighteen members of CNVA are in jail in Albany on several charges after they attempted to march through the city "on the way to Cuba." According to Bradford Lyttle, coordinator for the march, three marchers are "former" members of SNCC and several others are "inactive members" of Fair Play for Cuba.)

Lyttle left the march to return to Atlanta to greet the Soviet Peace Committee at Atlanta University. Their host was Dr. Harry C. Steinmetz, professor of psychology.

DURING THEIR visit to Atlanta, according to Lyttle, the Soviet Peace Committee was taken "by Leb's" and to City Hall "in hopes of viewing a demonstration." They also visited The Atlanta Constitution.

(Lyttle said the U.S. State Department at first had denied the Soviet Peace group's application for a visa, but he said pressure was brought to bear by "important people," whom he declined to name, and the visas were approved.)

Dr. Harry C. Steinmetz, host to the Russians, was identified as a Communist party member in a hearing of the House Committee on Un-American Activities by Anne Kinney on Dec. 22, 1952.

He was identified as a party member at a hearing again on Dec. 6, 1956, by Anita Schneider, the FBI undercover agent. Steinmetz testified before the House committee on April 7, 1953, and refused to affirm or deny party membership. He testified again on July 6, 1955, and took First and Fifth Amendments in refusing to answer questions concerning party membership prior to 1940. He denied that he was a party member at the time of his appearance.

The People's World, a Communist party newspaper, announced a lecture by Dr. Steinmetz in 1959 at the American Russian Institute of San Francisco. This institute was cited as subversive by the U.S. attorney general in 1948, records show.

NEITHER Mrs. Cerney nor Dr. Steinmetz are recognized leaders of SNCC, but both are considered to be ardent supporters of SNCC activities.

In October, 1962, Dr. Steinmetz, other Atlanta University faculty members and SNCC members established a picket line in Hurt Park to protest President John F. Kennedy's blockade of Cuba and his demand that Soviet missiles be withdrawn from the island.

Besides Forman, the recognized leaders of SNCC and its Atlanta campaign include Chairman John Lewis of Troy, Ala., one of the "original freedom riders" and organizer of demonstrations in Nashville in 1962-63; Atlanta Coordinator Prathia Hall of Philadelphia, who has been active in SNCC activities in Albany and Terrell County; Field Secretary Debbie Amis, also of Philadelphia.

According to Forman, SNCC was formed Feb. 1, 1960, when four students carried out a sit-in demonstration in Greensboro, N.C. Forman established national headquarters—or "The Central Office" as SNCC members refer to it—in Atlanta in September, 1961.

BEFORE BEGINNING large-scale demonstrations here, Forman participated in desegregation drives in nine other cities including Birmingham, Cambridge, Md.; Albany, Ga., and Cairo, Ill.

Forman says SNCC has about 145 paid employes scattered over the Southeast.

According to Forman, money for SNCC's campaigns come from 18 "Friends of SNCC" organizations established throughout the nation.

The Atlanta-based Southern Regional Council, a research organization, also has contributed funds to SNCC, according to Forman.

The Southern Regional Council reported this week that since April 1, 1962, it had contributed $23,884 to SNCC through its Voter Education Project.

Wiley A. Branton, director of VEP, said it is required that his organization's funds be restricted "solely to voter registration activity. . . . There have been instances where SNCC wanted to engage in other activities and has withdrawn from voter registration activity. This has been the case in southwest Georgia during the past several months.

"SNCC is not currently doing any voter registration work under VEP auspices in the State of Georgia, and has not received any funds for voter registration in Georgia in the past several months," Branton added.

SNCC also has realized an unspecified amount of money from a recording of "Freedom Songs," and "Freedom Songbook" compiled by Guy and Candie Carawan, and by concerts given by folk-singer Pete Seeger.

The House Committee on Un-American Activities lists "no evidence" of Communist party membership for Seeger, but, according to committee records, he has been associated with nine Communist-front organizations.

Guy Carawan was listed by The Worker, a Communist newspaper, on Sept. 15, 1957, as one of the winners of first prize in the International Talent Competition at the festival in Moscow, according to the House committee records. The article in The Worker also reported at the time that Carawan was "now traveling in China as part of the group of 41 Americans who defied the threats of the State Department and decided to see the world for themselves.

port on Korean Question by Mrs. Isobel Cerney," datelined Peking. She was quoted:

"Unable to defeat the people of Korea and the volunteers of China on the field of battle, our generals have resorted to underhanded, mean and dirty misuse of modern science. Launching of bacteriological warfare of which we, who have seen the Exhibition here in Peking have not the slightest doubt, is a preview of what another war would mean."

Mrs. Isobel Cerney in the report termed the Korean War a "barbarism being committed in the name of our people . . . we have been active in trying to halt this war which is without meaning, without justice, without reason."

MRS. CERNEY said in Atlanta Friday night the statements attributed to her were accurate. She said she visited Red China as a member of the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, a group founded by Jane Addams. Mrs. Cerney said she still is convinced that the United States carried out bacterialogical warfare against the Red Chinese.

Mrs. Cerney, who said she ran for the U.S. Senate on the Progressive party ticket in California in 1954, said "Atlanta doesn't need to get itself off on how controversial Isobel Cerney is or isn't. Atlanta must think about its children . . . and why there is violence."

She said she went to China for the same reason that many Northern white students are in Atlanta to help destroy discrimination — "for peace and friendship."

ASKED IF she were a Communist, Mrs. Cerney replied, "I have been asked that question many times through the years. And this is my answer: 'I believe sincerely in freedom of conscience.' "

House committee reports cover Mrs. Cerney's activities through 1961.

Mrs. Cerney participated in SNCC-led desegregation demonstrations at Leb's restaurant Jan. 25 and Jan. 27.

She was arrested Jan. 27 at Leb's on a charge of disorderly conduct, Atlanta police records show.

Police Supt. Jimmy Brown said Mrs. Cerney refused to identify herself when she was booked.

ARRESTED the same day with Mrs. Cerney were James T. Bishop, 27, professor of chemistry, and his wife, Gloria, 21; Morris Eisenstein, professor of social work in the Atlanta University complex; his wife, Fannie, and their two children, ages 8 and 12, police records show.

Government Control In Civil Rights Disguise

Many of the provisions in the civil rights bill, as passed by the House, give government bureaus and agencies almost complete control over private businesses and labor unions despite the fact that a number of melancholy, so-called liberal columnists keeping writing that "it guarantees to the Negroes only rights which they have been denied for almost 100 years."

In a bill drawn supposedly to eliminate discrimination the word "discrimination" is not defined in the new law, thus leaving it up to enforcement agencies and bureaus, we suppose, to define "discrimination."

The bill clearly discriminates against privately-owned business and service firms, labor unions and in one section atheists. (It should be remembered that only recently the federal courts ruled that an atheist could not be prevented from claiming to be a conscientious objector under the "equal protection" clause of the 14th amendment.)

Many of the provisions contained in the new law have already been declared unconstitutional by the United States Supreme Court . . . and haven't we been told over and over again that a Supreme Court decision is "the supreme law of the land" and can be changed only by a Constitutional Amendment?

However, we just as well face it . . . the present members of the Supreme Court have taken it upon themselves to amend the Constitution by overthrowing prior decisions of other members of that Court whose decisions must not have been "the supreme law of the land."

If this bill passes the Senate as sent over from the House, American people in every walk of life, including many Congressmen and Senators who supported it, will rue the day and many of them privately admit it.

However, this is a national election year and a majority of the Congressmen and Senators, it seems, are more interested in the election than they are in Constitutional government.

Meanwhile, riots and unlawful activities continue in the streets of many of our cities; upstart, dictatorship-controlled new nations continue to insult and slap Uncle Sam in the face while we pour millions of tax dollars into their treasuries; Castro makes us look silly; and Panama thumbs her nose at us.

These events are not important to those who are fighting for the bloc votes in the upcoming Presidential election. Politics must come first with them.

Politics must be served.

SIGN OF ULTIMATE HEALTH

Negro Greets White Backlash

By MYRON FEINSILBER

NEW YORK, May 9 (UPI)—White impatience with Negro demonstrations is hurting the Negro cause and conceivably even could put a segregationist in the White House, Negro leader Whitney M. Young Jr. believes. Nevertheless, he welcomes "the white backlash"—as inevitable.

Young, executive director of the National Urban League, sees the alienation of some previously indifferent whites as one step closer to a final confrontation by the nation of the Negroes' demands. For two reasons he believes it is an ultimately healthy sign:

—The alienated white at least recognizes the Negro as a human being. "The Negro can stand hatred," Young says, "but he can not take indifference."

—The rising tensions on both sides will one day produce a crisis and the crisis must come before America will act. "Historically, America has only reacted from crisis," he says.

"Things may get worse before they get better," Young said in an interview, and by worse he meant worse for the Negro. But the Negro will win his battle, he said, because he has no choice but to go on fighting. "He has nothing to lose because he has nothing."

"THE WHITE power structure has been engaging in civil disobedience for 200 years and now the Negro is engaging in it. But the difference between the two is the Negro is willing to go to jail while the white segregationist is not."

Young, 42, Kentucky born and educated in Kentucky, Massachusetts and Minnesota, a former college dean, is considered a moderate among Negro leaders, although he prefers the term "responsible."

He does not pretend the 25 per cent of the vote won in Wisconsin's primary by Alabama Gov. George C. Wallace, running against the civil rights bill, was anything but reaction by whites against Negro demonstrations—an expression of the white backlash.

White civil rights advocates have expressed fear that the backlash may make it harder to pass civil rights legislation. They fear it could make all politicians more cautious about advancing the status of the Negroes and that it could lead to removal of civil rights measures already on the books in some places.

YOUNG SEES white America before 1963, "the year of confrontation," as divided into three blocs: 10 per cent activity for Negro equality, 10 per cent actively hostile and 80 per cent "actively indifferent."

And the phenomenon America is now witness to, he believes, is the taking of sides by the 80 per cent. This means some of them are going to join what, for him, is the enemy camp.

That is all right, he said, because white indifference "kills the Negro."

"The Negro says 'Look at me. You may love me or hate me, you will have to recognize me.' " To force whites to recognize him as a human being is one reason the Negro demonstrates, Young said.

Those who say the Negro has pushed too far too fast, he said, "It is not enough for the Javits and the Humphreys and the Johnsons to congratulate us for stopping this, or for conducting a dignified march on Washington," he said. "Now we know what the whites are against. What are they for?"

Responsible Negro leaders must produce victories or leadership will go to the extremists, he said.

"It is futile to think that anybody can counsel a mother living in a hovel — four kids in two rooms, rats, her husband unemployed — to practice moderation. You can't tell her she's alienating people."

"For 200 years," he argues, "We Negroes have been treated as a group throughout history."

"We brought in Hungarian refugees for preferential treatment. America gave preferential treatment to Alaskans when disaster struck. Disaster has struck the Negro."

Young has proposed a domestic "Marshall Plan" to produce economic equality for Negroes —a massive program of public works, quality education, housing and job retraining. Passage of the civil rights bill is vital, he told a House committee last month, but "We might end up with a mouthful of civil rights and an empty stomach, living in a hovel. . . . We will either help Negro citizens become productive, constructive consumers or they will automatically become destructive, disgruntled dependents."

TIME AND again, in speeches and in interviews, Young comes back to an incident last winter on New York's Tri-Boro Bridge. It seems to haunt him.

Six demonstrators halted rush-hour traffic on the bridge for 20 minutes before they were hauled away by police.

The demonstration was deplored by liberals, because they feared it would feed the white backlash and Young deplores it too because he feels it was futile.

"The vile language of the commuters — delayed 20 minutes from their martinis at home — would have made the White Citizens Council in Mississippi green with envy," he said. "They threw lug wrenches at the demonstrators — who were, incidentally, three educated, intelligent white persons and three uneducated, illiterate Negroes.

"The incident is worth analysis. The commuters didn't just learn that language.

"The demonstration was a confrontation. It brought true feelings to the surface. So the Negro lost some friends that day, but the white man — for the first time — had to recognize him as a person. He was no longer a lamppost, a cog in the industrial machine.

"We can stand hate, but we cannot stand indifference. From there we can go on. We can take your good-will or your ill will—but no will, will kill us."

Leontyne Price and May 17, 1954

A few years ago, when soprano Leontyne Price was first creating such a sensation at the Metropolitan Opera in New York, one of the Met executives was asked when Atlantans could see and hear her.

"When she can ride in an unsegregated taxi from the airport, and stay in an unsegregated hotel and eat in an unsegregated restaurant," he replied.

These things have come to pass now, more or less. Miss Price may still have needed a sort of road map or discrimination guide to know where she couldn't eat. A private club or two may have made none-too-subtle changes in their arrangements for their annual opera parties so as to save their members the "embarrassment" of Miss Price's skin color. But on the whole, Atlanta has paid for its admission ticket.

And so last Thursday night, 5,000 people had the chance to judge Miss Price for themselves. What happened has already been reported. In a dozen years of attending Met performances here, I cannot recall a comparable explosion of applause. Nor do I think I have heard a more lovely voice.

As I listened to that hauntingly beautiful presentation, I thought: This is the real story of racial progress in America; this is the real celebration of the tenth anniversary of Brown v. Board of Education; this is what the struggle is really about.

How much Americans have cheated themselves in the past by denying themselves the Leontyne Prices. How much poorer we have been for cutting off the potential contributions of so many millions of people. How sad and curious it will seem to those who read the history of our days that we even set up elaborate barriers of custom and law to deny ourselves these gifts.

This chance for the individual to be judged on ability, not accident of birth, is what the racial struggle really concerns at its heart. It will not be solved alone by law. No Supreme Court edict brought Leontyne Price here. Neither, it should be added, did any street demonstrations.

The greatest significance of May 17, 1954, was that it nudged our consciences and our good sense; it made us look at what we were doing to our fellow men—and to ourselves. And hopefully, despite occasional set-backs and no little muleheadedness, we are learning that as we open our eyes, we open our hearts.

BRUCE GALPHIN.

him, is the enemy camp.

That is all right, he said, because white indifference "kills the Negro."

"The Negro says 'Look at me. You may love me or hate me, you will have to recognize me.'" To force whites to recognize him as a human being is one reason the Negro demonstrates, Young said.

Those who say the Negro has pushed too far too fast, he said are hypocrites. "I resent those who say 'We will go without routine rights until each and every Negro conducts himself in a nice little way'," he said.

"They do not see that the large masses of Negroes have been restrained and patient. And where has it gotten them?

"The miracle is that only a few have gotten desperate. I'm amazed that more haven't resorted to shooting."

"The civil rights protest has reached the point now," he said, "that the alternative to giving Negroes equality is to kill them. 'Either free me or destroy me — but you're no longer going to be a hypocrite.' That is what the Negro is saying to America."

YOUNG WAS one of the Negro leaders who was influential in heading off the threatened stall-in on the day the World's Fair opened. For that he received congratulations, which he resents.

These Are Rights They Would Destroy

Do you believe in a trial by jury in criminal cases? The Constitution of the United States even grants a trial by jury in civil cases when the amount at issue is over $20.

Yet, the present civil rights bill does not allow a trial by jury in criminal cases brought under this law?

Do you believe that an accused person is considered innocent until proven guilty in criminal cases as is provided in the Constitution?

The present civil rights legislation assumes that an accused person is guilty unless he can prove his innocence?

Do you believe that you have the right to own, lease, rent or sell your private property as you see fit?

The present civil rights bill denies you this right and makes you a law violator if you attempt to do as you see fit.

Do you believe that you should be punished financially because someone you do not know, in another part of the state, might violate the proposed civil rights law?

You could be if it is passed.

Do you believe in free speech and a free press?

The present civil rights bill makes it unlawful to oppose the law, should it pass, by public speeches or by editorials . . . under the "aid and abet" clause.

Do you believe that the federal government should have hundreds of agents snooping into the operations of privately owned businesses?

It will if the present civil rights law is passed.

Did you know that the only protection any minority group has against quick passage of unwise or punitive laws is the "unlimited debate in the U. S. Senate?

Yet the sponsors of the present civil rights legislation would destroy this protection.

Yes, the civil rights bill will destroy all these rights. It is certainly NOT by any manner of means a law that just guarantees the Negro citizen the right to vote, as some liberal columnists would have you believe.

Most of its provisions are more aptly described civil wrongs legislation.

A lonely day: Susan Beer, seven, waits for the school bell.

INTEGRATION ...IN REVERSE

What happens when a middle-class white child enters a predominantly Negro slum school? Last fall, an integrated housing project (left) opened on the doorsteps of such a school in San Francisco. The white parents who moved in knew their children would pay some part of the tragic price of de facto school segregation, the worst nightmare in education.

THE EDUCATION OF SUSAN BEER

RAPHAEL WEILL SCHOOL stands in the heart of an old San Francisco section that has suffered a familiar city-change. As its early residents moved on, the neighborhood became a way station for new arrivals. Time and weather blemished vintage Victorian houses; the school bell rang for Jewish, then Japanese, then Negro children. Teachers stayed (some are nearing their 30th year), trying to deal with each group's unique problems and talents. By the 1950's, Raphael Weill had become, in effect, a Negro school with white teachers.

Then a miracle: As the 1963-64 school year began, St. Francis Square, an integrated housing project sponsored by the Longshoremen's Union, opened right up against the school. Project manager Revels Cayton used drive, anger and wit to keep the white families coming in. When one white woman, a CORE member, wanted to give up her apartment to a Negro family, Cayton phoned a CORE official, "Say, get her off me. Do you want this to be a ghetto so you can come picket it?" By midwinter, all 298 apartments were occupied, 54 percent by white families.

Among the white children trickling into Weill's classrooms was a winsome, sensitive seven-year-old named Susan Beer. Her father, who carries mail while working for a belated college degree, proclaims he came to St. Francis Square "because it's a good buy." But both he and his wife know the evil of racism; they fled Europe during Nazi oppression. "Segregation is wrong," Jan Beer says. "Segregation has to go. It has to."

A DIFFERENT WORLD

At home, Susan Beer is gentle and a bit dreamy. She sometimes seems slow at anything requiring physical coordination, but glows with a bright, sophisticated social sense, is a great talker and displays an inordinate fondness for language. (Her father can evoke delighted laughter by reading her erudite nonsense-passages from James Joyce's Ulysses.) School is different. Susan's new classmates bring to her the raw stuff of another world.

"Yesterday, my Daddy and Mama were sitting in the car drinking beer," a Negro girl tells the class, "so the cops came, and my Daddy didn't have a license and they put him in jail and my Mama went down to get him out, and today they have to go to court." She is lucky. Many Raphael Weill children do not have fathers to talk about.

The ghetto's ultimate lesson is hopelessness, but joy dies hard in a seven-year-old. At Table 2, Lee, grinning at the teacher's back, slips around the table, passionately wishing to swat John and get back to his place before she turns. Blond 24-year-old Jo Ann Willis turns. "How many times have I told you, Lee, to stay—in—your—seat?" Mrs. Willis, a hard worker, is exasperated. "A lot of things they teach you at college don't hold here," she says. "What can we do? All the teachers want to know."

As in many another classroom, the minutes creep. Lee sulks in the corner. The front doorknob is candy-sticky. Table 3 is noisy again. Susan sighs and shakes her head. She feels a great weariness.

Susan flings up her hand, competes with the rest of the class. The right answer admits no color line.

Her classmates move restlessly, are seldom silent. They have a quick intelligence, but it comes in a different accent.

Mrs. Willis challenges the noisy class with sudden silence. Discipline becomes a cycle, creates the need for more discipline.

"Our first mistake was ever thinking integration would be easy."

LONELINESS AND LOVE

"I try to make an effort to learn it, but it's hard when you've never, never played it in all your life." Susan was telling her mother about a variation of jump rope known as "Double Dutch," in which the child skips between two counter-rotating ropes. Nothing sharpened Susan's feeling of apartness from the other children as much as her inability to join in one of the many Double Dutch games going on during each play period. Susan would stand by for minutes at a time, asking for a turn. The other girls never meant to be unfair, but in the clash and clamor of the play yard, it was easy not to see her, not to hear her. Susan's determination would rise, and she would demand to be included. Then she would snarl the rope, and someone would leap in to take her place. "While I think Susan should be concentrating on her reading," her mother said, "all she can think about is this Double Dutch. She begs me to practice with her. She's obsessed with it." Susan is wise. She knows how well she can read.

Susan and her new classmates sometimes could not understand each other. Once, a Negro girl shouted a strange epithet at her: "Susan is black!" Then Mercy returned to her side, stayed close to her.

Susan looks for a friend. When she first entered school in November, her teacher assigned Mercy (with pigtails, right) to look after her. But then a new girl, Anna, came in from St. Francis Square, and Susan was made her partner. This blocked Susan's friendship with Mercy.

"I love Susan," Mercy said. Once during class, she reached over and touched her friend's head. She had never before felt a white girl's hair.

THE CHILDREN CAN WORK IT OUT

It started like a cancer in our Northern and Western cities—stealthy, dangerous, unacknowledged. At first, there was not even a name for it. Then came the 1954 Supreme Court decision on school desegregation, and people began calling the disease "de facto segregation," a condition caused not by law, as in the South, but by a harsh fact: the discrimination that herds Negroes into crowded ghettoes. As the ghettoes have expanded, so have the number of schools overflowing with dark faces, until now the vital cores of most large cities are segregated both at home and at school.

For years, Northern and Western educators pretended to be colorblind; their schools, for the most part, took in whatever children lived in each school's neighborhood. They left integration up to those responsible for housing. This they no longer can do. Everywhere, Negro leaders are launching their picket lines, their sit-downs, their boycotts directly against the schools, demanding that educators themselves do something—almost anything—to bring de facto segregation to an immediate end. "You ask me what problem keeps educators awake at night," school superintendent Harold Spears of San Francisco said to LOOK. "The racial question does. Educators must take a situation that they did not create and use it to improve our schools."

What is the cure? Many remedies have been suggested. Among them:

Busing. Students are driven crosstown to integrate all schools.

Open enrollment. Students may transfer to another school that has extra space, if that will help correct racial imbalance. Parents provide necessary transportation.

Controlled option. White students go to schools in their own neighborhoods, with a certain number of seats left open at every school. Negroes choose the school they will attend, up to each school's capacity.

The Princeton Plan. Two neighboring schools—one all-white, the other all-Negro—are included in a single attendance zone. Both races in half the grades go to one school; both races in the remaining grades go to the other school.

Gerrymandering. School zones are redrawn to increase integration.

Abandonment. Schools are built in locations that will insure racial balance. Old ghetto schools are abandoned.

All these remedies have at least some undesirable side effects. Most are either impractical, expensive or painful. An end to discrimination in housing would be far easier on all concerned. But that will take time. Meanwhile, many cities will most likely be forced to try such emergency measures as those listed above. As more and more Negro and white children come together in schools around the nation, parents can gain guidance from what has happened during the first school year at St. Francis Square.

After discomfort and pain comes love

The earliest casualty was a certain amount of naïve idealism. One white woman who moved to the project "for the obvious reason—idealism," had a peculiar experience when she first took her children to school. "I suddenly realized I was asking them to do something I was not doing myself. I walked home with a sinking feeling. I saw a headline about a plane crash, and I remember thinking, 'Well, at least my children are alive.' That was silly. I found out all the things I worried about haven't happened, and I find I'm getting benefits I never dreamed of. I misjudged the situation and underestimated my children. That's one fringe benefit—knowing how wonderful they are."

Indeed, the children have managed with much less fuss than the parents. There have been no "race riots." There has been no concerted persecution of the white minority by the Negro majority. "Just leave the kids alone," Revels Cayton said, "and they'll work things out."

How about educational standards? The white children have no monopoly on brains, and in many Raphael Weill classes, the brightest student is a Negro. It is true, however, that on an average the Negro children have had poorer educational backgrounds (some are recent arrivals from the South) and fewer learning opportunities at home than the white children from St. Francis Square. Yet the learning rate of white children has not plummeted. While some white parents feel their children are learning more slowly than before, most judge the progress to be about the same. A few say their children are better off. Raphael Weill and other San Francisco slum schools have special programs in reading, language and the like, financed partly by the Ford Foundation. "Compensatory education" of this type is gaining favor throughout the country.

Still, no simple prescriptions emerge from St. Francis Square. Its white residents left pat answers behind when they moved into a place surrounded by slums. "I thought I had my attitude on race all figured out before I moved here," a mother of three girls told LOOK. "Oh, I was so smug. It all seemed so easy. But now . . . you walk through slums every day, and your conscience is taking a pounding all the time. You start feeling, not just thinking. You wonder how you ever could have approached the wrongs of segregation coolly and intellectually."

"At the beginning, true integration brings a certain amount of pain to both races," San Francisco psychiatrist Price Cobbs, who is a Negro, told LOOK. "As long as Negroes and whites regard each other as symbols, nothing happens. What is needed is confrontation. By that, I mean an honest meeting on a personal level, a stripping away of your comfortable thoughts about yourself and your stereotypes about someone else. Until that abrasive experience occurs, you are not free to relate, to love and to accept."

SOUTH GIRDS FOR CRISIS

Massive Assault on Racial Barriers Planned for This Summer Creates Atmosphere of Tension

By CLAUDE SITTON

Special to The New York Times.

JACKSON, Miss., June 13—Whites and Negroes in the Deep South are braced for the social upheaval that they see as the inevitable accompaniment to a summer-long civil rights campaign. But the outcome may be far less violent than either side is now predicting and considerably more inconclusive.

The potential for serious conflict already has been demonstrated at such widely separate points as St. Augustine, Fla., and Canton, Miss. Intermittent terrorism plagues some areas of southwestern Mississippi. Other crises appear to be developing elsewhere.

The plans of civil rights advocates for this massive assault on racial barriers and the preparations of their opponents surpass anything seen in the decade since the Supreme Court's ruling against public school segregation.

However, some important differences from the pattern of the past have emerged. Negroes appear less inclined to take part in the type of large-scale demonstrations that have evoked a riotous response from whites.

Recent Pattern

If mass violence does take place, it is generally expected to involve civil rights demonstrators and the police rather than white mobs. This has been the pattern in recent months.

Such outbursts usually develop from action to halt demonstrations. The explanation given by authorities for prohibiting protests is that this is necessary to prevent violence. However, in most—but not all—cases in the Deep South, the threat of violence has come from the likelihood that demonstrations would cause a white mob to form.

The prohibition removes the target of potential aggression rather than the would-be aggressors. Thus civil rights advocates contend, the police are doing the work of the mob and in some cases they are no less brutal and by far more effective.

This is by no means true of all Southern law-enforcement agencies. Some of them have shown themselves to be well-disciplined and fair in the face their anxiety results from rumor and misunderstanding. But it is nonetheless real.

The depth of this misunderstanding and apprehension is reflected in the reaction of many white Mississippians to the coming "Freedom Summer" operation. The project calls for a statewide program of voter registration drives, special academic training for Negro youths, adult citizenship classes, political action, a survey of the state's political and economic structure and a study of white attitudes.

Support Expected

It is largely the brainchild of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, which is working with local chapters of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the Congress of Racial Equality and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference. Support is expected from the National Council of Churches, the national N.A.A.C.P., the N.A.A.C.P. Legal Defense and Educational Fund and the National Lawyers Guild.

Approximately 700 student volunteers from throughout the nation are scheduled to begin arriving by June 22 after undergoing orientation at Western College for Women at Oxford, Ohio.

The atmosphere that has developed among whites in advance of this influx resembles that pervading the state before the desegregation of the University of Mississippi. Whites refer to it as "the invasion." More than a score of new laws have been passed to combat it. The strength of the state highway patrol has been almost doubled and Gov. Paul B. Johnson Jr. has been given authority to employ troopers anywhere. County and city law enforcemet agencies have added new men and equipment and have developed riot-trained auxiliary units.

Vigilante Groups

Vigilante groups have sprung up across central and southern Mississippi. The state's long-dormant Ku Klux Klan has experienced a resurgence.

In recent weeks, countless rumors have been circulating. Have these Marxist-mannered ministers who plan to flood our state with their guerrillas never heard of the Scripture, which warns, 'Whatsoever ye sow, that shall ye also reap.'? We are glad that they served notice of their intention to bathe us in blood, otherwise we might not have been ready for our bath."

Elsewhere in the Deep South, reaction to the summer campaign has followed more conventional lines—increased police preparation, more frequent gatherings of the Ku Klux Klan and similar organizations and a barrage of statements from white leaders against civil rights workers.

The chief targets of the expected activity outside of Mississippi are Alabama and eastern Louisiana.

The Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. and his Southern Christian Leadership Conference are pressing a drive against discrimination in public accommodations and employment at St. Augustine. While the Atlanta integration leader has vowed to remain there until major progress is achieved, observers believe the chief focus of the S.C.L.C. will soon shift to Alabama.

'Freedom Armies'

Dr. King's aides are now recruiting volunteers for so-called "freedom armies" in Birmingham and Montgomery, Ala. The absence of mass demonstrations in those cities and the relatively small turnout for the St. Augustine protests seem to reflect a lack of enthusiasm for this tactic.

The Congress of Racial Equality has established a headquarters in New Orleans under Richard Haley, its associate national director, to supervise the Louisiana campaign. It plans to put 48 workers into the field to organize voter registration drives and other projects in addition to those already under way.

The N.A.A.C.P. and the N.A.A.C.P. Legal Defense and Educational Fund will continue their work throughout the region and provide assistance to the other organizations in the concentrated campaign in the Deep South. Various registration drives sponsored by the Southern Regional Council Voter

Avoiding Violence

Officials show an ability and a desire to avoid violence. This does not represent true progress in most cases because the announced method for achieving this goal is rigid enforcement of laws of dubious constitutionality and the suspension, where civil rights workers are involved, of the guarantees of freedom of speech and assembly.

Even the assurance of repressive law enforcement has failed to calm the fears of whites in some areas. Much of volunteers from throughout the nation are scheduled to begin arriving by June 22 after undergoing orientation at Western College for Women at Oxford, Ohio.

In recent weeks, countless rumors have been circulating. These spurious reports range from one involving a planned mass assault on white women to another that cooks were polluting food. So rife have they become that The Jackson Daily News, in a front-page editorial, has urged its readers to ignore them. The tenor of thought in some circles is reflected in a letter from a Jackson resident published subsequently by that newspaper. It said in part:

"It is incredibly criminal and cowardly for a group calling themselves a 'Council of Churches' to send young students out to prepare a blood bath that would invite a death-dealing shower of hot lead . . .

Needless to say, passage of the civil rights bill now before the Senate will have little effect on the summer's events in these areas of bitter-end resistance to racial change. This may not be true of the South as a whole, however.

The outlook in other areas of the region is summed up, perhaps, in a remark by Burke Marshall, chief of the Justice Department's civil rights division.

Massive Resistance

"A great deal of emphasis now is on the problems that people see for the summer," he said. "But I think that in contrast to the massive resistance of the summers of 1954 and 1955, this is going to be a summer of massive compliance with the new civil rights law, especially the public accommodations section."

It remains to be seen whether this optimism is justified. Much will depend upon the leadership provided by President Johnson, the debate and the outcome of the Presidential campaign and the success of efforts to end discrimination and interracial violence outside the South.

Probably the best that can be hoped for realistically in the Deep South's pockets of defiance until these hurdles are cleared is a peaceful stalemate. There can be no substantial, lasting progress here so long as whites see signs of hope elsewhere that the nation will eventually tire of the civil rights controversy and leave them to resolve the issue in their own way, as was done in 1877.

The Drama of a Senate Cloture Vote, And How Civil-Rights Forces Won It

WASHINGTON, D.C.

From the corridor outside, the clang of a bell filtered into the hushed Senate chamber. Moments before, Montana Democrat Lee Metcalf, who was presiding, had posed the question: "Is it the sense of the Senate that the debate shall be brought to a close?"

A page nudged another who was fidgeting with a pencil. In his second-row aisle seat, Georgia's Richard B. Russell adjusted his glasses and leaned forward on his elbows, his shoulders hunched. Presidential hopeful Barry Goldwater uncrossed his arms. Hubert Humphrey, Democratic floor manager of the civil-rights bill, ran a tongue over his thin lips, picked up a pen, and moved it to a spot opposite the first name on a long tally sheet on his mahogany desk. It was 11:09 a.m.

Chief clerk Emery L. Frazier called the first name. Aiken. Vermont's George D. Aiken responded, "Aye." Allott, Anderson, Bartlett, the clerk called in turn. Utah Republican Wallace F. Bennett gave the first no. The next name was that of Alan Bible, Nevada Democrat. He, too, answered no. "It looks like a close one," a reporter said under his breath in the press gallery above.

As it turned out, it wasn't close at all. Thirteen weeks of preparation had gone into this vote to choke off the Southern talkathon against the civil-rights bill, the longest filibuster in Senate history. When the official count was announced, 71 for cloture, 29 against, Senator Humphrey grinned uncontrollably. Two Negro workmen in the old Senate Office Building across Constitution Avenue from the Capitol embraced each other. And a white woman in the gallery clasped her hands over her head and exclaimed, "We won!"

The vote demonstrated that the battle for a civil-rights bill will, indeed, be won. With each senator now limited under the chamber's 47-year-old cloture rule to one hour's debate on amendments, the measure will probably clear the Senate late this week. Though some changes could develop in the House, which approved its own version of the bill Feb. 10, none is likely to alter its substance.

The size of the victory was impressive. Forty-four of the Senate's 67 Democrats supported cloture, and all but 6 of the 33 Republicans. Yet almost until the last minute, Senate leaders had doubts they could muster the two-thirds majority, 67 votes, needed if all 100 senators should vote.

All 100 did vote. California Democrat Clair Engle, half-paralyzed after undergoing brain surgery, was pushed into the chamber in a wheelchair shortly before his name was called. He raised his left arm and nodded his head in a vain attempt to speak. His "yes" vote was recorded nonetheless.

In the flush of victory over the Senate vote—certainly the most dramatic in the long fight for legal weapons to battle racial discrimination—it was hard to single out any individual or group that turned the tide in favor of cloture. The fact is, many men played key roles, sometimes in public, but more often in the little-publicized give-and-take that went on behind the scenes.

Key players in this drama were the silver-haired senator from Illinois, Republican leader Everett M. Dirksen, who fashioned the basic compromise on which cloture was invoked; Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy, who worked long hours to make the bill acceptable to Senator Dirksen and his followers; the unpredictable Iowan, Bourke Hickenlooper, who led an eleventh-hour "revolt of the moderates," and, of course, the ubiquitous master of Senate politics, President Johnson.

That the leadership would not be able to end the debate without invoking cloture was made clear by Senator Russell on the opening day of debate, March 9. Emerging from a Southern-bloc strategy session, the Georgia lawmaker declared: "I see no room for compromise on our part. We will fight to the last ditch."

From the beginning too, Senator Humphrey, Democratic floor manager of the bill, knew he could count on his party members to supply 40 to 42 of the needed 67 votes for cloture. That left 25 to 27 votes to be rounded up by the Republicans. The plan was to permit the Southerners to talk until late April or early May before seeking to choke off the debate. Several factors upset the leadership timetable.

The impressive vote piled up by Alabama's segregationist Gov. George C.

Six Red Roses And the End Of A Senate Debate

The President Puts on The Pressure, But the GOP Has the Winning Margin

Wallace in the Wisconsin and Indiana primaries in April raised doubts in the minds of many of the bill's lukewarm backers that the measure had broad public support. Then too, many Republicans, facing conflicting pressures from constituents, were unwilling to lend their support to any early effort that would open them up to charges of "railroading" the measure through the Senate. The chief obstacle, however, was Republican leader Dirksen, who controlled up to 18 of the needed GOP votes.

Senator Dirksen maintained from the outset that he would support a "good, workable, equitable" bill. He was equally firm in his conviction that the House-passed measure lacked those qualities. At the base of the Illinois Republican's concern was a fear that the bill might serve as a basis for massive Federal intervention into the affairs of local communities, private businesses, and such public accommodations covered by the bill as hotels, restaurants, theaters, sports arenas, gasoline stations, and soda fountains.

Working on Dirksen

Over a period of six weeks, beginning in early April, the civil-rights forces went to work on Senator Dirksen. Much of the pressure came from churchmen and labor groups. Liberal Republicans such as New York's Jacob Javits and New Jersey's Clifford Case also took a hand. On April 21, White House liaison chief Lawrence F. O'Brien and Deputy Attorney General Nicholas deB. Katzenbach held their first of several shirt-sleeves sessions with Senator Dirksen to whittle down the 70 amendments he proposed as his price for endorsing the bill. They got an assist from President Johnson, who invited the minority leader to the White House for a chat on April 29.

Starting May 3, Attorney General Kennedy took personal charge of the negotiations with Senator Dirksen and Democratic leader Mike Mansfield. In five days he shaped a substitute bill that met the GOP chief's demands that primary responsibility for enforcement should lie with local authorities, while providing for forceful Government action in communities working to thwart integration. Thus, the substitute version assigned to the states for specified periods exclusive jurisdiction over complaints of discrimination in hiring or denying access to public accommodations. But it permitted the Attorney General to bring suits when he had "reasonable cause" to believe employers, unions, or owners of public accommoda-prompted a switch in tactics from the Southern bloc. Before June 1, Dixie chieftain Russell had allowed only one of the more than 400 pending amendments to come to a vote. In that showdown May 6, the leadership turned back by only one vote a proposal by Republican Thruston Morton of Kentucky to grant jury trials in all criminal contempt cases stemming from the bill. (A later vote put the amendment back in.) Now, however, Senator Russell said he was ready to stop talking and begin voting on amendments immediately. The move was aimed at taking the wind out of the cloture drive, and delaying a final vote on the bill. Predictably, Senator Mansfield declined the offer.

But the dissident Republicans had been pressing all along for a chance to consider amendments before voting on cloture. With the deadline set for June 9, their cause assumed more urgency. One of them, New Hampshire's Norris Cotton, took the Senate floor to explain the group's position. "We talk about cloture," Senator Cotton said in criticizing the lack of consultation that preceded drafting of the leadership substitute. "We have had cloture already for 13 weeks as far as an opportunity of many senators to be

The U-Shaped Table

This was the formula, designed to win over sorely needed Republican votes for cloture, that Senator Dirksen detailed to fellow Republicans seated around a U-shaped table in the wood-paneled Republican Conference Room, May 19.

The results were not encouraging. Iowa's Bourke Hickenlooper, chairman of the Senate Policy Committee, criticized Senator Dirksen for failing to consult with party members before initialing the compromise package. He tried to get Mr. Dirksen's approval for further amendments, but the minority leader turned him down.

Senator Hickenlooper stomped out of the room and boycotted four other meetings at which Senator Dirksen sought support for the compromise. The substitute, charged the Iowa Republican, "is a gargantuan thing that doesn't go far enough to meet the real evils of the bill." Similarly displeased was New Hampshire's Norris Cotton, who told newsmen after one session that the difference between the House bill and the leadership substitute was "that between Tweedle-Dee and Tweedle-Dum."

The two were not alone. Recalls one Republican who attended the conferences: "We sat around that table and someone would bring up a point that hadn't been accounted for in the bill. Other members would nod their heads in agreement that it should be included. But Dirksen would say it was too late to make any changes. He considered the matter settled."

Hickenlooper Dissents

At 3:30 p.m. on May 26, Senator Dirksen rose in the Senate to offer the leadership substitute. In the next few days, he managed to sway some Republicans, notably Karl Mundt of South Dakota and Jack Miller of Iowa, but about a dozen others refused to commit themselves on cloture. Instead, the reluctant Republicans began meeting periodically under the leadership of Senator Hickenlooper to plot an independent strategy. Their goal was to press for a vote on several amendments before the imposition of cloture.

Several of the dissidents—Len B. Jordan of Idaho, Carl T. Curtis and Roman L. Hruska of Nebrasa, Peter H. Dominick of Colorado—were from Midwestern and Rocky Mountain states where the pressures for and against the bill lacked the force that compelled their Northern and Southern colleagues to take unequivocal positions. Says Senator Jordan: "We all saw ourselves being forced to choose between two unacceptable alternatives. There were those who wanted everything and those who wanted nothing. We made up our minds to plot out a middle course."

At the beginning of the Senate session of June 1, Senator Mansfield announced he would attempt to shut off the debate June 9. He admitted he had not made a count to determine if he had enough support to invoke cloture. An Associated Press poll at the time showed support from only 58 senators—nine fewer than the 67 needed. But Mr. Mansfield believed enough of the undecided lawmakers were susceptible to leadership pressures to supply the extra votes.

Senator Mansfield's announcement [illegible] ture. With the deadline set for June 9, their cause assumed more urgency. One of them, New Hampshire's Norris Cotton, took the Senate floor to explain the group's position. "We talk about cloture," Senator Cotton said in criticizing the lack of consultation that preceded drafting of the leadership substitute. "We have had cloture already for 13 weeks as far as an opportunity of many senators to be heard is concerned."

The group held its final meeting on Friday morning, June 5, in the Capitol. For the first time, Senator Dirksen was invited to attend. Senator Hickenlooper presented the minority leader with the group's demand: A request to the Senate for unanimous consent to consider three key amendments before taking a vote on cloture. Senator Hickenlooper did not go so far as to say the group would refuse to support cloture unless its demand was met, but, said one of the participants, "he planted enough doubt in Dirksen's mind that he had to listen."

Phone Call to Mansfield

The session broke up after Mr. Dirksen gave assurances he would do what he could to allow the request. He phoned Senator Mansfield, who agreed to the demand, which would force a one-day postponement in the drive for cloture. The big question, then, was whether Senator Russell would allow it. A single objection could have blocked consideration of the amendments. Senator Russell summoned the Southern bloc to a meeting late Friday.

As of Friday night, June 5, the leadership was still doubtful of victory on cloture. On Saturday morning when the Senate convened, attention turned to Senator Russell. "I have concluded that there is very little chance of my winning anything out of this situation," he said unhappily. "I have concluded not to interpose an objection to the unanimous consent agreement."

Debate on the three amendments began on Monday. By Tuesday evening they had been disposed of. One, proposed by Kentucky's Morton, was a revised version of the jury-trial amendment rejected in May. The revised version guaranteed the right of defendants to trial by jury in cases of criminal contempt arising from the bill, except in voting-rights cases. It was approved by a vote of 51-48.

Two other amendments were rejected.

Sen. Dirksen: "Time has come."

Losers: Senators Stennis, Russell.

One would have struck from the bill authority for the Government to aid communities seeking to train teachers to cope with the problems of desegregation. The other would have severely limited the bill's section banning discrimination in employment by exempting unions with fewer than 100 members, and businesses with fewer than 100 employes. As written, the measure would cover eventually all firms and unions with 25 or more workers or members.

With the amendments disposed of, the leadership appeared headed for a victory on cloture on Wednesday. But Senator Humphrey wasn't sure. At 7:30 p.m. on Tuesday he phoned President Johnson and told him he could deliver "66 soldiers" in Wednesday's tally, one below the required total. He also called Texas Democrat Ralph W. Yarborough, who had still not committed himself on cloture. Mr. Yarborough had received repeated assurances from President Johnson in the days leading up to the showdown that the President would do "everything I can" to assure Mr. Yarborough's re-election in the fall. Still, the senator refused to give Mr. Humphrey a commitment.

Last-Minute Help

Senator Humphrey did, however, receive last-minute assurances of support from two other Democrats, J. Howard Edmondson, who was defeated in Oklahoma's May 26 primary, and Howard W. Cannon of Nevada, and from two Republicans, John J. Williams of Delaware and Carl T. Curtis of Nebraska.

The Southerners made one late effort to stave off their impending defeat. West Virginia Democrat Robert C. Byrd, in a marathon performance that recalled the filibusters of old, held the floor all night to warn of the evils of the bill. When Senator Humphrey arrived on the floor at 9:30 Wednesday morning, he held in his hand six red roses "from the garden of Mrs. Humphrey." He pinned one of them to Senator Byrd's lapel, and one to his own lapel.

At 10 a.m., the final hour of debate preceding cloture began. Senator Mansfield was the first to speak. He read a letter from a constituent, a mother of four, who is seeking to teach her children that rights that "cannot be given, we do not really have for ourselves."

The burden of arguing for defeat of cloture fell to Senator Russell. "You are becoming enmeshed in a philosophy that can lead to the destruction of our system of sovereign states," he warned.

In a two-minute speech, Senator Humphrey said the issue was a simple one: "The question is whether this nation will be divided, or, as we are taught in our youth in the pledge of allegiance, one nation under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all."

Senator Dirksen gave the final speech. "Stronger than all the armies," he quoted Victor Hugo as saying, "is an idea whose time has come." And, he added, civil rights "is an idea whose time has come."

Then as silence fell over the packed Senate chamber, the roll call began.

"PRINCETON PLAN" IN PRINCETON—The plan which has been recommended for other school systems to correct racial imbalance was inaugurated easily and without fanfare in Princeton, N. J., 16 years ago, but progress in community integration has just begun.

Between classes in the Witherspoon School, Princeton.

Princeton's Lesson: School Integration Is Not Enough

By PEGGY STREIT

PRINCETON, N. J., is frequently cited as a model of school integration. Other cities, including New York, have been urged to adopt the "Princeton Plan" which, by pairing racially imbalanced schools, succeeded in ending school segregation without fuss, without pickets, without demonstrations and without tears. Princeton, however, found good schooling is not enough. Along with it must go a change in community attitudes, opportunities for better jobs, decent housing. Therefore Princeton's experience has important lessons for other communities, North and South.

Princeton's two elementary schools were integrated 16 years ago. Thus began a three-act racial drama—first, a period of Negro hopes; next, Negro frustration and disillusionment; and then, a limited degree of fulfillment.

For its 10,800 whites, about 90 per cent of the population, the Borough of Princeton is an elegant community of 1.7 square miles. Within it are patrician homes, olde English silver shoppes, wood-paneled eating houses and the neat greens and whites of restored farm houses, all contributing to a casual, uncalculated air of good living. Dominating the community, physically and spiritually, are the gray stone buildings of Princeton University.

THE white residents of Princeton are, by any standards, extraordinary — well above the average in income and education. There are wealthy old-family Princetonians, professors, scientists, New York business commuters, writers, scholars. They are a highly intelligent, articulate, attractive, aware group, zealously intent upon thinking good thoughts, doing good deeds, promoting progressive, liberal causes, being deeply concerned with an ailing world and being, according to some, more than a little pleased with their own very excellent qualities.

The Negroes of Princeton Borough represent about 10 per cent of the population—1,200 people—and for the most part occupy a few dozen blocks in a "Negro ghetto" in the center of town. They, too, are an extraordinary group —a modest but brave echo of the values, ways and aspirations of the whites they have served for generations as cooks, chauffeurs, domestics, laundresses, gardeners and the like. Many have been in the community for decades, descendants of slaves brought North by Southern Princeton students and freed at the time of the Civil War. Today, they inhabit well-tended, tastefully furnished middle-to-lower-middle class homes on well-groomed streets. They dress well, speak well and live quiet, industrious lives. Many husbands and wives hold three or four jobs between them.

THE first act in Princeton's drama began in 1948, when 120 Negro children from the segregated Witherspoon Elementary School in the heart of the Negro ghetto were integrated with the 580 students in the all-white Nassau Street School in the white neigborhood only half a mile away.

Many whites say this was the result of an awakening of the social conscience of the community—"clearly the right thing to do." Many Negroes, however, maintain that the step was taken because a revision in the New Jersey state constitution would have made integration mandatory. "Princeton is a privileged society," says one Negro. "What privileged group ever willingly abandons its privileges?"

Under the Princeton Plan, the white school was converted to take all Princeton children from kindergarten to fifth grade; the Negro school became Princeton's sixth through eighth grades. The community not only integrated the student bodies but the faculties as well, and Negro principal Howard Waxwood became principal of the upper school.

Dissent was minimal; one local newspaper failed even to mention integration. Today Princetonians offer some opinions why the Princeton Plan was put into operation so smoothly:

The white community was prepared for the move by a speaking campaign that appealed to its civic responsibility and promised that community standards would be maintained.

The Board of Education moved fast and unequivocally, permitting no time for dissent to develop and assert itself.

The physical plants and faculties of both schools were good, insuring that whites would not be faced either physically or academically by inferior facilities.

The two schools were close enough to each other so that transportation presented no substantial problem.

The number of Negroes integrated into the schools did not approach the so-called "tipping point" (over 40 per cent) the point at which, in the North, whites begin to flee.

ACT II of the racial drama, the long period of frustration, lasted from 1948 until 1960.

"We had hoped," said one Princeton Negro, "that integrated education would be better education and that better education would give us a better chance in the white world. But we found that wasn't so." Most Negroes claim they led segregated lives in the integrated schools, and there were only minor changes in the matters most vital to their welfare—the attitudes of whites, and opportunities in housing and employment. This, in turn, inhibited their ability to take full advantage of their educational opportunities. The Negroes claim that white attitudes, conscious and unconscious, had a particularly important role in "paralyzing" them, psychologically and academically, in their school work.

"I remember my daughter's first day in Princeton High," one mother said. "She came home in tears and said, 'Mother, I (Continued on Page 30)

Princeton's Lesson: Integration Is Not Enough

saw Susan in the hall today and when I said hello she turned red and looked right through me. I don't know what I've done.'

"I knew what had happened, of course," said the mother, "and of course I should have warned her. But it's hard, you know. So hard to explain to a child that a small Negro is acceptable but an adult Negro is not. It wasn't Susan's fault, I tried to explain. It was just that her parents thought it better that Negroes and whites not mix. My daughter wouldn't listen to me. 'But Susan's father and mother are such nice people,' she said. I thought to myself that integration had some advantages. If the children had to learn the facts of life, they might as well learn them young."

"WE did what was expected of us in school," said another. "We stayed by ourselves. I've heard it said that equal academic and social opportunities were open to Negroes and that it was up to us to take advantage of them. But you don't go where you're not wanted unless you're trying to win a battle or prove a point. No one told us we couldn't mix, of course. We just knew we weren't welcome.

"Oh, there were always a few Negroes who made out — who did mix. But most of us just stayed segregated in an integrated school. The only real contact most of us had with whites was in athletics. It didn't take any brains to be an athlete, you see, so obviously that was where we belonged."

Most Negroes wound up in the "general section" of Princeton High, thought of by many as the "dummy section." "Lots of people, including the Negroes, assumed that that's where most of us belonged," said one Negro. "We weren't very bright, you see. We were lazy. We were apathetic. We were the ones who made the discipline problems. That's what a lot of people said and the awful thing was that there was some truth in it. There were many Negroes who said, 'The white man won't let me,' instead of being honest and saying, 'I'm not able. I didn't study hard enough.'

"BUT imagine what it did to a person always to be belittling himself," he continued. "To have been told or shown every day that you were less than a man. Oh, Princetonians didn't put it that way, but it came through clear enough. And after you had heard it often enough you suspected that it might be true and finally things got hopeless and you stopped trying. Sometimes I wished that those teachers who knew why Hamlet did this or that or why some war took place—sometimes I wished they thought a little more about why Negroes were the way they were."

A Negro girl, still in Princeton High, said, "When the teacher asked a question in grammar school and I knew the answer, I didn't raise my hand because I was afraid I might be wrong and that the others in the class would say, 'Well, she's just a Negro. What else can you expect?' "

SCHOOL integration also had little effect on the Negroes' standing in the community. In employment most of the Negroes, frustrated by the barriers of society, were left to their traditional role as the community's servants. Very few were employed on the clerical, superintendent or professional levels—a fact which had its effect on their attitudes toward education.

"Why," asked one Negro, "should I have broken my back to do well in high school if the only job I could find afterwards was as a janitor?"

"I'm a cook," said another, "so imagine the kind of money I earn. Sometimes I wondered whether I had a right to encourage my children to get good grades because I couldn't afford to send them to college — and college, maybe, was the one thing that might have set them apart enough to compete for jobs. Of course, some of our Negroes did do well, and they did get good jobs — but not very often in Princeton.

"There were other poor people who lived here and there still are," he continued. "Poor whites, just as poor as we were and they have had their problems here, too. But somehow, if they had initiative they could work their way out of this bind. But we just stayed stuck."

"We don't and didn't have a strong vocational program at Princeton High," said principal Howard Waxwood, "but at one time even the vocational schools wouldn't accept our Negroes because they couldn't place them after graduation."

The Princeton housing situation offered an equally difficult barrier. For generations Negroes occupied the same area in the center of town, hemmed in by the white business area and wealthy white homes. A few Princetonians labored valiantly to secure better housing for them. Between 1948 and 1960, 16 Negro families were settled in an integrated housing development and 34 more are now living in traditionally white areas. But it took time and effort to accomplish this, and in terms of the basic housing needs, the problem was barely touched.

"What good is a decent education if I can't find a job in Princeton?" asked a Princeton Negro. "And why should I really care very much about anything if I can't ever hope to find myself a decent place to live?"

And thus ended Act II of the Princeton Plan drama — the high hopes of Act I left unrealized, psychologically and academically, in the schools and in the community, by the barriers of an apathetic or prejudiced society.

FULLY INTEGRATED—Both faculty and students were integrated in Princeton. Here Mrs. Marguerite Allison, who went to Princeton schools when they were still segregated, teaches second-graders.

ACT III began in 1960, with the upsurge throughout the nation of sit-ins and militant civil rights agitation. For many Princeton Negroes this marked a watershed in their lives. Some now saw a glimmer of hope; the social and economic barriers began—just began—to tremble. "It was almost as if the white man looked at us for the first time," said one Negro. This shocked, first glance caused a significant part of the community, long blind to the Negro in its back yard, to set to work.

In May, 1961, a Youth Employment Service was established to help both Negro and white 14 to 19-year-olds find part time or full time work and to give them some knowledge of how to look for a job.

In January, 1963, the Princeton Study Center was organized. It provides a study hall for Negroes and whites whose homes do not contain either adequate space to study or reference books. The center is supervised by Negroes and whites who help the children with their work and who also offer special tutoring service for students referred them by the schools.

In June, 1963, the Princeton Association for Human Rights, led by some of the town's most respected citizens, was formed. It sent 250 people, Negro and white, to the March on Washington last August. In addition, its employment committee has found jobs for a number of Negroes in companies which originally hired only whites. Awareness of the committee's activities has helped open up other jobs.

"IN Princeton High School I was advised to take the home economics course because domestic work was the only kind I'd be able to get here," one Negro girl said. "So I decided to try New York instead and I got a job there as a secretary. I came home last year because I want to go to Europe and living with my family was the only way I could save money. When I came back I found that Princeton had changed. I got a job as a medical secretary. I'm planning to return to Princeton when I get back from Europe — if I can find a place to live."

"Our most recent case," said a Princeton Negro associated with the human relations group, "was of a Negro who was turned down for a job he felt he was qualified to hold. He thought he'd lost it because he was a Negro. We checked the case and found that the office had been willing to hire him but he hadn't passed his medical exam; the insurance company wouldn't cover him. The Negro didn't get the job," she said, "but we all knew that there wasn't any question of discrimination and the air was cleared."

The long-active Princeton Housing Group made a house-to-house survey in October, 1963, leading to a statement signed by 73 per cent of those reached supporting the cause of equal housing opportunity.

IN September, 1963, a student civil rights group was organized in the high school. Some students have been agitating in favor of passage of the civil rights bill. Others — Negroes and whites working together — have tested the segregation that has prevailed in such places as barber shops and beauty salons. In the past some Negroes were refused service because "Negro hair is too difficult to cut." Negroes say that this discrimination no longer exists — probably because of the student activities.

Princeton University, too, has taken a strong stand. Last October it instructed its real estate office not to list for rent any units where there is evidence of owner discrimination. At the same time, President Robert Goheen reemphasized that the university was anxious to employ Negroes in other than service positions.

These are only some of the activities instituted to cope with Princeton's racial problem. The most significant change, however, is one of attitude, and it is a change that has affected many Negroes, but by no means all. It can best be seen in the high school and is best summed up by the same Negro girl who, just a few years ago in grammar school, was afraid to raise her hand in class.

"The white students," she explained, "have begun to talk to us, to be interested in us as people, in what we have to say — and a few of them have begun to invite us to their parties. Two years ago if the word 'Negro' was mentioned by chance in class I wished the floor would open up and swallow me. I was so embarrassed — so ashamed to be a Negro. But today things begin to be different. People want to know about Negroes. The subject is in the open and I'm not ashamed any longer."

"A few years ago," she said, "I would have thought college was out of the question and I wouldn't have cared. But today I know that if I want an education I can probably get it, and that perhaps I'll be able to use it. Now I care."

ACT III of the drama of the Princeton Plan has only begun, and no one deceives himself that a happy ending is close at hand. Already, however, there are some conclusions to be drawn from the history of the community's school integration.

The experience of Princeton suggests that integrated education barely begins to be an answer to basic Negro problems. By itself it may hardly affect basic relations between Negro and white. There must be much more; to be truly meaningful, educational opportunity must be supplemented by economic opportunity and by a change of social attitudes. For the Princeton Negro, an education began to have real meaning, to serve a useful purpose, only when it began to be useful in acquiring and holding a job which, in turn, might be useful in acquiring such things as better housing.

THE Negro's approach to his own welfare and education began to change when community attitudes toward him changed. For generations he had been told that he was inferior and incompetent. The result had been, in varying degrees, his psychological immobilization; frequently he had become psychologically incapable of seeking out or taking advantage of the opportunities offered him—educational or otherwise. When community attitudes began to change — attitudes of white toward Negro and, perhaps more important, the Negro toward himself — he was freed to some degree from this psychological bondage and began to be able to take advantage of his opportunity.

What Will Rights Law Passage Mean to Nation?

ATLANTA.

The 30 women meeting last week in a basement conference room of Atlanta's Peachtree Manor feared hometown pressures. Most were unwilling to disclose either their names or their home states to visitors.

This was one of the first meetings held by Southern citizens to study the civil-rights bill and ways to put it into effect once it becomes law. The women here, who came from 27 cities in 9 states, reflected widespread uneasiness over the task.

The bill itself was nearing the end of its difficult path to final passage. Only House concurrence in Senate amendments, then the President's signature, were needed before the bill could become law. Both were expected by July 4.

The one remaining possible obstacle to final passage was the House Rules Committee, charged with clearing the way for a House vote on the Senate amendments. But Rules chairman Howard W. Smith, Virginia Democrat and opponent of civil-rights legislation, reluctantly agreed to call a meeting of his committee for early this week to vote on the measure.

It Would Change Little

Participants in the Atlanta meeting knew that passage alone would change little. Sighed one woman: "The mayor of our town is against it; our governor is against it; our attorney general thinks it's unconstitutional, and the newspapers couldn't be worse."

Indeed, the news from across the South and from the North, too, indicated the immensity of the task of effecting the bill. Most of the nation's attention was focused not on this Atlanta meeting but on Philadelphia, Miss., where three civil-rights workers were missing, their station wagon found burned in a swamp.

In St. Augustine, Fla., where the Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr., is leading an integration campaign, 300 screaming segregationists rushed at civil-rights demonstrators—pummeling some; hurling bricks, garbage cans, and pieces of picket fence at others.

And in Washington, D.C., Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), cautioned civil-rights workers that they must be "smart rather than loud" in pushing for civil rights.

Most of the nation's attention was focused not on this Atlanta meeting but on Philadelphia, Miss., where three civil-rights workers were missing, their station wagon found burned in a swamp.

In St. Augustine, Fla., where the Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr., is leading an integration campaign, 300 screaming segregationists rushed at civil-rights demonstrators—pummeling some; hurling bricks, garbage cans, and pieces of picket fence at others.

And in Washington, D.C., Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), cautioned civil-rights workers that they must be "smart rather than loud" in pushing for civil rights.

Hoping for Voluntary Compliance

The same cautious tone came from the Administration. The Justice Department announced it was ready to prepare lawsuits, if necessary, for enforcement of the bill, but it was hoping for voluntary compliance.

There was talk of the President's picking a Southerner to head the Community Relations Service established by the bill. Most likely candidate: Former Florida Gov. LeRoy Collins, president of the National Association of Broadcasters.

Still, desegregation will be difficult, especially in small towns. One woman at the meeting here in Atlanta declared that her community had flatly opposed compliance with any civil-rights act.

Mrs. Edward Vinson, representing an Atlanta group called Partners for Progress, told the women here that Partners for Progress had achieved success in convincing local businesses that there is some public support for desegregation. Still, several of her listeners were uncertain as to what they might do. They went into buzz sessions and talked less of strategy for implementing the act than of local racial incidents.

And there, in good measure, lay much of the problem for the Southern advocate of civil rights.

These women were pro-civil rights. The meeting, sponsored by the National Women's Committee for Civil Rights, brought together representatives of the United Church Women, National Council of Jewish Women, National Council of Catholic Women, National Council of Negro Women, American Association of University Women, and Young Women's Christian Association.

The question, however, was not whether they would implement the civil-rights bill. It was whether segregationists could be persuaded to comply with it. And the women who met here last week did not really make contact with the people who oppose desegregation; they did not touch the quick nerve of the South. More important, they were extremely reluctant to do so.

Civil Rights Issue Has Two Sides; We Should Be Blind to Neither One

Whenever any new law is written, whether it cuts taxes or reforms schools, a period of apprehensiveness follows naturally. The people watch closely to see what it will do to the economy, or how it will affect the society. The future is never certain; the law simply reflects society's clearest consensus and best judgment on how a given need might be met.

If needs are met without a law being passed, society is better off. But a national consensus has held that an unmet need exists in the field of civil rights. So a law is being passed, and because it is so sweeping and far-reaching it is the subject of unusual apprehensiveness.

Only time can prove or disprove the merit of the law.

But the nation's view of the need, if seen clearly by all, can lend some composure in a time of apprehensiveness. At least it can clarify what the law is trying to do, and thus reduce confusion.

The nationally accepted view of the need for a law might be summed up in some such speech as the following, which a Negro leader like Martin Luther King Jr., could have made in talking about the South:

"We appealed to logic, and failed. We begged for reason, and were turned aside. We asked for understanding, and were scorned and ridiculed . . .

"Every American citizen is entitled to the full and unhindered enjoyment of every right guaranteed him by the Constitution . . .

"How can it be called civil rights to grant special privileges to certain citizens and take away the constitutional rights of others?

"How can it be called civil or right . . . to penalize old people, the sick and the needy, and school children?

"I do not believe that they will be willing to be told with whom they must associate in every walk of life, in virtually every area of human conduct from the cradle to the grave.

"The people have been sold a bill of goods. They have been caught up in a whirlwind of emotional confusion. They have been coerced and intimidated and sweet-talked to the point that they apparently are no longer able to tell the difference between what are constitutional rights and what are special privileges."

But this was not a speech by Martin Luther King Jr., talking about special privileges of white Southerners and advocating the civil rights law. It could have been, but it wasn't.

It was a speech by Sen. Herman Talmadge on June 17 talking about the opposite, and attacking the civil rights law.

It is an irony that the two sides might have been summed up in the same words. It was the national decision that the greater need lay on the side opposite the one Talmadge was looking at.

The law that was proposed to meet that need is being viewed with understandable, and natural, apprehensiveness. It's a tough law. But it can be faced with greater composure if the need, as viewed by the national majority, is at least recognizable to all who have not seen that side of it.

Voluntary Rights Compliance Urged

A variety of leadership groups in Atlanta were teaming Thursday in an effort to encourage local businesses to comply voluntarily with the civil rights bill once it is signed into law.

The organizations all planned to issue statements during the day, either after the bill was finally passed by the House of Representatives or after President Johnson signed it into law.

A policy statement issued Wednesday by the Atlanta Chamber of Commerce was in fact the forerunner of the utterances planned by other civic or religious organizations.

THE CHAMBER set the tone by stating that voluntary compliance with provisions of the civil rights law would be in keeping with the tradition of voluntary action already established by many businesses here.

Other organizations which were prepared to issue statements of similar content were the Atlanta Council of Churches, the Atlanta Chapter, Georgia Restaurant Association, The Atlanta Bar Association, and the Atlanta Hotel Association.

A statement of some kind also was expected from the Atlanta Negro Summit Conference. Apparently this would urge persons or groups in the city's Negro community to exercise restraint or wait and see if businesses do readily comply with the new law before initiating any efforts to test compliance with the law.

AT CITY HALL, Mayor Allen announced that he, also, would make a statement urging voluntary compliance with the law as "quickly as the President has signed it into law."

The chamber in its statement said voluntary compliance with the new law would be in the tradition established in Atlanta "during past months and years" and also would be "in the interest of a continuance of law and order" in the city.

The statement of policy was promulgated Wednesday afternoon by the chamber's executive committee. It reads in full:

"FOR THE PAST several years the Atlanta Chamber of Commerce has urged its members and all Atlanta businessmen to adopt voluntarily the concept of doing business without regard to race, color or creed.

"It has been steadfast in its belief that this approach was better than inviting federal legislation which would eliminate the voluntary aspect.

"On or about July 5, the civil rights bill is expected to become law. It is not a simple law, but its provisions affecting public accommodations are seemingly clear. It provides in general that those businesses which serve the public, including hotels and restaurants, may not refuse service because of race, color or creed.

"THE IMPACT of the law will be difficult for many.

"The Atlanta Chamber of Commerce urges its members and all Atlanta business, as well as all individuals, to exercise good judgment as well as patience during this transition period so that peace and good order will prevail.

"During past months and years most Atlanta businesses have adopted the voluntary approach toward the principles which are now spelled out under the law.

"The Chamber of Commerce has reason to believe that the remainder of businesses affected will adjust promptly and peacefully in the interest of a continuance of law and order in Atlanta."

C of C Asks Rights Bill Acceptance

The Atlanta Chamber of Commerce's Executive Committee Wednesday urged businesses to "adjust promptly and peacefully" to the civil rights bill which will become law this weekend.

The chamber noted, "During past months and years most Atlanta businesses have adopted the voluntary approach toward the principles which are now spelled out under the law."

RELEASES STATEMENT

Opie Shelton, exeuctive vice president of the Chamber, released the policy statement after a meeting of the executive committee Wednesday afternoon.

"For the past several years the Atlanta Chamber of Commerce has urged its members and all Atlanta businessmen to adopt voluntarily the concept of doing business without regard to race, color or creed," the statement began. It continued:

"It has been steadfast in its belief that this approach was better than inviting federal legislation which would eliminate the voluntary aspect.

BECOMING LAW

"On or about July 5 the civil rights bill is expected to become law. It is not a simple law, but its provisions affecting the public accommodations are seemingly clear. It provides in general that those businesses which serve the public, including hotels and restaurants, may not refuse service because of race, color or creed.

"The impact of the law will be difficult for many. The Atlanta Chamber of Commerce urges its members and all Atlanta business, as well as all individuals, to exercise good judgment as well as patience during this transition period so that peace and good order will prevail.

"During past months and years most Atlanta businesses have adopted the voluntary approach toward the principles which are now spelled out under the law. The Chamber of Commerce has reason to believe the remainder of businesses affected will adjust promptly and peacefully in the interest of a continuance of law and order in Atlanta."

pass (or) any other law having to do with orderly government."

Existing police procedures "relative to these things will continue in force."

(3) Rules governing peaceful picketing, as adopted some months ago by the Atlanta Police Department, "shall continue in force."

Picketers who observe the rules will be permitted to picket "while those violating the rules shall be arrested and taken to the city jail."

(4) The rights act "applies not only to those public establishments engaged in interstate commerce but also to all public establishments as to which discrimination based on race, color, religion or national origin is supported by state action."

"Therefore, the police department of the City of Atlanta, being a creature of the State of Georgia, cannot take any action to enforce discrimination . . . in any public establishment regardless of whether or not such establishment is in interstate commerce."

REPORTS TO U.S.

(5) Alleged violations of the new law should be directed to the U.S. district attorney's office or the Federal Bureau of Investigation so the complaints can "be investigated by the federal authorities."

The police guidelines directed particular attention "to the necessity in these tense times of using extreme patience, forbearance, understanding and tolerance while at the same time insisting on full compliance by all parties with the law."

Mayor Allen was the only major public official from the South to testify in favor of the Civil Rights Bill during Senate committee hearings last summer.

AFFECTS 225,000

Passage of the bill Thursday, he said, means that in Atlanta "full citizenship has now been granted to 225,000 Negro Americans."

Objectors to the federal action, said Allen, should remember "that segregation had been imposed and forced on American business by the greatest hodge-podge of state laws and local ordinances ever created on one subject."

The courts have declared "this hodge-podge" illegal, he said, and the Congress has followed up by passing the rights act.

"It is now the responsibility of every Atlanta citizen to obey the law of the land," said the mayor, "and cooperate with city, state and federal authorities in guaranteeing and assuring the peace, tranquility and progress of this city."

Mayor Allen said the American Negro for over 100 years had to learn "to be a courteous, gracious and polite loser."

Now, he said, the Negro has responsibility "to learn to be a courteous, gracious and law-abiding winner."

The mayor urged Negroes here "to restrain from any overt acts, particularly in those places that have shown antagonisms to the Negro in the past, and to use these newly granted rights in the normal course of events and over a reasonable period of time."

The Fulton Grand Jury, in term-end presentments, said it was "not to be assumed that every citizen overnight will believe in the advisability of these laws" but it was essential for the laws to be obeyed.

"We call on our government officials and law enforcement agencies to make clear their determination to uphold law and order," said the jury, "so that there can be no mistaking the necessity for abiding by the law."

Southern Writers Find a Happy Spot to Gather

If Fort Frederica's Mary da Wanda (Mary, the Wanderer) emerges as a wistful wraith in alien literature all over the land, it will be because the Dixie Council of Authors and Journalists has introduced her and other coastal ghosts to working writers.

Epworth-by-the-Sea on Georgia's St. Simon's Island has much to recommend it over Aspen, Breadloaf and other writers' rallies that mark each summer, but not the least of its charms are the shades of the past flitting among moss - grown oaks on ancient stately plantations and the graveyards of Old Christ Church.

While other workshops wane and falter under their own repetitious weight, attendance in Georgia boomed this month.

Drawn by the lures of the state's most historical and flavorful section, writer-teachers of note accepted the invitation to instruct in short-story techniques, journalism, fiction writing and poetry. They included Robert M. Burtt, script author of such serials as Sky King and Captain Midnight, Helen Diehl Olds, a juvenile authority; Lisa Grenelle, a syndicated columnist and poet, and Dr. Dozier Cade of Georgia State College.

The Dixie Council has a calculated interest in gathering writers to Georgia's romantic coast. One of the council's principal purposes is to stimulate interest in the history of Georgia with the hope that fiction and fact may result in forms suitable to classroom uses.

Mrs. Joseph Buffington, one of the council's leaders, says there is a growing dearth of published material available to high school social-studies teachers, and to librarians.

Educators are fearful that, in the over-all educational program of the United States, the special identity of Georgia may eventually be lost, and its historic impact forgotten.

With this in mind, pilgrimages were arranged to St. Mary's, Darien, Frederica, the old Butler Plantation, and the fabled Marshes of Glynn. Epworth-by-the-Sea itself is located on the old Hamilton Plantation.

Special bargain rates, so low many of the writers drawn from six states expected corn pone and side meat as a dinner entree, were another special inducement to attend the conference.

"And they will be back," Mrs. Buffington says, "despite the mosquitoes. No writer can resist the epitaphs on old gravestones."

Civil Rights Law--- Here's What It Does

WASHINGTON (UPI) — The civil rights bill enacted Thursday seeks to end racial discrimination in schools, jobs, voting, use of privately owned public accommodations, and in federal aid programs.

Except for the fair employment section, which goes into effect one year from the signing, the provisions of the law take effect immediately.

HERE IS SUMMARY

Here is a summary of its main provisions:

Voting (Title 1): Bolsters existing law against discrimination at the polls in federal elections by forbidding use of discriminatory tests for registration or disqualification on the basis of minor errors; requiring that literacy tests be written if used; establishing a rebuttable presumption of literacy where the applicant has completed a sixth grade education, and allowing the Justice department or a defendant in voting cases to seek quick action by a three-judge federal court.

Public accommodations (Title II): Outlaws discrimination in hotels, motels and other transient lodging places with more than five rooms; in restaurants and lunchrooms; in theaters, sports arenas, and other places of entertainment which "affect" interstate commerce. Private clubs are exempt.

IN PUBLIC PLACES

Public places (Title III): Authorizes the attorney general, upon receipt of a signed complaint, to institute court action to enjoin discrimination or segregation in facilities such as parks, playgrounds, pools, libraries and the like.

Schools (Title IV): Authorizes the attorney general, upon receipt of signed complaint, to bring suit to end school segregation, but only after he has notified the school of the complaint and allowed a reasonable time for compliance. Also authorizes federal aid to help solve school desegregation problems.

Civil Rights Commission (Title V): Extends life of the Civil Rights Commission 3½ years, through January, 1968, and broadens commission's investigatory powers in voting matters.

Federal outlays (Title VI): Bars discrimination in federal aid programs and provides that aid payments shall be terminated if compliance cannot be brought by less drastic means.

Employment (Title VII): Outlaws discrimination by employers, unions, employment agencies and apprentice programs. Enforcement will not start for one year. For a year after that, only firms or unions with 100 or more employes or members are covered, with progressive steps downward over four years to cover those with at least 25.

Voting census (Title VIII): Directs Census Bureau to collect voting data by race in areas suggested by Civil Rights Commission. A presumed step toward possible but unlikely action by Congress to deny representation to states to the extent they deny voting rights to their citizens.)

Intervention (Title IX): Gives the attorney general power to intervene in discrimination cases brought to court under the 14th Amendment guarantee of equal protection under the laws, but only if he certifies the case is of "general public importance."

Community relations service (Title X): Establishes a new community relations service in the Commerce department to conciliate racial disputes.

RIGHT OF JURY TRIAL

Jury trial (Title XI): Assures right of jury trial in criminal contempt cases arising under the bill, except for its voting section. In voting cases, 1957 provision is retained, providing jury trial if sentence is more than 45 days in jail or $300 fine. If tried for criminal contempt, a defendant could not then be indicted under federal law for the same acts.

General: Discrimination based on religion and national origin, as well as race or color, is covered in most of the titles. The fund cut-off section (Title VI) omits religion. The employment section (Title VII) adds sex to the prohibited list. Enforcement is based on suits and court orders, violation of which could result in fines or jail terms.

Comply in Peace, Both Races Urge

By TED SIMMONS

Restaurant, hotel and motel representatives here and around the state urged peaceful compliance with the civil rights bill Thursday.

And Atlanta's Negro Summit Leadership Conference called on the Negro community to exercise "dignity and responsibility" in accepting its "newly acquired freedom and equality."

In one of a number of statements which greeted passage of the bill, the summit conference also said it feels that "massive testing (in Atlanta) will be unnecessary."

MASSIVE TESTING?

"We feel that the provisions of the public accommodations section will be accepted by such a large number of establishments that massive testing will be unnecessary," the conference said. "We recommend that members of the Negro community assume some of the responsibility for the peaceful transition to the kind of society for which the summit leadership and its member organizations have worked for."

Among the other organizations urging compliance with the bill were the Georgia Restaurant Association, the Atlanta Hotel and Motel Association, the Atlanta Convention Bureau and the Greater Atlanta Council of Churches.

In a statement previously endorsed by its Atlanta chapter, the Georgia Restaurant Association urged its members to comply because "we have no alternative."

DUTY IS CLEAR

"As responsible, law-abiding citizens, our duty to obey the law is clear," the association said. "We are confident that our patrons, customers and friends will understand this position."

Executive Secretary Ed England emphasized, however, that the association will not attempt "to direct (the) course of action" of its numbers, and that failure to comply with the law will not affect any member's status in the organization.

He also indicated the association will probably support moves to test the constitutionality of the new law.

OTHER CITIES

Membership in the association, with chapters in Atlanta, Augusta, Albany, Columbus, Savannah and Macon, represents more than half the dollar volume restaurant business in the state.

The Atlanta Hotel and Motel Association released a brief statement in response to passage of the bill.

The association said its members "unanimously resolve to continue its tradition of law observance by full compliance with the civil rights act."

CALLED CHALLENGE

The Atlanta Convention Bureau called passage of the bill a challenge "which could dramatically affect Atlanta's great position of leadership in the nation."

"We call on all the people of Atlanta to exercise their traditional good judgment in working out a smooth compliance," the bureau said. "Patience and restraint should be the watch-

'...That All Men Are Created Equal, Endowed with Unalienable Rights...'

Congress had actually voted its resolution of American independence from Great Britain on July 2.

But it is July 4th that we celebrate, for that was the date Thomas Jefferson published his powerful declaration and handed it down the generations as one of the great title deeds of liberty.

Who yet can read without emotion those words pronounced at a nation's birth, when Americans decided "to assume among the powers of the earth the separate and equal station to which the laws of nature and of nature's God" entitled them?

They were spoken into the teeth of the British armies and fleets. And they were well spoken:

"We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness—that to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed . . ."

That Declaration lacks just a dozen years of being two centuries old. And through the unfolding years the American union has been tested again and again. Only once did it break. The terrible surgery of war restored it, though much healing remains to make it whole.

Yet that healing progresses with each succeeding test. The fevers, the tensions and the inherent ailments are not wholly cured, and can never be in a free society. But they are controlled, and kept from being mortal, by the American institutions springing from Jefferson's first words of revolution.

He spoke in 1776, and nearly two centuries have passed. Yet in 1964 President Johnson still speaks of rights and union. "Let us lay aside irrelevant differences," he says, "and make our nation whole."

Our differences, measured against 1776, really are becoming irrelevant.

Our wholeness, as time and temper bring it, truly is inevitable.

Our greatness as a nation, resting on the worth of each individual, is growing because so many individual Americans are worthy.

But there is no rest.

So long as free men anywhere are threatened, American freedom is threatened, and peace depends on our strength and vigilance. But there is a second part of it that transcends mere survival, simple existence.

We must ask ourselves, as we honor the flag given us, what it is that our strength will defend, and what ideals we are vigilant to preserve.

And at this point we can go back with confidence and read again the self-evident truths of 1776. Men are created equal. They are endowed with certain rights. Among these are their rights to live, to be free, and to pursue happiness. Their governments are instituted to secure those rights. They govern not by unrepresentative dictatorship but by consent of the governed.

Great debates ensue. Convictions clash. But government answerable to the people reflects the majority will. And once the American will is expressed, Americans in their union obey. America could not endure otherwise. Love of country bands us all in service to it, above self.

Thus it has been nearly 200 years. Thus it will be for untold centuries to come if the spirit of 1776 stays ever with us, and if the Creator under whom we declared our independence so wills in the future as in the past.

Biggest Problem for Nation? The Racial Issue, Say 47 Pct.

By GEORGE GALLUP
Director,
American Institute of Public Opinion

PRINCETON, N.J. — The last five months have been marked by a growing concern among Americans over the race issue, and it now overshadows all other issues—both domestic and international—as the public's No. 1 worry.

Last May, international problems and the struggle over integration were cited equally often by persons interviewed as the most important problem facing the country. Going back to March, international problems were found at that time to weigh more heavily on people's minds than the race issue.

In the latest survey, 47 per cent cite the domestic issue as the top problem, while 35 per cent mention a problem in the area of international relations. Most of the responses in the latter category are expressed in general terms, such as "keeping the peace," "relations with Russia," and "the threat of communism."

Despite the volume of debate over the U.S. position in regard to Viet Nam, only about one person in five of those who mention international problems consider the situation in that country as the most important problem facing us.

The question asked of each person in the latest survey:

"What do you think is the most important problem facing the country today?"

The results — when grouped into general categories—are:

Racial problem	47%
International problems	35
Unemployment	6
High cost of living	3
Other problems	16
No opinion	5

The above table adds to more than 100 per cent because some persons named more than one problem.

If the race issue continues to be the public's top concern up to election time in November, it will be the first time in a presidential year since 1936 that a domestic issue has overshadowed international problems — war or threat of war—in the public's thinking.

A second question, asked of all persons who cited a problem, has proved to be a good barometer of party strength in presidential years.

The question:

"Which political party—the Republican or Democratic—do you think can do the best job of handling the problem you have just mentioned?"

This question, which has been asked regularly since 1940, has closely reflected the actual outcome in presidential years, when asked at the end of presidential campaigns.

When those who express no opinion, or say there is no difference between the two parties, are divided equally between parties, the Democrats emerge with a 63 to 37 per cent advantage.

Because of the relationship between the results of this question and the election returns in earlier presidential years, the Gallup Poll will continue to report results of this question from time to time between now and November.

In both 1956 and 1960, the results of these same questions, asked in surveys late in the campaigns, produced results which were only 3 percentage points away from the actual election returns in those years.

MIAMI AVOIDS RACIAL RIOTS

8-9-64

By CHARLES F. HESSER
Staff Writer, The Miami News
Special to The Atlanta Journal-Constitution

MIAMI, Aug. 8—Dade County (Miami) has avoided a long, hot summer of racial unrest because of understanding and close cooperation between whites and Negroes.

The racial issue has been treated with intelligence and restraint, a willingness to settle differences at the conference table under the leadership of the bi-racial Community Relations Board.

Here are three examples:

1. Negro leaders announced that for the remainder of the summer, the civil rights movement will concern itself with a voter registration drive as its principal project.

2. The Dade County Commission (Metro), meanwhile, is working out final details on what is believed will be the first local public accommodations law in the South.

3. THE YOUTH of two white churches operated a Vacation Bible School for Negro children. The white teen-agers, needing to raise $50 to buy supplies for the Bible School, sold 200 dozen doughnuts house-to-house.

Negro leaders believed they could block any possibility of summer restlessness turning into civil riots by their registration campaign which they hope will produce 15,000 new voters, for a county total of 50,000.

The Rev. Theodore Gibson, president of the Miami NAACP, says the local Negro community "now enjoys the best relationship of any city in the South."

He doesn't foresee any such racial problems as have taken place in Harlem and Rochester "because we have been able all along to negotiate. The people here have been more sensible about this problem."

In the 10 years since the U.S. Supreme Court handed down its school decision racial barriers have been removed in many areas of community life.

The county's three biggest governmental agencies — the school board, commission and the Miami City commission—have adopted policies saying they will not discriminate in employment.

NEGRO PASSENGERS now may sit anywhere in a bus.

City and county recreation facilities are open to all.

Both public and Catholic schools are desegregated.

Public school officials say they no longer keep separate records as to white and colored, but that several hundred Negro children study alongside white children at 40 or 50 schools which once were exclusively white. A few schools have both white and Negro teachers and administrators.

The University of Miami, Barry College and Miami-Dade Junior College admit students without regard to race.

Most Miami and Miami Beach hotels accept integrated conventions or individual Negro guests.

Negro citizens have registered to vote here without question for many years—since long before the 1954 Supreme Court school decision.

When it was disclosed recently that teen-age gangs in the colored district were arming themselves, Negro ministers went into the homes of the youths asking them to hand over their weapons to avert Harlem-type tragedies here.

'PRAGMATISTS'

TO THE EDITOR:

I found John Roche's article ("How a President Should Use the Intellectuals," July 26) somewhat confusing.

First of all, it is difficult to conceive of Mr. Kennedy as an intellectual, and Mr. Roche as much as admits it when he speaks of him as a man of powerful, yet narrow, intelligence. As Richard Hofstadter points out in "Anti-Intellectualism in American Life," there is a critical difference between intelligence and intellect. One analyzes and clarifies; the other mulls, wonders and invents. It is clear that Kennedy represents the former.

Kennedy brought to Washington fellow pragmatists, pure and simple. The few we might classify as intellectuals—the men with capacity for new thinking—were clearly subordinate throughout his Administration. Schlesinger seemed nothing more than a court historian and Stevenson was put on ice at the U.N., while hardheads like Bundy and Acheson roamed the corridors of power at will. As Hofstadter also points out, intellectuals—true ones, not the products of a lazy or inexact press—were first encouraged to renew their interest in public life by the Stevenson campaigns, not by Kennedy.

To my mind, and in Hofstadter's terms, Johnson is as much an intellectual as Kennedy and probably a great deal more. After all, intellectuals are not determined by the college they come from but by the way they think. Johnson has the best intuition we've seen in Washington since F.D.R. (and Truman, at his best moments). I suspect that the dialogue between intellectuals should not be diminished by his regime, but enhanced, since he puts much less emphasis on whether it will pass than whether it is good. And whether something is good or not is Platonism in the best sense of the word.

HARVEY TURNER,
Upper Montclair, N. J.

'LAZY LIBERALS'

TO THE EDITOR:

John Roche is quite concerned about the failure of the current administration to effectively use the intellectual community in shaping our national posture.

May I suggest that, come next January, the role of the intellectual will assume a new importance in Washington, D. C.—and one that Mr. Roche will be quite unable to enjoy. Barry Goldwater, upon assuming the Presidency, may never get to know the editors of Partisan Review, but many of the key posts in his administration will be filled by staff members of the unapologetic conservative publication, National Review. Editor William F. Buckley Jr. would make a splendid special assistant to the President. Surely brother-in-law L. Brent Bozell, who ably assisted Senator Goldwater in shaping up his best-seller, "The Conscience of a Conservative," will find a niche from which to practice his forensics. The penetrating mind of educator Russell Kirk will most certainly give an academic tone and dignity to the new administration and in the area of foreign affairs President Goldwater can turn to James Burnham, formerly professor of philosophy at N.Y.U.

Since the days of F.D.R., the intellectual society has been dominated by those like Mr. Roche, who practice the liberal ritual. Almost unnoticed, Mr. Buckley has drawn under his wing a team of distinguished thinkers of conservative bent who are the match (and then some) of the liberals who have grown lazy in the chase.

FREDRIC KOLB,
Morristown, N. J.

P.S. I am a teacher of American history at Morristown, N. J., High School and a close observer of the New Conservative Movement.

DOES IT WORK?

TO THE EDITOR:

Tom Wicker says of our method of picking Presidential candidates: "It Is a Zany System, But It Works" (July 19). Does it? The reaction to the proceedings at the Cow Palace in San Francisco registers a negative answer.

Some years ago, the renowned theologian Paul Tillich made a significant contribution to our language when he coined the expression "the ambiguity of perfection." The recent convention seems to have achieved a perfection of ambiguity! Its ambivalence was exemplified in the projection of extremism as an instrument of moderation—and freedom; and, however intended, this formulation has caused consternation among many Republicans.

Taking a leaf from Al Smith's book—in 1936—some will "take a walk" for the duration. The walks will lead others into the Democratic camp for the election — only. Still others will be permanently alienated.

This bodes no good for the continuance in strength of a great party!

OF WAR GUILT

TO THE EDITOR:

In the magazine of July 26, Hanson W. Baldwin discusses the crisis of July, 1914, which culminated in the First World War ("Their World Was Ending, But Few Knew It"). He speaks of the conflict as "the war nobody wanted" and says that "no single power—despite the Versailles Treaty—can be saddled with war guilt." He apparently relies on Sidney Fay's "The Origins of the World War."

Fay's book was published in 1928 and is outdated. During the Second World War, a fa-

COVER STORY

THE SOUTHERN MIND BLACK/WHITE

Negro and white Southerners are facing each other on the battleground of a civil cold war that threatens to turn hot as tensions boil. An outstanding Southern novelist makes her own survey of the passions on both sides, and of the great dilemma dividing our nation's people.

BY SHIRLEY ANN GRAU

The South is like a poor relation—stiff and proud, infuriating, talented but shiftless, tragic and ridiculous. No part of the country has had more problems and has solved them better. No part of the country has advertised its failures in a fashion better calculated to alienate the entire world. Sometimes the Southerner—particularly the rural Southerner—doesn't seem to belong to this country or even to this century.

I've been back and forth across the South ever since I can remember. Sometimes with my family, visiting scattered relatives. Sometimes by myself just for the pleasure of the trip—it is such beautiful country. Sometimes with collectors of folk music, clutching our tape recorders. Each time I'm amazed at the extent to which the South has remained different. The old-timers were fond of predicting that good roads, electric power and television would be the end of the distinctness of the region. It hasn't happened like that.

One perceptive North Carolina woman explained it this way. "I was born in the South and I've lived all my life there, one place or the other, and I understand a Georgian or a North Carolinian. But I reckon the North is as strange to me as the South is to Northerners."

Unfortunately, when a Northerner looks at the South, he usually compares it unfavorably with something else back home.

A New Englander who drove from New Orleans to Washington with me complained: "The rivers are muddy and full of trash. Not like the clear ones at home."

A Syracuse accountant said: "The whole place is dirty and nobody does anything about it."

A Canadian said: "It doesn't matter that the hourly wages are lower. Nobody works." (Way back in 1856, the traveler Frederick Law Olmsted was observing that the slave did a third as much work as a hired hand in New York State.)

National Scapegoat

All of these are going to hurt the Southerner's pride. He is not going to bother to explain that the rivers are muddy because in spring they flood out of their banks, and anyway a stream in the South isn't going to look like the rock-lined creeks of New England. He isn't going to explain that a lot of what is called dirt in the South, isn't dirt at all, just the shabbiness associated with poverty.

"We're the scapegoat for the entire country," a Texas historian says. "And we always have been. The old abolitionists—now they were worried about the plight of the poor Negro woman. They were so worried about that, that they forgot all about what was happening to the poor Irish servant girls in Boston."

Nothing infuriates the Southerner quite so much as unconscious patronizing. Especially in the matter of accents. It is really upsetting to hear someone say in a Manhattan drawl or an Indiana twang: "What a precious accent you've got." Or, "But you haven't got an accent." (Suspiciously.) Or, "Where did you ever get your civilized accent?" And I've seen a Virginian, with the unmistakable accent of the Richmond area, flush with anger when told: "But you don't have the sort of accent Southerners should have!"

Except for the cities, a Northerner is not particularly welcome in the Deep South. A boy in Lake City, Florida, pointed to a house and said scornfully, "Yankee lives there." He had lived there for thirty-odd years.

By and large the Southerner fears the North, fears its capital, its aggression. Hard work is not exactly a Southern quality. One gentleman, in an unusual flash of self-analysis said, "I'm afraid it simply looks like bad manners to us."

The South is a kaleidoscope of changing colors and moods and incidents. It is a patchwork of geography, a jumble of impressions. The smooth green slopes of Albemarle County in Virginia. The elegant beautiful campus of the University at Charlottesville. ("Jefferson died broke," one alumnus says crisply, "but he had superb taste, and in spite of everything succeeding generations did to this place, you can still see his mark.") The jumbled tree-covered shoulders of the Blue Ridge Mountains, and farther south, the wilder Great Smokies. Stretching off far as you can see, unbroken, like a sea, truly blue. Ugly little Shenandoah Valley towns perched at the edge of the remote mountain world. ("It must have been a very hard winter," a housewife said, "the way the people came down from the mountains. I've been here five years and I never saw them do that before. Come right down into town, looking for work, wanting to clean your walks, or shovel snow from your porches. It must have been awful hard there, hard enough to drive them down into the towns.")

And the North Carolina tobacco country, the gently rolling, rather dull hills. And the Atlantic Coast, the wave-washed low beaches of Kitty Hawk, the coastal swamps of South Carolina and Georgia. The motel-lined sand of Florida.

The Black Belt. The Deep South. Cotton fields and cane fields and magnolias. The Gulf Coast, where military planes swarm overhead and Midwest tourists swarm underfoot. And coastal Louisiana, the Cajun country, bilingual to this day in a curious French patois, defiantly Catholic in a predominantly Protestant region.

Ever-Present Obsession

These are all the places you must think of when you try to think of the South, different as they are. And not just geography, but the people who live there, the almost fifty-five million people, 30 per cent of the United States' population. This is the South, the historical South, the Confederate states. All wrecked by the Civil War, exhausted and bled out; in many cases, fought over, and burned; in all cases embittered by the Reconstruction. And today's South—with an economic boom that has far outrun social and legislative advances. Business is fine in the South; but human problems are not doing so well. The South today is a melancholy country. It's been blighted by one ever-present fact which the South can neither settle nor forget. The one fact that is ever-present, that dominates every conversation, every event—the cloud of race, the Southern obsession.

The dusty sun-bleached street of Brookhaven, Mississippi. A lady waited in a patch of shade for the freight to pass on the IC tracks that run through the center of town. A construction gang was working at the corner. As usual, the supervisor was white, and the labor crew Negro. The white man was leaning against the wood barricade, looking at nothing in particular, not even the passing train. The Negroes were working very slowly, paying no attention to either train or supervisor, stopping now and then to talk or mop their faces on forearms.

The Sense of Property

The lady watched them from her little patch of shade. "Takes a black nigra to work in that sun. And I don't mean a part-white, yellow Negro. See that one out there, see how much more he's feeling the heat. Best ones of all, they got no white blood. Takes a blue gum nigra to work all day in that sun."

And the man in south Georgia, wearing the black felt hat of his class, the proud badge and boast of the cracker, said: "Bite of a blue gum nigger is poison. I knowed that all my life."

His Negro helper was standing right behind him, in the dusky recesses of the small grocery. He didn't appear to hear, or—if he did—to care.

The Mississippi dentist said: "I don't know when they'll make good citizens." (When a Southerner talks about them, he always means the Negro.) "Let me tell you what happened to me. I've got some cotton land, and there're houses on it, I'm thinking of two especially. These were real houses, not shacks, but good solid houses. They were empty—we don't need nearly so many people to work these fields as we used to. So the houses were empty. Well, first they took the windows and the doors, and then they took the boards off the porch, and then one thing after the other, until a couple of years later you couldn't see where those houses had been, there wasn't even a fence post left. And those are the people they're going to let vote? People without even a sense of property?"

These are the things you hear in the South—these are the attitudes, the stories, the feelings of Southerners as that unfortunate section moves steadily into a mounting race crisis.

In central Mississippi, a businessman said: "The months ahead are going to be terrible. I think we're on the edge of something very dangerous."

All back and forth across the Deep South, responsible people echo his words. They are preparing for a rough time. I personally don't ever remember anything to match this. It must be roughly similar to those days a century ago, when whites prepared to meet and suppress a slave uprising.

The Negro gets more and more restless. Whites have to stay out of Negro neighborhoods. Taxi drivers no longer drive through main streets that bisect Negro sections of Southern towns. I've heard rocks crash into the back of my car when I've strayed off the prescribed path. I know the sickening feeling of being an enemy because of the color of my skin.

Even so, there are bits of humor left in the South.

There's one Negro joke that I've seen straight across the South, in Louisiana, in Florida, in Tennessee. It's always a small sign hung from the side of a ramshackle, strictly segregated Negro café. It says, mockingly: WHITE ENTRANCE TO REAR.

"I've no prejudices," a Negro teacher says. "I think a white man's good as a Negro any day."

The Negro Ph.D. observed wryly: "White men will call me Doctor and not give it a second thought. But they'd never call me Mister."

And the endlessly repeated question: Would you want your daughter to marry a Negro? One woman—worried about her twenty-year-old daughter whose suitors were all bearded guitar-playing beatniks of doubtful pasts and more uncertain futures—answered promptly: "Only if he had a steady job."

One Orleanian who had been rather prominent in the drive to keep the schools open at all costs found her phone ringing day and night. She used this to amuse her dinner guests one evening. She let them pick up the receiver and hear (of all things) children's voices chant: "Nigger lover, nigger lover, nigger lover Jew, wait until we get you." When everybody's curiosity was satisfied, she said calmly, "We'll turn off the phone and have dinner."

Another young woman invited her young daughter's class to a birthday party. The school was integrated; there was one Negro girl on the guest list. When word of this got about, she was deluged by abusive calls. And why didn't she get an unlisted phone? She shrugged: "It's nice to know what's going on."

Telephone Solicitations

For a long time, I had a persistent heckler on the phone. (I, too, am too proud to retreat to the device of an unlisted number.) I got to recognize her voice; it was that of a rather elderly woman, I thought. One day in the middle of her set speech to me, I asked her a question, and she answered. We had occasional chats after that. She had rheumatism, she told me, and got paid for the calls. I agreed that it was a way to make a living. And I suggested something else to her. "Do they keep up with you?" I asked. "Can they check on your calls?" (By the way, I never did know who was paying her.) She told me that they did not supervise closely. So I made a suggestion: "Why don't you just say you called me? Save yourself the trouble, and save me the trouble. And you'd still be making a living. If anybody asks, I'll say you called." She hung up on me. Just one interesting thing—she called perhaps twice more, then not at all. And I wonder. . . . Is that little old lady submitting false reports of harassing activities to whatever hate group is paying her? I don't know, but I can hope, and the thought does amuse me sometimes.

There's precious little in the South that does these days.

The white Southerner knows he is in a small outnumbered section of the country and that he is at variance with the explicit laws of that country.

Southern Separateness

A man in the Montgomery bus station said: "We come through the Reconstruction, we'll come through this."

In a situation like this, where the minority is engaged in holding off the will of the majority, political skill becomes the key to survival. The South looks up to its politicians. Many Southerners carefully save every piece of correspondence from their Congressmen—those routine letters of congratulation or sympathy that every hard-working politician sends out by the thousands. They will show them to you proudly years later. The South has a very personal regard for its politicians.

Take, for example, Senator Russell of Georgia. For the past few months, he has been proposing mock solutions to the race problem. The redistribution of the Negro population to all parts of the country, so that each state would be sure of having its equal share. Or his proposal to investigate the use of violence in the dispersal of the demonstrators at the opening of the New York World's Fair. Senator Russell is an intelligent and extremely able man. These suggestions are not only to amuse him (though I suspect they must), they are directed to his interested audience at home. I've heard half a dozen Southerners from different states chuckle gleefully over his suggestions. As he intended they should.

But this Southern way of life that is so dear to the hearts of speech makers—this precious thing that must be preserved—is slipping away. Gradually, but still definitely. Dr. David Norsworthy, a demographer at the University of Michigan (formerly at Tulane University), thinks that there is definite evidence that the Southerner is drawing closer to the rest of the country. At least the trend is that way. If the South were to read those highly technical sociological studies to which Dr. Norsworthy was referring (and it will not), it would not be happy. The South enjoys its separateness and wants to keep it, while having the benefits of the economy of the rest of the country. And thanks to the skill of its politicians, the South has long managed to do just that.

"...Relations between the races are worse than I have ever seen them....Things will have to worsen before they improve."

The South has thrived in the last thirty years. But, traditionally, the South has been rather like a colonial possession of the United States. At any time in history it has been markedly poorer than its Northern counterparts. As everybody remembers from his history textbooks, those slave-tended cotton fields did not make for a very stable economy. But, beginning with the 30s and the New Deal, the South began to improve. Perhaps here is one secret of the success of the Southern demagogue. He is able to take credit for years of almost uninterrupted prosperity. Governor Barnett in Mississippi may have shocked the country with his stand on the integration of the university, but he can also point to the fact that in his last year of office, the state registered a tremendous 7.9 per cent increase in per capita income.

The most dramatic improvement in the South, of course, has been in land reform —in the UN sense of the word, meaning everything from the actual agricultural techniques to farm credit. Thirty years ago, the South was a maze of small "one mule" farms, improperly fertilized, improperly worked. The farmhouses were rickety firetraps whose glassless windows were covered by wooden shutters. On a cold day, with the windows closed, it was dark as night inside, unless you could afford to burn a kerosene lamp. The walls were plastered with newspapers for warmth, and the beds and quilts were lined with newspapers and vermin. There was malaria and pellagra and tuberculosis. Most of the South—town and farm, black and white alike—lived on a diet largely of corn, which always remained cheap and plentiful. There are many Southerners today who will not touch corn—because of its associations. "We saw just too much grits," they admit. "Once you've lived off a thing, you get so you can't stand the sight."

Today the South is changed. Those small starvation farms are disappearing. There are a million fewer small farms (under fifty acres) than there were in 1935. As a matter of fact, there are actually 1,691,000 fewer farms of all sizes. The tenant farmer operated half the farms thirty years ago; today he works about a quarter. There are counties all over the South that have actually lost population during the last decade.

This exodus from the farms was inevitable; the land simply couldn't support the number of people crowded on it. (In the years 1940-1960, the rural-farm population decreased 62 per cent.) And, statistically at least, the move has been beneficial. According to Arthur Goldschmidt of the United Nations Department of Economic and Social Affairs, the South's per capita income has actually been growing faster than other regions of the United States. The average per capita Southern income in 1940 was $355; for the country as a whole, $595. Ten years later the South's was $1,076; the country's, $1,491. In 1960 it was $1,686 and $2,215. In 1963 it was $1,953 and $2,443.

And with all this, of course, goes the increasing urbanization of the South. The South is apparently not going to be a region of large cities, but it is certainly going to be a region of many smaller ones.

King Cotton Dethroned

I think the clearest description of the Southern development was given by Lucy Ballard. "My family grew cotton near Greenville, South Carolina. My father eventually gave up cotton and put in peach trees. My brother gave up the fruit trees. He's cut them all down and he's selling the land for building lots."

For the first time in their history, the people of the South are becoming town dwellers. The U.S. Census figures show something like this: in 1940, only 36 per cent of the South lived in urban areas; in 1950, 45 per cent did. For the first time, in the 1960 census, more than half the Southern population lived in towns.

By and large, the South looks prosperous. There are roads and wide bridges, and new schools and slum clearance projects in the cities. And in the country, that vicious, trace-galled sturdy mule has almost disappeared. This past spring I saw a team plowing in central Alabama, not far from Montgomery—it looked as strange as a man with a coonskin cap and a long rifle. The kerosene lamp has almost gone, too, except for the real back areas and the mountains. Now there are television antennas jutting up from tin roof and washing machines rattling away o back porches and under back sheds.

But the South is poor, terribly poo There are still deficiency diseases fro inadequate diet. Malaria is gone, but the is still diphtheria and typhoid. As a ma ter of fact, if living weren't considerab cheaper in the South, a lot of Southerne would never make it. They simply do have a lot of cash. Let's take a look at slightly different set of figures. The med an family income in 1959 for the count as a whole was $5,660. (And the media by the way, is the midpoint. If all incomes in the country were ranged in column and graded from lowest highest, there would be one figure in t exact center, with as many higher lower. That figure is called the median.

Not one of the Southern states a proaches the national median. Virgini by all accounts the wealthiest of the Sout has a median family income of $4,96 The median income in Alabama is ju about a thousand dollars less—$3,94 And in Mississippi, the poorest of all th states, the income is $2,880.

And this is the median income. Ther are as many families with incomes belo as above.

And it isn't just a matter of money, cash-in-the-hand. There are all the othe problems that go with poverty. There i the problem of education. As you migh expect, the Negro has a worse educationa background than the white—but bot are shockingly bad. Of rural Negroes i the Southeast (in 1960), some 10 per cen hadn't finished any level of formal educa tion, although 3 per cent of the white hadn't either. In the cities, somethin over a quarter of the whites will hav finished high school, something less tha 10 per cent of the Negroes.

"I had a civil defense class," a Louisi anian remembers. "Those guys wer white. They could sign their names, al right, they'd learned to draw them, bu they couldn't read the Red Cross hand book, so I'd read the instructions to them and they'd just sit there staring at me all those empty stony faces. And when was done, I'd say, tell me what I've bee reading, and they'd give it back to me word for word. They'd memorized it."

Now it's true that the depressing figure on education and income are influence by a large percentage of Negroes, bu the poor of the South aren't all Negro

GEORGIA-BORN Richard B. Allen, now associate curator of the Archive of New Orleans Jazz, tells Miss Grau: "I'm not concerned with race. I'm concerned with music. White and colored both have been playing jazz for many years. A lot of times I don't even notice the color of a man's skin—I'm listening, not looking."

A young doctor who practiced in extreme north Florida put it this way. "I worm the kids automatically. I don't even bother to check. I know they're loaded with them. Like their dogs."

He was speaking not of the Negro but of the poor whites—the turpentine workers, the farm laborers, the owners of those small farms themselves.

"So I treat for worms, and even while I'm doing it, I know that they'll be reinfected in no time at all. Running barefoot in the mud. Living in houses full of the larvae. . . . I can explain. I can tell them to be clean, but I know it's not going to work any more than the advice I give them about diet is going to work. They can't afford to do either."

And this is the group that you see in the rural counties. The slack-jawed, the vacant-eyed: women worn out by childbearing, men worn out by futile labor. These are the people almost always on the edge of hunger. Theirs is the slow speech, the aimless fight—gun or broken bottle or razor—the occasional relapse into alcohol.

These are the poor whites. For generations they have been at the bottom, economically and socially, excepting only the Negroes of their class. They are the Rednecks, the Crackers, the Woolhats. Respectable well-to-do Negroes refer to them scornfully as "white trash." They're the Jeeter Lesters of Tobacco Road. When they migrate to cities, they remain at the bottom. "Cotton mill trash" is the most frequent word for them there. Middle- and upper-class whites prefer not to notice their existence at all; if they must, they refer to them scornfully, with a little lift of the mouth, a shrug of distaste.

Pecking Order

One crisp blonde woman from Memphis said: "They've always been like that. Dirty, shiftless. Hating Negroes with a blinding passion—after all, the poor Negro is the only one beneath them, and a lot of Negroes are making a better living now than they are. They make all the trouble in the South."

And she is right. The poor whites are always the troublemakers in the South. They make up the mobs—they were in the pictures of Birmingham, of Oxford, of Jackson—they do the lynchings, they are the dynamiters, the arsonists. But their real crime—and one they're not in a sense, responsible for—is stupidity. Ralph McGill, publisher of The (Atlanta) Constitution, who has put the problems of the South into forceful language for many years now, points out that the poor white is exploited and misused—and not only economically. If these poor folk riot, McGill insists, it is because they are invited to by their leaders. They are incited to violence by their governors, their local leaders, the White Citizens Councils, whose members are largely business and professional men. In short, the Southern poor white is used for the dirty work of his betters. This unfortunate group has deserved better leadership than it's gotten.

And of course the great problem of the South has been its lack of responsible leadership. In the few places where men of authority have been forceful and truthful in their dealings with both sides, the situation has been handled with a minimum of trouble. For example, Orlando, Florida. A young Negro gave me his version of the happenings. "There were some threatened sit-ins, and the mayor and the businessmen got together, saying they would tolerate no nonsense while they were proceeding with certain changes in an effort to desegregate. They changed some hiring policies—that had been one of the sore spots. Now they have at least a token number of Negroes in the shops and the stores . . . and when I went home Christmas all the restaurants were desegregated." He grinned. "Even in some nightclubs that had been completely Negro—that wouldn't have served a white person—they had desegregated, too, and were serving everybody." And he gave his final evaluation of the situation, "I could live in Orlando, the way it is today, and be happy there."

But Orlando is an exception. By and large, the most frustrating aspect of the Southern crisis is the utter failure of the well-to-do and responsible Southerner to assume leadership of his area. This group of educated citizens ought to provide the leaders of the community. It doesn't.

One very wealthy man from central Alabama (a man of great influence, respected and admired) talked about the extremely tense situation in his county. Was he planning to do anything in the face of this steadily worsening situation? "Look," he said, "the Klan and the Citizens Councils are active all over this part of the state. But what they want more than anything else is publicity. The best way to handle this is to pay no attention, and let it die. If I made any statement, if I took any stand against them, it would give them the publicity they want. So I'm not going to do anything."

Paradox of Progress

This is a very common attitude in the South. I've met it five or six times recently. These people are not Negro haters. They often are fond of Negroes—as individuals—and go out of their way to help them. But they will not make a public stand against bigotry. And I do not think anything is likely to change their minds.

Many—very many—thoughtful and well-informed Southerners think that the South was making considerable progress toward the goal of desegregation—without duress—during the 40s and 50s. Charles Roland, of Louisiana, is one of them. When he looks at the present-day South, he finds himself facing an unpleasant paradox. The Southern Negro has made enormous progress since the 40s in every field: education, civil rights, jobs. This very progress engendered a demand for more progress, more rapidly, and culminated in the sit-ins and the freedom riders. These, far more than the Supreme Court decision of 1954, alienated the white population, and changed their role from one of passive acceptance to active resistance. In short, many Southerners feel that the Negro would have had what he wanted more quickly if he had been more circumspect. But how do you keep a people patient? Mr. Roland shrugged. "You don't; you can't expect it. And that is the horrible part."

Prudent Politics

In my experience, too, the Southern attitude has hardened. The racist has turned cleverer and more subtle; his appeals and his threats carry more weight. It seems to me that the majority of the people of the South admit, in theory at least, that the Negro is entitled to a better deal than he has gotten. But these people are intimidated by the militant racist groups. After all, there are so many subtle, imperceptible ways to discipline people, and most of us are so very vulnerable. Children. (The tearful cry: "The kids won't play with me because you're a nigger lover." I've heard that myself.) Jobs. (A letter from a Mississippi employer insists that candidates for the job must be "prudent." It is so simple to pass over the man who is not. . . . "Oh hell," the young man said, "I've got a wife and two kids, I'll be prudent.") So many ways. Credit. In a small town this can be maneuvered deftly and is particularly effective.

All of these ways are quiet. The burning crosses and the hooded Klansmen are things of the past, too noisy, too crude, and there are always those nasty photographs in the Northern papers. The new way has nothing to photograph.

The young man sat very quietly in the Florida living room. Beneath the red acne scars, his face was white and bloodless. He had lost his job at the drugstore, and without that he could not continue in college. He had participated in some mildly integrationist discussions. The drugstore owner shrugged and answered politely, "I bought a new truck and instead of two boys on motorbikes, I'm going to run one truck. That's business, not politics." And he stood there, knowing it wasn't true, and daring anyone to find a way to say so.

There are ways, so many ways, if you have the will to find them and the power to use them.

In the larger cities, of course, this sort of pressure is less effective, because there are larger groups dedicated to integration. In New Orleans, for example, there was one private group that dispensed emergency funds (during the crisis over school integration) to anyone who lost his job because he sent his child to an integrated school. They paid for repairs to cars damaged by vandals; met house notes; bought groceries and found other jobs. Jack Nelson, a New Orleans attorney, estimates that the group kept a dozen white children in school that year and effectively broke the boycott of the segregationists. But none of this is much help in the small towns and the rural areas, and the South is, by and large, an area of small towns. One harried employer discussed the dismissal of a salesman involved in an integration suit. "Look, I like the guy and I approve of what he's doing. But my phone's ringing day and night, and there's cars driving back and forth outside the store, and business is falling off. What do you want me to do?"

The South is afraid. People are far more cautious of speaking their minds. Old friends will still talk, but they will most often say, "Don't quote me." One segregationist leader positively refused to make any sort of statement (though we'd been chatting for a few minutes). "I could write it out and it wouldn't do any good. You'd still put it in context so I'd look ridiculous. You hate me and my thinking."

The sides are being drawn more and more definitely. One extremely perceptive Louisiana Creole put it this way. "People I've known all my life, people I went to school with and have been friends with all this time—I don't see them anymore. It's not that we feel any different than we ever did, it's just that our tolerance for each other's position has decreased."

Token Integration

And I've noticed that in myself. I tend to avoid the company of racists. There is nothing I can do to change them, but I don't have to listen to them either.

The Southern segregationist is more determined to have his way. And what he wants right now is a democracy for white men dedicated to maintaining white supremacy. The more intelligent are openly talking about the "Chicago Method" of token integration. "Little integration's a good thing," one gentleman told me with a grin. "Look at that college now," (and he named one of the best Southern schools) "they got themselves five niggers, and the foundations give them fifteen million dollars. That means each nigger is worth three million dollars. And I figure we can do that right here. Few niggers won't hurt us, and if they're going to pay that high for them. . . ."

I've not included the name of the school, because I'm not at all sure his accusation was right. I've included his story because it does illustrate the Southerner's willingness to compromise with token integration—de facto segregation—and a pious request for Northern funds.

And there is nothing more infuriating than a Southerner who is being deliberately obtuse, as are these gentlemen who seriously propose a white democracy, sparingly frosted with a tiny sprinkle of Negroes. They are noisily shocked to find that the Negro does not agree with them.

"What do they want?" they say piously. "Why do they want to go and riot around like that? What good is that going to do? What do they want?" They manage to say it in the shocked tone of a man who has just seen his dinner guest eat peas with a knife.

A couple of months ago, I was in Jackson, Mississippi. It's a pretty town, prosperous looking, with new stores, new office buildings, clean streets, and no Negroes visible downtown after dark. I started with a cup of coffee at the hotel. The old man sitting next to me at the counter asked me if I knew that Mississippi was a dry state. I told him I'd heard so. (As a matter of fact, the bellboy had already explained that to me; he had also given me the address of the "best diner in town and good likker same price as Louisiana.") He also told me a rapid-fire story about a bear and a bobcat and a possum. I've forgotten his version, but it was one of those humorous animal stories that you hear now and again through the South. He finished his coffee and said abruptly, "You hear they got white teachers staying at nigger houses? Poor little things from New Orleans don't know no better."

The Quiet Day

The waitress wiped her thin sweaty face with the back of her forearm. There was a burn on her arm, the sort housekeepers get from hot oven doors, and it was infected and crusty: "They going to catch some terrible disease."

She and the old man thought that was funny. As I left she said, "Come back, ma'am." The old man said: "Have a nice sight-see."

I walked up the street to the bus station; I'd seen it often enough on television during the disturbances of the year before. It's a small building, just off the main street. There was a single tall policeman standing outside the door. I asked him for directions, and he gave them politely and accurately. I looked around inside, a small station, busy enough and as far as I could tell still completely segregated. I left, passing right by the policeman. "Pretty quiet today," I said, because that was the only thing I could think of.

"You waiting for a bus?" It was a perfectly polite question.

"No," I told him, "I'm driving. I came by to see the place I heard so much about."

XAVIER SENIORS, Lourdes Frigillana and Mackie Blanton, give student viewpoint to the author. Among many Southern Negroes, Miss Grau found "Suspicion and fear of the white man's world. Utter lack of self-confidence. These are handicapping elements the young Southern Negro has to overcome; some are doing it."

Ozzie Sweet

"There is an enormous residue of hatred in the Southern Negro. It has never yet been focused...."

"Nothing to see," he said amiably. "It's a pretty little town today; on the quiet side."

"That's what it is."

I went up the street to the Confederate museum by the state capitol. A very polite lady there (she was a visitor, too, but she'd obviously been there often before) showed me all the torn battle flags and the uniforms and the guns and the bullets and the swords from that ghastly suicidal war.

That day in Jackson, I realized that polite Southerners often remind me of Nazis . . . of those nice SS men who said "bitte" and "danke" and helped old ladies into the trucks on the way to the concentration camps.

Seeing those Confederate flags, tattered and stained by battle, I remembered something else. In the last decade or so, the Stars-and-Bars has become the symbol of rabble-rousing, of Negro-baiting, of the Klan and the White Citizens Councils. And to quote my father, who was certainly no integrationist, "It was an honorable flag once. Good men believed in it and died for it. But it isn't anymore. It's being disgraced every day!"

Can't Hide Color

Today, in the South, relations between the races are worse than I have ever seen them. I personally think that this was unavoidable; that things will have to worsen before they eventually improve, and that the Negro will, hopefully, have achieved something nearly his due in the process. In the meantime, of course, the white Southerner is in a perfect frenzy of race-awareness. It's almost impossible to talk for more than fifteen minutes without having the subject come up.

The middle-aged lady from the Gulf Coast was quite beautiful still, delicate and feminine and absolutely determined. From the shelter of her porch, directing the labor of a young Negro boy in her new zinnias.

"Color of the skin is something you can't ever get away from," she said. "Goes deep, clear to the bone. . . . You know, if you hold your hand up to a light —sun or lamp or something like that— the nigra blood will show? Yes ma'am, it will show. Show right around the base of the nail, like a halo or something, right down in there, there'll be a dark spot. Nigra blood, that's what it is. No matter how light your skin's got, no matter how much you straightened your hair, that spot'll show if you know where to look.

"It's there in people you wouldn't suspect. But they can't hide it. . . . A few months ago, I remember, there was a girl visiting Dorothy. They weren't exactly roommates but they stopped in the same dormitory at Newcomb College there. They came to see me one evening when there was five or six others here. Because it was nighttime, the lamp on the table was burning, and I started them off playing that game. We all held our hands up to the light, and there wasn't one of us but had nails without a spot. And that girl from New Orleans, would you believe it, she wouldn't even hold her hand up. She said it was silly, that she wouldn't do it, that it was just a superstition and all that. But we knew. We all just looked at her and we knew. Why wouldn't she hold her hand up there, if she wasn't afraid of what we were going to see?"

The South isn't all violence and bitterness. Last May I talked to Mrs. Robert Hyams of Natchez. She is a small, slight woman with the classic Southern coloring: dark hair, blue eyes, pale skin. She is also one of the few people in the South with the courage to state her personal convictions publicly. She is a representative of the very best of the traditional South. "Black and white must get along," she says. "We have to live together peacefully. I've always treated Negroes as people. I've always dealt fairly with them." She smiled. "I'd buy my cook a dress if she needed one before I'd buy one for myself. I believe firmly that they should have their rights as citizens, the right to a decent life, a decent education, good housing. But I do believe in keeping the races separate. I don't believe in mixing strains in animals or in people; I believe in thoroughbreds."

The South is always thinking about blood. Negro blood and white blood. Good blood and bad.

The Georgia pediatrician jouncing the tiny baby on his lap: "This little fellow's got the best blood six or eight counties around, and he gets it from his mamma and his daddy both."

Sometimes the South seems to think of people in animal terms. Blood lines. High spirits. All the fine animal virtues: good bone, good muscle. Bearing and beauty. Dash and honor and recklessness: young and old, those are the qualities the South prizes.

And all of this has to bear on that particularly Southern institution: the lady. Bearing and beauty. She need not be meek and gentle, not at all. She can hound her husband and children, be a tyrant in her house. She can drink far too much and drive furiously along the roads until she kills someone else or herself, she can have the unfortunate habit of stripping down to her skin at parties. It doesn't matter. There is a solid wall of conspiracy constructed by male and female alike to protect her. A Southerner quite automatically expects to make allowances for a woman's foolishness.

The Degraded Lady

Once I was driving down a street in my home town. I was going the wrong way—I'd forgotten or hadn't noticed or some such thing. Still, when the policeman stopped me, I knew I'd have to think of something. I put on my silliest smile and said something like "I know it's the wrong way, but I wanted to get to the highway the quickest I could and the street running the right way is so utterly dark I was scared." He escorted me to the highway so I shouldn't be afraid.

The Southern male will protect his women and expect practically nothing in the way of sense in return. The Deep South —Alabama, Mississippi and South Carolina—is the one remaining part of the country where a woman cannot serve on a jury. (Even Negro men can do that— at least in theory!)

This position, at once idolized and degraded, annoys the more perceptive Southern women. I talked to one such person. She is from North Carolina, a classic Southern beauty. Blue eyes, perfect white skin, cheekbones set a little high. In her immaculate house there is almost nothing new, nothing made in this century, except, of course, the kitchen equipment, and she is never in there. The furniture is from her family and her husband's, and on the wall is a portrait of her mother—who was much the same beautiful woman. I've known her for years, and I know that she dislikes Faulkner and Caldwell, Tennessee Williams and Carson McCullers. "They make me feel decidedly nauseated," she said. She is fluent in French—as is her husband—and they go to France as often as they can. (It is quite frequent, because they have no money problems.) "I can hardly wait to go," she says. "But then after a while I have to come back. I miss my home and

A SOUTHERN LAWYER speaks his mind. Jack Nelson is one of the rare white attorneys who will tackle civil rights cases. my things." She indicates the room filled with things that aren't hers at all, but her family's. She doesn't know that she hasn't got a real identity as a person—but she suspects it.

Because we have been friends for years, she speaks more freely than she might ordinarily. "It's ridiculous to be a lady today. When the world is so different." We could hear a mockingbird outside, close and insistent. "We always kept a mockingbird in a cage—as a songbird. But there's a law against that now. I'm almost fifty and I feel like I'm a hundred. I can't change, but I do wish I were different."

The Southern lady knows she is an anachronism, but there is another and even stranger element. A middle-aged Alabamian put it into words bluntly. "My husband would probably leave me if he heard this. . . ." (He certainly would have been horrified.) "Sometimes—not often, but sometimes—once or twice, I find myself envying some of those nigra women you see around town here. Sure they're nigra, and that can't be good. But they're so sure and solid and determined. They're so capable, and if they're not, it doesn't bother them. They're there and they organize things and life goes on all around them, and they're at the center of it all. They're free as a man is."

I suspect that very same thought has occurred to every middle-class Southern woman at some time during her life. This one merely had the courage to put it into words. And immediately after saying it, she regretted it.

Negro Matriarchy

"Free as a man"—I heard the same phrase (disapprovingly, this time) from a grey-haired woman at a DAR ceremony in north Florida.

One of the strangest elements in the strange schizophrenic world of the South is the relation of white woman to black. Superficially the white woman has everything: her house will probably be better, her car newer, her husband is probably making more money, her children are in better schools. But in the same deep and fundamental way, the white woman is jealous of the black. (Does this, by any chance, go back to the days when a man had a wife for social and family reasons, and a black mistress because he loved her? I think very probably most white women believe deep-down that their husbands want a Negro woman. Whether this is true or not, I don't know. The most I've ever been able to get from a Southern man is that it's good luck to have a Negro girl.)

In her own world, the Negro woman does have a freedom and an importance and an affluence that the white simply does not have.

The Negro woman works very hard for very little, but she does have the enormous satisfaction of a matriarch. She is the undisputed center of the home: since in many cases, she is also the wage-earner, she assumes that added dignity and importance. Many social workers and many intelligent Negroes I've talked to have admitted this structure, though they do not think it a desirable state of affairs.

One interesting indication of this is in the pattern of Negro education. In private colleges (which charge tuition) there are always more females than males—this is exactly the reverse of the situation in white schools. It is as if the Negro parents were saying to themselves: "Our daughters will have to support their families; let's spend our money to give them the best education we can; they will need it more than our sons."

One young Negro attributes the lack of real pressure for civil rights in New Orleans to the pressure exercised by the mothers. They simply do not want to see their children getting mixed up in anything. He is convinced their power is so great, their children dare not defy them.

Historians will tell you that the prime position of the Negro mother goes back to the days of slavery. Marriages between slaves were not allowed; the man-woman relationship was temporary, to be interrupted at the will of the owner, as the mother-child relationship could not be. Of course in the slavery system there was no practical necessity for the father to stay with his woman and their children. He did not support them in any real sense of the word. Food and clothing and all the necessities of life came from the owner, not the father. Out of this situation came the still prevalent pattern of the woman as pillar of the family, and the male as a wandering predator.

Puritanism Down South

Slavery gave the Negro woman still another legacy, as historians point out. The slaves were, by and large, outside the pattern of puritanism; they were not burdened with the double standard of morality that plagued whites. The slave woman then and the Negro woman today enjoys the emotional freedom of the male.

It is this equality, even superiority, of the Negro woman that the Southern white woman so deeply envies.

Being a woman in the South today—as much as a hundred years ago—means occupying a strangely confusing position. She is essentially supposed to be what one Alabamian calls "steel-beneath-the-magnolias." She should be seductive and retiring at the same time.

The Southern male is a great seducer and great idolizer all at once. A very beautiful Texas woman said with a giggle: "They go on courting you and spending a lot of money and time figuring out ways to meet you, and all the time they're hoping you'll say no."

The Southern male is such a puritan he sees warnings and hints of illicit relationships everywhere. It becomes extremely difficult for a man and a woman to have a serious conversation in the South. Most conversations are carried on in a light bantering tone, or follow along strictly formal lines. A young Alabama matron told me. "You'll be talking along, happy to have found something you have in common, something you're both interested in, when all of a sudden there'll come a look on their faces and out will come the courtly manner and they'll go into their old South bit and say something like: 'Why do you want to bother your pretty little head with this?' And they make you feel like an idiot."

One ornately courtly Virginian had greeted his friends for years with "How is the radiant Miss Smith this wonderful morning?" Finally a short-tempered and badly hungover South Carolina lady snapped, "Don't be such an ass!" He was dumbfounded—genuinely appalled.

There is no part of the United States where the land itself is more important, more dominating. If you've ever seen the South, you know. It is a kind of smoldering, unreal country. The winters are short and not very cold; the summers are long and shimmering with heat. All through the South there is a pervasive feeling of the natural landscape, a feeling that the land runs people, that the land has never been tamed. Not really. New England is precise and orderly. The Midwest is fertile and productive. But the South—it has to do with the heat hazes and the heavy rains and the furious sense of things growing—apart from man, out of his control. Even in cities and towns, you can feel the grass bursting under the pavement. It's as unreal as the sight of a huge magnolia or a sweet bay tree in bloom, its waxy flowers thrusting up from shiny leaves. Or the evil stare of 'gators sunning themselves in the swamp. The land is the thing. The land is dominant; the Southerner, black or white, is only a small figure in it.

Perhaps this is why a Southerner is so given to dreams and legends. To remembering. To elaborating the past.

Perhaps that is why he is so willing to believe things he wants to believe.

When we were small, my sister and I and our cousins, like all children, had a favorite old man to tell us stories, and teach us songs. About Jesse James, and girls who had killed their babies, and hangings, and the battles of the Civil War. But a funny thing had happened to those battles: the South won. By the substantially his place in society. . . . Too many intellectuals . . . for too long ignored politics and lost thereby the leadership of the South."

time I went to school, I knew a great deal of Civil War military history, all wrong. I'd never heard of the Second Battle of Bull Run. Chickamauga ("Your great-granduncle Henry died and was buried there") was a victory, as was Gettysburg. Appomattox we simply didn't hear about.

The South holds to its illusions.

The most famous of them is, of course, the mythical world of the antebellum South—the world of happy singing slaves, and lovely ladies in crinolines and noble gentlemen drinking mint juleps. It doesn't matter that that world never existed, that the harsh realities of the plantation system are described in many books, most notably Fanny Kemble's Journal of a Residence on a Georgian Plantation in 1838-1839. She found the white people vapid and stupid and cruel, the plight of the slaves unbearable.

The Southerner goes on believing what he wants to believe. Sometimes it's a matter of ancestors. Everybody's great-granddaddy was a planter, with thousands of slaves. Everybody's great-granduncle was a governor or a lieutenant governor—more governors than there were states to be governed. But it's not polite to ask too closely. . . . And families are carried back, quite seriously, to incredible lengths—out of the South to England or Ireland or Scotland. There are ancestors at Hastings, there are royal Scots, there are the legendary kings of Ireland.

The Past Glory

One witty lady from Pascagoula, Mississippi, puts it this way. "Every afternoon, if the weather was nice, we'd go for a walk around the land that we had owned once, couple of generations ago. We'd start at the point where the Ingalls shipyard is now, and we'd walk and walk, listening to stories of past glories—of lovely houses, and ladies with long golden chains twirling between their fingers. And because I was the youngest, I'd be the one to get tired first, and I'd be lagging behind and wishing that they would stop. . . . My mother still likes to talk about the great days when we had money. She still insists that we're a good family with excellent blood. That Cousin Walter wasn't really deserting from the Army in 1944, he was just lonesome for the sight of his mother, and he would have come back even without the police. And Cousin Anna was a bit flighty of manner and dress, as was her sister Harriet, but the people who said they were a pair of tramps soliciting the men from the shipyard and the airfield were just jealous of them. . . ." She laughs, delighted with the absurdity. "But we're still a fine family, great blood. . . ."

One of the very first things a proper Southerner will do is try to discover the maiden name of the mother of the person he is talking to. If he can identify that, he will feel much better.

And there are the relics. Like the Civil War cavalry saber that Great-Grandpapa used at Gettysburg as he charged up the hill with Pickett.

The South is violent country. It has been so historically, and it remains so today. For example, across central and north Mississippi in the early days of that territory was the Natchez Trace, a favorite place for robbery and murder. And of course the most famous of the old time murderers were the Harpes, Big and Little. They managed to do in at least a dozen people, before their heads decorated trees. The ingenious Harpes, according to Paul Wellman, in Spawn of Evil, were the inventors of a method of victim disposal that became quite popular during prohibition: fill him up with stones and toss him in a river.

Today the South has a very high incidence of crimes of personal violence—murder, manslaughter and assaults. This fact doesn't necessarily mean that the South isn't law abiding—its robbery rates are far under the national average. For example, North Carolina's robbery rate in 1961 was only a quarter as high as the country's. Tennessee, Texas, Arkansas, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, South Carolina and Virginia had half or less than half of the country's rate. All the Southern states were below the national average.

But these statistics from the Department of Justice do support the observations of many Southerners—that the South by and large has a low regard for human life. The Southerner is short-tempered and violent—far more than persons in any other part of the country. In 1961, Mississippi's murder rate was more than double that of the country's as a whole. Alabama's and South Carolina's were higher than Mississippi's. (These statistics are for known crimes per hundred thousand population. The national rate was 4.7; Mississippi's was 10.3; South Carolina's, 11.6; Alabama's, 12.9) All the Southern states were higher than the national average.

"In the few places where men of authority have been forceful and truthful in their dealings with both sides, the situation has been handled with minimum trouble. For example, Orlando, Florida."

Adjustment to Hostility

Aggravated assault follows much the same pattern, with a few exceptions: Mississippi, Arkansas, Louisiana and Tennessee are actually below the national rate. But it seems that you are more than twice as likely to be assaulted in North Carolina as in the rest of the country.

It is no wonder then that so many in the South have memories of violence.

"Every Wednesday night at church, we'd all be sitting there, and just at some specified time, the door'd open, and in the Klan would come, a procession of them, hooded and robed and all, and they'd march right up the aisle carrying their contribution and put it down. Then they'd turn around and march right out. That happened over and over every church night, the Klan bringing money to the worship of God." That was Elmore County, Alabama.

"He slashed her right in front of the house. He must have been waiting out there. And she sat in the kitchen and the blood was pouring out of the side of her face and she was moaning. I didn't know a razor made a cut like that." That was South Carolina.

A white woman recalled her childhood in Hattiesburg. "In the middle of the night our cook came pounding on the door. Her husband had just been lynched, she said. I remember my father grabbing his shotgun and rushing out into the dark. And that poor woman sat in the kitchen crying hysterically, saying over and over again that her husband had been lynched and her house burned down. We children were scared and confused, and nobody knew what to do. Finally my father came back and told us that it was true, every word she'd said."

But the South likes to think of itself as just another gentle, placid place—that's one of its delusions, too.

And the other—and the greatest delusion of all—currently is that it understands its Negroes.

I have frequently heard people insist, "The Negro was never happy after he achieved his freedom. It's been a burden to him."

"They shouldn't try to go to school with whites. They just get nervous breakdowns." This was a white teen-ager in Tennessee.

Actually, of course, the Negro child in a white school has managed very well. Dr. M. Robert Coles of Atlanta who has studied such children over a period of years, reported his findings in an article in the American Journal of Psychiatry last October. He found that if Negro children, young and old, come to this traumatic experience (the initial desegregation of schools) with no previous emotional disturbance, they suffer no significant psychiatric illness. Dr. Coles believes the record is so good because the child has made an adjustment to a hostile world long before entering school.

And the gas station operator in Jackson (everybody insists on talking about the Negro today) said: "Our niggers are happy. If those outside agitators would only let them be."

"Not like that around here," any Southerner will tell you in the rural areas. "We got good niggers around here; there won't be any trouble."

The man from near Memphis said: "We know what they're thinking, all right. See it on their faces plain as day."

They'd be astonished at how wrong they are. Actually, even among literate, intelligent people, black and white communication is very limited.

Whites talk freely to other whites, to Negroes, even when they don't care to be quoted. Behind every white, no matter what his social rank, is the security of the dominant race. That fact gives even the weakest a certain courage, at least for talking. Negroes rarely if ever do that. In some cases they are simply not verbal, not used to expressing themselves. But more often they don't care to communicate with a white person.

A teacher at a Negro college told me: "There ought to be more Negroes on the faculty. Fewer whites—I know that sounds bad, but it's true. The students need somebody to talk to, and they just can't talk to a white man: they wouldn't trust him." He was under no illusions why they elected him their confidant: "Because my skin is black."

In the South today, it seems to me there is almost no trust between the races. Some, to be sure, is the whites' fault. But some—and this is not a popular truth—lies with the Negro. The Negro tends to see everything in terms of color.

A couple of months ago, I was talking with an extremely intelligent novelist, who also happens to be a Negro. We were in the midst of an animated conversation, and I had quite forgotten the skin that sheltered this perceptive man. He had just come from the West, by car. He listed his route for me: legendary places—Grand Canyon, Snake River, Grand Coulee. It had been an incredible tour.

Now if there is anything the West needs, it is a fresh eye to survey it, and here, I thought, was a chance to hear a sensitive man's comments. "What," I said cheerfully, "did you make of all that?" "Well," he said, "the situation in North Dakota is rather bad. Only a fraction of a per cent of their population is Negro, but there's a lot of bad feeling. . . ." He was answering me in terms of race, of color. I wonder if he had even seen the country he passed through, if he wasn't too involved in the problem to see anything else.

Shield of Color

"Look," one young Negro told me briskly, "you just can't get away from it. We've got our social pressures, too, you know. If you're not concerned, you are called an assimilist and an Uncle Tom. If you are concerned, it gets to be an obsession. Either way, you're in trouble."

Often, too, the Negro uses his color as a shield against the unpleasantness of life.

In one of the colleges in the Deep South, a Negro woman applied for admission to graduate study. Her training did not seem adequate, but the department made the allowance that liberal Southerners so often make, and admitted her. It was an unfortunate experience. Her inadequate preparation was her undoing; she simply could not catch up fast enough, and she flunked out. She left in a nasty barrage of accusations, insisting that they had failed her only because she was a Negro. Her accusations against her teachers were not only untrue, but they had the added irony of being directed against people who had gone out of their way to help her.

Now, as Negroes will tell you, what they want is political, economic and educational equality. Their aims are as simple as the white resistance is complex. And the whole situation is incredibly complicated by a lack of communication.

The Flight North

I think it is the fate of every white person in the South (and very probably in the North as well) to almost never have a serious personal conversation with a Negro. There are plenty of professional contacts, of course.

A North Carolina doctor's wife said, "When I was in nursing school years ago, my supervisor was a Negro and I didn't think anything of it."

And in New Orleans doctors' offices there are often Negro nurses, where they are apparently accepted by white patients without difficulty.

But still, these relationships, though they may be based on mutual respect, are not personal. And they are not common enough to have any real impact on the white South.

Mostly what the white man in the South sees is the mocking black mask. Negroes have cultivated this to a very high degree, mostly, I suppose, because they have had to. Negroes can be deferential in such a way that it is incredibly insulting. I've seen white people driven into furies by this attitude. "You saw him sass me," one white woman said exasperatedly. "You saw that." And I had. And he did. But there wasn't one word, one gesture, that wasn't the height of humble politeness. But the whole effect was as insulting as a Bronx cheer.

Suspicion and fear of the white man's world. An utter lack of self confidence. These are the handicapping elements that the young Southern Negro has to overcome, and some are doing it.

A Louisiana couple had three sons, all handsome young men. All three worked their way through college. Two are now schoolteachers, one is a businessman in Michigan; they come South twice a year to see their parents. Because I often ask rude questions, I said, "Why didn't you settle here, in your parents' home? This community needs you."

The only reason they bothered to answer me at all is because they are very polite men. "The community can do without us," they said.

These men are far more successful than the average, but otherwise their story is typical. The Negro is leaving the South. In 1940, 61 per cent of the Negro population lived in the Southeastern states; in 1950 it was 55 per cent; in 1960 it was 44.8 per cent. Unfortunately, it is the able, energetic Negroes who are leaving.

(Incidentally, the migration of brains and energy is not confined to Negroes. I rather suspect that it is also true of Southern-born whites. Part of it is economic: the better-paying jobs are usually Northern. But part of it is not; part of it is just the urge to flee from an intolerable situation. One young white man from Tuscaloosa took a job in Oregon at almost the same salary he was making in Alabama. "Well," he shrugged wryly, "they'll pay my moving expenses, but with the problem of finding a new house and selling this one here, I'll probably lose money on the deal. . . . So why did I do it? You'd think I'd be used to it, wouldn't you? But I guess not. And with the kids growing up, I just didn't want them to grow up in the South.")

It isn't all one way, of course. Recently, I had a long talk with Ted Gilliam of Orlando, Florida, a Northern-educated Negro who has chosen to come back to the region of his birth. He is a tall, slender young man in his late twenties. He was educated in the segregated schools of North Florida, went to all-Negro North Carolina College, then finally to the Yale School of Drama from which he graduated in due course. Looking back, he admits that he was needlessly disturbed and uncertain. "Before I went to New Haven, I was worried about a lot of things: whether I could keep up, whether there'd be incidents and unpleasantnesses that would upset me so I couldn't work. I didn't trust myself. I was worried. But when I got there it turned out Yale wasn't all that hard; my preparation at North Carolina College was a lot better than I'd imagined."

Apathy Comes Early

And then we turned to the problem of education for the Negro youth. Gilliam once taught in a Negro college in the Deep South and he has some cogent comments on his experience. "The students were apathetic. I was teaching speech and when I'd correct their pronunciation —or anything like that, any tiny thing— they'd object. They'd say, "Look, everybody around my neighborhood says it that way." So I'd try to explain that the rest of the country expressed it differently. But they'd just answer me: "Since I'm never going to be able to get away, to leave here, what's the difference? Since I'm never going to be able to do anything, I'll always be like this; why try?"

Gilliam smiled to himself, remembering when he, too, had been caught in that round of depression and discouragement. "That's what the Negro school system does to you. It leaves you so unsure, feeling you can't do anything."

His judgment was echoed almost exactly by another teacher, a white woman of wide experience with Negro college students. "I teach them English," she said, "and in most cases the preparation is so bad, I rarely get beyond the rudiments of grammar. In quite a few cases, though, the young people absorb knowledge like sponges. It's a pleasure to watch. But sooner or later there comes a point and they stop. It's as if they were telling you: This far and no more. Seems to me they take it all out in a social life that's as elaborate as a finishing school's. I can't help noticing that the girls change two and three times a day. They must spend a fortune on clothes. Money isn't the problem; their parents are successful enough. It's some sort of failure of will, some sort of fear. . . ."

"It's like that," Gilliam agreed. And then we went on to talk about the fact that the South, which has always managed to produce white writers at a great rate, has never produced a Negro writer, excluding the late Richard Wright. "Isn't that strange?" I asked him. "I would think that writing would be a very popular field. After all, it requires no special training, no special education, nothing beyond pen and paper."

A Desire to Start

Gilliam shook his head. "You almost have to have felt it to know what I mean. The school—your whole life—makes you feel worthless. You know you're licked before you start, so you don't start."

The earnest, serious educator from Arkansas: "If we did integrate the schools honestly and all at once—if we did that—we'd wreck the system. The rate of Negro delinquency is so high our disciplinary problems would triple. And even if we somehow got by the discipline, the Negro preparation is so utterly inadequate, their home life in general so bad—they either wouldn't stay in school or they'd flunk. Either way it wouldn't help them." Her face reflected genuine concern. "There's nothing more important than education, but we've backed ourselves into a corner, and there isn't any way out."

Bill Hogan, head of the department of history at Tulane University, says with a sigh, "The hardest thing is to get qualified Negro students. Lots of times, they don't fill out the form properly.

"And there's no funny business—none of the sort of things that happen with registrars of voters. We just have a form for all students. They just don't seem to finish filling it out."

After being second-class citizens for so very long, many Negroes have come to half-believe it. . . .

It's commonplace for Southerners to insist that they "know their nigras." They are deluding themselves. If they knew, they'd be shocked. There is an enormous residue of hatred in the Southern Negro. It has never yet been focused, and if we are lucky the South will make enough social progress to dispel it before it fully reveals itself. But the hate does exist, and every now and then you stumble across its signs.

If Hate Is Focused . . .

One of the most amazing and frightening conversations I ever had in my life was on this subject. I think it is probably the only personal—truly personal—conversation I have ever had with a Negro since I've been an adult.

Call her Alberta, though that wasn't her name. She was from one of the Black Belt counties of Alabama, a tall woman with a magnificent figure, very dark. "No other blood in me." She had very little school. "They taught me to read and that was about all." She had married unhappily. "He had no ambition." She was scornful of her husband even at a distance: "Didn't care what happened to him." So she left him, and went (as all energetic rural Negroes do) to the city. She got a job as a children's nurse, while she took a course in typing and shorthand. "They wanted somebody to live in, and I wanted a place to live. And I didn't mind working weekends; I didn't have any place I wanted to go."

She read voraciously because somehow in that dreadful little school (and many of the present-day Negro schools are not much above the level of the nineteenth-century field school) they had managed to teach her to read very well. She read fiction mostly, some biography, some history, and no poetry. The sound of language meant nothing to her, only the meaning. She read Frank Yerby, chuckled when she found out he was a Negro. She refused to read Richard Wright or Ralph Ellison. "I know about that," she said. One day, when she seemed more relaxed than usual, I asked her about her long-range plans. She wanted to go to secretarial school. "I'll have a good job, I'll be a good secretary, and the bosses will come to me and say: 'We want you to come to work for us,' and I'll look and I'll take the job I want. And some of those will be white people, and I'll say, 'No thank you, I worked for white people enough. I'd rather work for a black man now.' . . . And I won't ever cook again. I'll eat out every single meal, even breakfast." And then without any coaxing from me, she went on talking about white people. She wasn't looking at me, she was looking at the pages of the book in her hand, and so she didn't remember that my skin was the wrong color. She began talking about her job. "Sometimes at night, the kids cry, the girl keeps having dreams. And the baby, he wakes and cries, too. With the intercom turned on, I can hear them fine in my room. But I just lie there for a while and listen to them before I get up. It sounds good to me to hear them cry. And in the morning their mamma will say: 'Didn't I hear them cry last night?' And I'll just say: 'Just once until I could get there,' and she believes me. I like to hear white children cry."

I suppose she was a sick woman, and I hope there are not many more like her.

It isn't all like that in the South. It isn't all hate and struggle. There are memories of pleasant associations, memories buried indelibly in the mind of every middle-class child. Memories of a classless, colorless world. Memories of innocence before the fall. White children are raised by Negroes. Raised carelessly in Northern terms. Not terribly clean. Unbalanced diet. I remember having bread smeared with lard for breakfast—and I remember thinking it was very good. White child played with black—with the cook's child, the laundress's child, children from other streets who drifted by. Played in the back yards with chinaberry seeds and mysterious magic bones, always keeping a wary eye on the kitchen door, in case something interesting should happen there. There were supposed to be some rules: like the one about white children wearing shoes at all times. But no one bothered with that, and the shoes stayed on the corner of the porch. You were all children together. You pestered the cows, and climbed up to see birds' nest and fell out of the trees, hunted for ripe mulberries in summer and pecans in fall, you stole pomegranates from old ladies' yards and ran from stray dogs. You learned all sorts of things: when a watermelon is ripe, how to kick in a fight, what the good faces of the moon are, how to cast a spell and make lost objects return. . . . There was no difference, boy and girl, black and white.

The Unfelt Loss

Until school. When you are six, that childhood is over. Black and white go off to different schools. And after school, well, there always seem to be things to do. Suddenly. Dancing school for the girls, shooting for the boys, things to be done at the church, lessons to study. I don't know that this is a deliberate plan of the white adult world, I don't know at all; but the dark friends of your childhood disappear. And you don't even feel the loss, because they are replaced immediately with so many other things. But at some point—later on, somewhere—you will look around and you'll see that they are gone. You can remember what it once was, but things aren't that way anymore and you don't know a way back, because by then black and white have taken on the color of their lives.

And from that moment—when the white Southerner looks around and sees what happened to his world while he wasn't looking—he will never be entirely free from guilt.

But as long as there is guilt, it seems to me, there is the possibility of progress. More—far more—than we have ever had before. And conditions in the South are improving. The moderate responsible Negro will admit quite freely that he has a better chance today than he has ever had, or was ever likely to have. I talked to Dr. Leonard Burns in New Orleans. Dr. Burns, who is very active in the NAACP, has been subjected to the usual harassments of a civil rights leader—a phone that rings at all hours of the night; a large front picture window that has been broken several times. He is quite calm about the situation, though like any father he does worry over the possible effect on his three young children. He is also a successful Negro in the Deep South; his house is very modern, very well furnished and very well equipped—the house of a well-to-do man anywhere.

Dreams v. Reality

Dr. Burns sees the future this way: "In the South, things are getting better slowly. And please note that I said slowly, very slowly. But we are making progress. Why, in the field of race relations, things are happening today that we would not have dared hope for ten years ago, that we would not have even dared dream of twenty years ago."

That very same day I talked with Jack Nelson, a Mississippi-born attorney practicing in New Orleans. He is one of the very few white lawyers who will take a civil rights case, and he has tried many of them. He admits cheerfully that his pro-civil rights position has probably damaged his practice. (That is a fact that most Southern liberals have had to face in one way or another.) Surprisingly enough, Mr. Nelson says that his treatment by judges and courts has been extremely fair. He has been treated with respect and politeness by many people who do not agree with his basic position. That is one hopeful sign. And Mr. Nelson sees even more hope in the future. "We in the South have used the law as an instrument of oppression. Southern legislatures have used laws to perpetuate the mores of this section of the country, to oppress a minority group. The Negro today has the leaders as well as the numbers, and he will decide his own future." THE END

Peace in the South

THE SOUTH so far in the fall of 1964 has acquitted itself with honor and dignity in the matter of school desegregation, and we do not think this fact and the reasons for it should escape attention.

One has only to recall place names in the headlines of the recent past to realize how great has been the change. Remember the stories from Little Rock, New Orleans, Clinton and the others where change was accompanied by agony and the distorted faces of hate provided material for all the world's front pages?

This year such cities as Albany, Ga., and Montgomery, Ala., where sad stories were reported in the past, have desegregated their schools calmly and with dignity.

Despite all the defiance out of Jackson, Miss., on other matters, Mississippi acquitted itself well when it finally confronted public school desegregation in several localities this fall. Its public officials generally acted with great responsibility in preserving order in each instance. Even Leake County, Ross Barnett's home, made it over this hurdle despite the former governor's comments that he was working to prevent desegregation there.

Nowhere in the South were there the opening-day disasters that characterized some former years.

What explains the change?

Obviously, 10 years and many riots after the Supreme Court ruling on school desegregation, the inevitability of desegregation has been accepted by most people. This is part of the explanation.

Yet it seems equally obvious that the absence of political opportunism and demagoguery was a basic factor. Governors were not out this time, as they were in the past, gainfully intruding in local school situations even over the objections of the elected officials running the schools. Some of the state-level agitators could not agitate this time because they are under specific court orders based upon their past actions. Without their interference, local communities have been able to do what they had to do without riots and consequent great damage to their areas.

All this is worth noting in 1964, the year when there were no opening-day headlines on violence in the South.

Win Over Foes, Negroes Urged

By DICK HERBERT

A leading Atlanta Negro educator told some 200 civil rights leaders Monday night that they must concentrate on converting their foes into friends rather than merely defeating them.

Dr. Harry V. Richardson, president of the Interdenominational Theological Center, said the movement "must change from an emergency push to a sustained drive to a larger end —complete victory." He explained that victory is not complete when enemies are merely defeated, because then "they'll wait and try to get back at you."

Richardson addressed the first Point of Progress Dinner of "Operation Breadbasket," an organization of Negro ministers that has been seeking new and upgraded employment for Negroes.

A leader in the project, Dr. Ralph D. Abernathy, revealed that Negroes have been placed in 750 new or upgraded jobs with an increased income of $1,500,000 during the program's first 18 months.

"This is the most successful project conducted by a civil rights group in Atlanta during recent years," he said.

He presented three merit awards for contributions to the civil rights movement. They went to Jesse Hill Jr., a consultant for "Operation Breadbasket"; Larry Fox, president of the Committee on Appeal for Human Rights, and the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr., head of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference. "Operation Breadbasket" is an affiliate of SCLC.

In his address, Dr. Richardson praised the ministers' work in securing better jobs for Negroes because he said job opportunities "are basic" in all civil rights goals.

"Financial relief, whether public or private, sustained over a long period, is not the answer . . . It tends to destroy initiative," he commented.

However, he added that he is "concerned" that the civil rights movement prepare itself "for the long continuing struggle."

He called for unity among civil rights advocates under selected leadership so that the goal of a victory "complete enough to end the war" might be reached.

The Motel Case: 'The Suit Must Fail'

7-23-64 Journal

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT NORTHERN DISTRICT OF GEORGIA ATLANTA DIVISION

CIVIL ACTION NO. 9017

HEART OF ATLANTA MOTEL, INC., a Georgia corporation, Plaintiff,

—versus—

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA and ROBERT F. KENNEDY as the Attorney General of the United States,

Defendant

This is a complaint filed by Heart of Atlanta Motel, a large downtown motel in the city of Atlanta, regularly catering to out of state guests, praying for a declaratory judgment and injunction to prevent the Attorney General of the United States from exercising powers granted to him under the Civil Rights Act of 1964, 42 U.S.C.A., Section 1971, as amended. The suit also attempts to obtain recovery from the United States for substantial damages alleged to result from a partial taking of the complainant's property without just compensation.

Conceding, as it does, that it is regularly engaged in renting sleeping accommodations to out of town guests, seventy - five percent of whom come from without the state of Georgia, and that it "has refused and intends to refuse to rent sleeping accommodations to persons desiring said accommodations, for several different reasons, one of which is based on the grounds of race, unless ordered by this Court to comply with the provisions of the Civil Rights Act of 1964," the suit attacks the constitutionality of the public accommodations sections of the Civil Rights Act as applied to such a motel.

Since this is a suit seeking an injunction against the enforcement of a Federal statute on the alleged grounds that it is in violation of the United States Constitution, a three-judge court was convened as provided for in 28 U.S.C.A., Section 2282.

The Attorney General filed a counterclaim seeking, on behalf of the United States, a temporary and permanent injunction against future violation of the Civil Rights Act by the plaintiff. The case was set down for hearing, and after the introduction of oral testimony on behalf of the United States, the signing of stipulations between the parties, and oral statements made by counsel for the plaintiff in open court, it appeared that no factual issues remained. The parties also conceded in open court that the matter might be treated as a hearing on the petition for the final permanent injunction.

In the first place, the claim of the plaintiff for damages against the United States on the alleged ground of deprivation of property without just compensation alleges no grounds for relief, entirely aside from the question whether such alleged deprivation would be justified by reason of the power of Congress to enact this particular legislation. This is so, because such a claim for damages or recovery for value of property taken by the Federal Government must be asserted in the United States Court of Claims unless the amount sought is not in excess of $10,000. However, in the view we take of the law, such a suit is not maintainable in any event.

The real question presented by this complaint and counterclaim is whether Section 201(a), (b), (1) and (c) is constitutional.

"Sec. 201(a). All persons shall be entitled to the full and equal enjoyment of the goods, services, facilities, privileges, advantages, and accommodations of any place of public accommodation, as defined in this section, without discrimination or segregation on the ground of race, color, religion or national origin.

"(b) Each of the following establishments which serves the public is a place of public accommodation within the meaning of this title if its operations affect commerce, or if discrimination or segregation by it is supported by State action:

(1) Any inn, hotel, motel, or other establishment which provides lodging to transient guests, other than an establishment located within a building which contains not more than five rooms for rent or hire and which is actually occupied by the proprietor of such establishment as his residence; . . .

"(c) The operations of an establishment affect commerce within the meaning of this title if (1) it is one of the establishments described in paragraph (1) of subsection (b); . . . ."

In substance, this section of Title II declares the right of every person to full and equal enjoyment of the goods, services and facilities of any hotel or motel which provides lodging to transient guests if it contains more than five rooms for rent or hire. The section is a congressional ascertainment and declaration of the fact that such "an establishment affect(s) commerce within the meaning of this Title."

Article I, Section 8, of the Constitution provides: "Clause 1: The Congress shall have power . . . Clause 3: to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states, and with the Indian tribes:" and Clause 18 "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers . . ."

In United States v. Darby, 312 U.S. 100, 118, the Supreme Court said:

"The power of Congress over interstate commerce is not confined to the regulation of commerce among the states. It extends to those activities intrastate which so affect interstate commerce or the exercise of the power of Congress over it as to make regulation of them appropriate means to the attainment of a legitimate end, the exercise of the grant of power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce. See McCullough v. Maryland, 4 Wheat 316, 421."

Thus, it need not be decided whether the outlawing of racial discrimination by a hotel accepting transient guests may be justified on the ground that it is actually in the stream of commerce. The power of Congress, when that body seeks to occupy the full extent of its powers under the Constitution, "extends to those activities intrastate which so affect interstate commerce . . . as to make regulation of them appropriate means to . . . the exercise of the granted power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce." Of course, the initial determination of whether the challenged regulation is such "appropriate means" is for Congress. Courts may not overturn such determination unless they conclude that under no reasonable theory could Congress find them "appropriate to the attainment" of its power to regulate commerce.

This Court, as recently as July 10, 1964, in the case of Marriott Hotels of Atlanta, Inc. v. Heart of Atlanta Motel, Inc., C.A. No. 8832, held that the operations of Heart of Atlanta Motel (1) are in the stream of commerce, and that, in any event, (2) such operations affect commerce so as to subject it to Congressional regulation under the Sherman Antitrust Act. It being undisputed that in the adoption of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, Congress has seen fit to exercise its full power as granted it under the Constitution the scope of its operation in this field must, therefore, be taken to be at least as broad as that which it exercised in the adoption of the Sherman Act. Its scope is, therefore, also as broad as in the legislation affecting labor relations under the National Labor Relations Act. It is broader than that exercised by Congress in its regulation of wages and hours of services under the Wage and Hour laws.

In the specific field of hotel operations, the Supreme Court has ruled that the National Labor Relations Board could not lawfully follow a policy of refusing to take jurisdiction over unfair labor practices and other labor disputes in hotels and motels as a class. Hotels Employees Local No. 255 v. Leedom, 358 U.S. 99. Following that decision, the Court of Appeals of this judicial circuit in N.L.R.B. v. Citizens Hotel Co., 5 Cir., 313 F. 2d 708, overruled a contention by the Citizens Hotel Company, operator of the Texas Hotel in Fort Worth, Texas, that its operations did not fall within the constitutional reach of the National Labor Relations Act because it was not either engaged in commerce, nor did its operations affect commerce. In arriving at that decision the court referred to the Supreme Court's opinion in National Labor Relations Board v. Reliance Fuel Oil Corp., 371 U.S. 224. That case dealt with an attack by the local fuel oil corporation on the jurisdiction of the Labor Board because, while most of the products sold by Reliance had been acquired from Gulf Oil Corporation and had been delivered to it from without the state of New York, they nevertheless had been received and stored in the state before sales were made to Reliance. It was thus contended that Reliance was not engaged in commerce nor were its operations such as to affect commerce within the constitutional sense. The Supreme Court said:

"That activities such as those of Reliance affect commerce and are within the constitutional reach of Congress is beyond doubt. See e.g. Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U.S. 111."

The opinion also significantly quoted from the court's earlier decision in Polish Alliance v. Labor Board, 322 U.S. where, at page 648, it had said:

"Congress has explicitly regulated not merely transactions or goods in interstate commerce but activities which in isolation might be deemed to be merely local, but in the interlacings of business across state lines adversely affect such commerce."

It is clear that the attack by the complainant on the constitutionality of these sections of the Civil Rights Act must fail. It is equally clear that the United States is entitled to the injunction prayed for by it in its counterclaim. An injunction will issue in the following terms:

ORDER

The plaintiff, Heart of Atlanta Motel, Inc., a corporation, its successors, officers, attorneys, agents and employees, together with all persons in active concert or participation with them, are hereby enjoined from:

(a) Refusing to accept Negroes as guests in the motel by reason of their race or color;

(b) Making any distinction whatever upon the basis of race or color in the availability of the goods, services, facilities, privileges, advantages or accommodations offered or made available to the guests of the motel, or to the general public, within or upon any of the premises of the Heart of Atlanta Motel, Inc.

So that the plaintiff may have an opportunity to prepare its record for appeal and, if so advised, seek a stay of this order, it is ORDERED that the foregoing injunction shall become effective twenty (20) days from the date hereof, on, to-wit, the 11th day of August, 1964.

This 22nd day of July, 1964.

Civil Rights: Facts vs. Fiction

The Civil Rights Act of 1964 is a new bill of rights for everyone, regardless of race, creed or color.

This basic fact has been overlooked, ignored or distorted by those who are opposed to equal rights for anyone.

This is—in capsule form—what the act provides:

JOBS: Starting in July 1965, discrimination and segregation in employment, or in unions, is forbidden. Complaints will be processed through state agencies; the federal Equal Employment Opportunity Commission acts only if a state fails to act.

PUBLIC ACCOMMODATIONS: Effective at once, every hotel, restaurant, theater or other facility catering to the general public must do exactly that. Thirty-one state laws, already in effect have even stronger provisions.

SCHOOLS: The Attorney General of the United States has greater power to implement the Supreme Court decision of 1954 prohibiting segregation in public schools.

VOTING RIGHTS: Both the federal courts and the Attorney General are instructed to make sure registration and voting rights are safeguarded under uniform, reasonable standards.

There are other provisions in the law; a detailed analysis is available free of charge from the AFL-CIO. But these are the basic points.

Enemies of civil rights, enemies of labor, enemies of democracy itself are spreading lies about the terms of the act in order to play upon the fears of homeowners, parents, employers and workers. Here is the truth about the kind of lies that are told:

FICTION: "If you sell a house, you have to sell to a Negro."

FACT: The AFL-CIO believes that discrimination in housing should be ended. But there is no reference whatever to housing in the Civil Rights Act.

FICTION: "Your children will be sent out of the neighborhood to some Negro school."

FACT: Local school boards in some cities, operating under state and local statutes, have instituted pupil transfers in an effort to achieve better racial balance in their schools. But there is no such requirement in the Civil Rights Act, which provides only that schools must not be segregated.

FICTION: "A certain number of Negroes will have to be hired on every job, even if white people have to be fired to make room for them."

FACT: This is a myth. The law will properly put an end to discrimination in employment —including discrimination in seniority systems. But it does not in any way interfere with existing job rights. There are no "quotas" established. As a matter of fact, "inverse discrimination," even if intended to offset past evils, would actually be a violation of the law.

In short, the Civil Rights Act of 1964, in letter and spirit, is dedicated to justice—to the principles of democracy and fair play which are in the highest American tradition.

ATLANTA STUDENTS—Briefing Before Demonstration

Atlanta Sit In Agreement

During the winter of 1960 eighty students and Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. were arrested for sit-in demonstrations. They chose jail rather than bail. Later, store owners dropped the charges against them. A negotiating committee was formed with Atlanta's Mayor, William B. Hartsfield serving as liaison with the merchants. A thirty-day truce was set during which student demonstrations were halted. Negotiations broke down at the end of the truce and demonstrations were renewed. The adult Negro community widened its boycott to the entire downtown business area in support of the student protests. A. T. Walden, retired attorney and civil rights leader was selected to explore the renewal of negotiations. He immediately reestablished communication between the students and merchants and negotiations were reopened.

On March 7, 1961, Ivan Allen, Jr., president of the Chamber of Commerce representing the merchants released a statement to the press setting October 15, 1961 as the latest date for desegregating eating facilities, the re-employment of Negro persons discharged because of closed lunch counters and restuarants and the up-grading of Negro workers on the basis of merit.

It was erronously reported to the press by Mr. Allen that the merchants had decided to desegregate when the Atlanta public school issues "are fully decided upon". The Negro leadership did not agree to that. Item No. 2 of the Agreement between the merchants, and signed by both sides, reads: "The final date for desegregating all lunch counters and other eating facilities as agreed upon by a group of merchants, is October 15, 1961 or before if deemed practicable, even if there be a delay in the school matter."

Great confusion resulted when the impression was given by the press that desegregation of lunch counters would be contingent on solution of the school integration problem which the community faces under a court order to desegregate when schools reopen in the fall.

What further nettled the Negro community was the reopening of lunch counters on a segregated basis. Neither students nor Atlanta Negroes feel they can in good conscience go back to the stores as long as the lunch counters are segregated. Therefore, the boycott continues and all indications are that it will remain effective as long as eating facilities in the stores remain segregated.

Prince Edward County

Our Federal government usually moves with dispatch when flood or famine strikes and a quick phone call assures the local community that Uncle Samuel is on call for the aid required. From our posture, we see in Prince Edward County, Virginia what we seriously believe to be disaster as great or greater than famine or flood. This rural community in the heart of the 'Black Belt' of Virginia is the only school district in the fifty states without public school education. And this situation has prevailed since June 1959 when the Board of Supervisors shut-down the public school system in the face of a court order to desegregate. (Prince Edward is one of the three original cases that brought about the May 17th Decision of 1954). More than this, Farmville, the county seat, is little less than 150 miles from the Nation's capitol.

The NAACP, almost a year ago entered a suit seeking to reopen the schools and it appears that the machinery of the District Federal Court has broken down entirely. We would not expect to hear any word from Mr. Eisenhower. Perhaps it has never occurred to the Justice Department that someone's civil liberties have been abridged. Federal funds are squeezed into the mortar of the bricks that hold these school facilities upright and the physical plants are deteriorating at a great loss to the county, state, and nation.

SCLC through its Virginia Conference (VCLC) proposed that within the first 100 days of Mr. Kennedy's administration, it may be well if he were provided an opportunity to act via executive authority in the light of this disaster or use the moral influence of his office to encourage some remedial action post haste through the Judicial or Legislative branch of the Federal government. To be sure there are some problems of precedent-setting to be considered, but none so grave as the nearly 4,000 young American citizens in Prince Edward County, Virginia without a public school system.

The method used might be a Congressional Sit-In for Public Schools. The Prince Edward situation might be pointed up to the nation and the new Administration, if, on an appropriate day, the parents and children of this beleagured county were to come to Washington, D. C., and 'sit-in' on our law making bodies until some respite is forthcoming. Already, several human relations organizations have given their endorsement or tacit approval to join in such a concerted direct action. CORE, The National Beauticians Association, the labor industry, and the American Friends Service Committee are numbered with these.

Perhaps you would lend your voice of protest to relieve this disaster of another stripe. For further information, Write: CONGRESSIONAL SIT-IN, c/o SCLC, 208 Auburn Avenue, N. E., Atlanta 3, Georgia.

REV. JAMES M. LAWSON JR.

Staff Consultant

The Reverend James M. Lawson, Jr. recently joined SCLC as staff Consultant to serve as lecturer and will work in program development of the Philosophy of Nonviolence.

While a graduate student at Vanderbilt University School of Divinity, Nashville, Tennessee, Mr. Lawson was expelled for his participation and arrest in lunch counter demonstrations. Two-thirds of the Divinity School's faculty members supported Lawson by immediately resigning in protest.

Mr. Lawson spent two years in India as a Methodist Missonary, and served as a Southern Regional Secretary of the Fellowship of Reconciliation (FOR). He will continue as pastor of the Scott Chapel Methodist church of Shelbyville, Tennessee.

NEW LEADERS

Training new leaders in the social struggle will advance on an organized basis now that SCLC has launched its Leadership Training and Citizenship Schools programs. Officials of SCLC have long realized the need for trained leaders working in their local communities to implement the social struggle for full citizenship.

The Affiliate organizations of SCLC will select persons to be trained as teachers and leaders. The trainees will go to Highlander Folk School at Monteagle, Tennessee to attend a five (5) day course. They will learn to teach Reading and Writing, Civics, Simplified Politics, the Philosophy of Nonviolence, Picketing, and other subjects necessary for understanding How our Nation Works.

Voter-Registration is a primary goal of the Citizenship Schools which will operate under the affiliate organization. There are no charges for attending these schools and receiving Certificates of Completion. Home study courses will be available at nominal costs for those who do not attend schools.

As the number of schools increases, training centers for teachers will be established throughout the Southern States to reduce travel time and cost. The first year will produce 240 schools and train about 12,000 citizens. Further information is available from Mrs. Dorothy Cotton, Educational Consultant of the Atlanta office.

CONSPIRACY

On February 21, 1961, attorneys for the Reverends Ralph Abernathy, Solomon Seay, Fred Shuttlesworth, and Joe Lowery filed a complaint in the Federal District Court at Montgomery, Alabama charging conspiracy by Governor John Patterson and other state, county and City of Montgomery officials, to deny them their Constitutional rights, guaranteed by the First, Thirteenth and Fourteenth Amendments.

This action followed a judgment totaling one million dollars against the ministers, ordered by an Alabama Court in favor of the officials who charged that statements printed in the New York Times newspaper were libellous. The ministers' names appeared in a full page ad. The New York Times is co-defendant in the suit which is still before the courts.

Automobiles and property owned by the pastors were impounded and sold at auction. Salaries will be garnisheed and all other property owned by them subject to auction.

In their complaint, the Negro leadership documents the design of intimidation, harassment and violence which is aimed at them. They charged further that state, county and city police, and judiciary are used to implement the conspiracy to impede their efforts in promoting full citizenship for Negroes under the Constitution.

Negro leaders are finding constantly increasing use of "officialdom" in efforts to defeat their mounting demands for full citizenship. The Courts are suitable arenas for this type of fight.

AFFILIATE ACTION

SCLC affiliates have been active in many areas where social protest and mass direct action have taken place.

• In PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA, the PETERSBURG IMPROVEMENT ASSOCIATION, an SCLC affiliate has moved steadily forward in its efforts to desegregate eating facilities.

The successful desegregation of the public library and the opening of eating facilities at the Trailways Bus Depot were high points in its program. The program at present has moved into merit hiring and non-segreated housing throughout the city.

• The recently formed VIRGINIA CHRISTIAN LEADERSHIP CONFERENCE has its headquarters in Petersburg and will serve as liaison with the parent body of SCLC in local and state programming.

On January 1, 1961 the VIRGINIA CHRISTIAN LEADERSHIP CONFERENCE, Dr. Milton A. Reid, president, led a Prayer Pilgrimage to Prince Edward County, Virginia focusing national attention on the plight of Prince Edwards' schoolless children. $1,000.00 was raised to aid in the reopening of public schools in the county.

• In LYNCHBURG, VIRGINIA where SCLC recently conducted an institute on Nonviolence, the LYNCHBURG IMPROVEMENT ASSOCIATION of which Rev. Virgil Wood is president, has been pursuing its human dignity program relentlessly. A suit in Federal Court against the city to desegregate all public facilities has been presented to the City's biracial committee as the alternative to the City Council's refusal to desegregate voluntarily.

• The MONTGOMERY IMPROVEMENT ASSOCIATION of MONTGOMERY, ALABAMA, an SCLC affiliate has moved its fight into the courts. Under the worst possible kind of terrorism of citizens by police the faithful leaders and followers continue their fight for freedom. The personal loss of property resulting from court judgments against the civil rights leaders strikes a vicious blow in the hearts of these men who so courageously lead the fight for freedom.

• At a recent testimonial banquet in his honor, the Reverend Kelly Miller Smith, president and organizer of the NASHVILLE CHRISTIAN LEADERSHIP COUNCIL, an SCLC affiliate, tribute was paid to his dynamic leadership in the social struggle in NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE and its surrounding area. Many notables including the Mayor of Nashville; Dr. Walter S. Davis, president of Tennessee A & I State University and others were present.

The Reverend Smith organized and directed the students and adults in the protest program which resulted in the desegregation of eating facilities in the City of Nashville. The Reverend James Lawson, Jr., at that time a student at Vanderbilt University assisted with the training of students for sitting-in and picketing.

Often referred to as the "Athens of the South", Nashville, Tennessee has been the scene of the kind of cooperation by students and adults which demonstrates outstanding leadership and deep dedication by all to the ideals of the social struggle.

• Since the Montgomery bus boycott, numerous organizations in California and surrounding states have given support to the Southern struggle. In January, 1961 this support took on structure when Martin Luther King, Jr. went to LOS ANGELES, CALIFORNIA where he met with over one hundred ministers and the WESTERN CHRISTIAN LEADERSHIP CONFERENCE was formed. The Reverend L. Sylvester Odom, pastor of Ward A.M.E. Church was elected president. The Reverend Edward Stovall, pastor of the Progressive Baptist Church, Berkley, California is vice-president. The WESTERN CHRISTIAN LEADERSHIP CONFERENCE encompasses California and six surrounding states. The State of California is divided into Northern, Central and Southern divisions. Dr. King recently returned from a very successful visit to OAKLAND, CALIFORNIA at the invitation of the Northern Division of the WESTERN CHRISTIAN LEADERSHIP CONFERENCE where he was principal speaker at a fund raising rally in the Oakland Auditorium.

10,000 persons attended. With the auditorium filled the crowd overflowed to the park next to the building. More than $8,000.00 was raised under the leadership of the General Chairman of the meeting, the Reverend Edward Stovall, vice-president of WCLC. The general program of the WESTERN CHRISTIAN LEADERSHIP CONFERENCE is to provide financial and moral support to SCLC in its general crusade to bring first class citizenship to all Americans. It will also continue supporting the SOUTHERN CHRISTIAN LEADERSHIP CONFERENCE'S scholarship program for students forced to leave college because of participation in the social protest; to provide aid to the four ministers against whom the State of Alabama was awarded a two-million dollar judgment and whose personal property has been sold at auction and income garnisheed.

SCLC and HIGHLANDER

It is standard routine for segregationists to label those working toward full citizenship for all Americans as "communist" or "red". Highlander Folk School at Monteagle, Tennessee has been under constant attack since its founding, twenty-eight years ago. It has never been proven that the program of the school or its staff is anything except sincerely devoted to the task of pointing the way to better racial understanding through education.

There is increasing use of the "red smear" to silence liberals working for a new South. However, SCLC will not curtail its program because of intimidation and harassment by segregationist "red baiting" tactics. Highlander has been supported by such great liberals as: Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, Reinhold Niebuhr, Harry Golden, Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick and others.

This school has given great support to Southern liberal leadership throughout its history.

DOROTHY F. COTTON

Educational Consultant

Dorothy F. Cotton, formerly Administrative Assistant to the Executive Director of SCLC, has been appointed Educational Consultant, to develop and direct educational programming of SCLC.

She is a graduate of Virginia State College and Boston University, and a native of Goldsboro, North Carolina. Mrs. Cotton will conduct liaison with SCLC affiliate organizations in the development of the Correspondence Institute, Leadership Training, Citizenship Schools, and other educational projects.

PROTEST In Jail

ROCK HILL, SOUTH CAROLINA —Eight Negro students, jailed for sit-in demonstrations, have carried the Nonviolent Method of resistance to work-gangs of the South Carolina Penal system. It has been reported that eight students were put in solitary confinement on bread and water for a "sit-down" and refusal to work. Cause of the protest was an order for the group of eight to shovel thirty-six loads of dirt each day. A companion crew of 27 prisoners were required to make thirty-two loads each day. Considering this unequal treatment, the student protest followed.

The moral courage displayed by students throughout the nation is a shining example of the "new" Negro.

Benefit Show

Heading a cast of star performers, Sammy Davis, Jr. Frank Sinatra, Sidney Potier, Mahalia Jackson, Count Basie, Dean Martin, Jan Murray, Nipsey Russell, George Kirby, Carmen McRae, Ruth Brown, Sy Oliver, and many other headline performers staged a benefit for SCLC and "Tribute to Martin Luther King, Jr." which grossed $53,000.00.

Under the sponsorship of A. Philip Randolph, the Reverend Gardner C. Taylor of Concord Baptist Church of Brooklyn, New York, and Harry Belafonte, the Committee to Aid the Southern Freedom Struggle (New York group of SCLC), organized and promoted the benefit which took place at Carnegie Hall in New York City. The night of January 27, 1961, the auditorium, famous for the great names which have graced its stage was completely sold out.

Squads of extra police were detailed to handle the huge crowd milling backstage in an effort to catch a glimpse of performers and notables.

A telegram from President John Kennedy was read which congratulated the Committee on its effort to aid the Southern freedom struggle. He also stated his determination to "make democracy in this country, not only a name but a reality".

Harry Belafonte, Sidney Potier and many other celebrities are members of the New York group.

During intermission Harry Belafonte stated " . . . we are taking a stand for what we believe is right, moral and democratic . . . "

• VOTING •

From the beginning, SCLC has been acutely aware of the unlimited potential of the Negro vote. Steadily it has been building up its voter-registration activities. The field staff is being enlarged to more effectively develop its program in the deep South states. Increased education in the Philosophy of Nonviolence, through workshops and institutes is scheduled for these areas. Several large hard-core states have been selected for highly intensified voter-registration campaigns.

Equality Now

In an article published in Nation Magazine, February 4, 1961, Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. speaks to our President.

Carefully documented are the powers, rights, and privileges of the Nation's chief executive to destroy segreation in all walks of life.

" . . . the primary goal of a well meaning administration should be . . . to wipe out immediately, every vestige of federal support and sponsorship of discrimination", noted Dr. King. "We must face the tragic fact that the Federal government is the Nation's highest investor in segregation".

FOR FREEDOM

SCLC AND THE FREEDOM RIDES

SCLC did not initiate the Freedom Rides. That wonderful idea was the creation of CORE (Congress of Racial Equality.) Everybody who reads the newspapers or looks and listens to a TV or radio knows of the violence that the twenty-odd Negro and white bus riders, who headed South on May 4th, encountered when they reached Anniston and Birmingham, Alabama. Since the bus drivers refused to take them on to Montgomery, the CORE group took a plane for New Orleans, the terminal point of their journey.

At this time, students of the Nashville Christian Leadership Conference, an affiliate of SCLC, picked up the challenge, resolving that a Freedom Ride had to go on to Montgomery and to Jackson, Mississippi and that the segregationists must not be allowed to feel that their violence and obstruction could thwart the drive to test the proposition of whether Negro and white traveling companions could exercise their rights to use the eating and comfort facilities of the bus depots.

The Rev. Fred Shuttlesworth, "Mr. Civil Rights" of Birmingham and Secretary of SCLC, from the very beginning played a key role in the Freedom Rides. He was CORE's main contact in Birmingham and sent automobiles to rescue the Riders after their bus was burned by a mob at Anniston. When Shuttlesworth was seized by Birmingham police, his wife telephoned to the SCLC home office and was much relieved to learn that the Rev. Wyatt Walker, SCLC Executive Director, was already en route to the scene of violence and confusion.

When the Nashville Riders pushed on to Montgomery, it soon became clear that this would be the crucial task of the big battle for human dignity. Accordingly, SCLC leaders in various parts of the country dropped whatever they were doing and hurried to Montgomery. Jim Lawson SCLC staff consultant, joined the Nashville group, Wyatt Walker, Ralph Abernathy and Martin Luther King, Jr., flew in and began to mobilize the nonviolent forces.

Great questions for American democracy were at issue: What would the notorious Governor of Alabama do? What would the U. S. Department of Justice do? Could the Freedom Riders be frightened or crushed?

The world now knows the answers to these questions.

As the Riders streamed into Alabama and Mississippi, SCLC leaders maintained contact with the Department of Justice as well as with some of the local law enforcing agents, and the press. Moreover, A Freedom Ride Nonviolent Coordinating Committee was set up that brought together CORE, SNCC (Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee) and SCLC. This closer cooperation among these sister organizations made for a more systematic approach to the Freedom Ride operation. It was realized, however, that many individuals and groups with varying backgrounds and orientations would join the movement. The coordinating committee insisted upon the discipline of nonviolence and pled for prominent Americans as well as others to bear witness to the cause by joining the Rides.

Some SCLC leaders were roughed up by police and mobs or were jailed. Wherever they were, in front or behind bars, they kept up their prayerful persuasion by song, word and conduct.

To date, SCLC has expended nearly $15,000 in legal fees, $10,000 in staff and transportation, $3,500 in telephone and telegraph communications and nearly $7,000 in cash appeal bonds. There are many related expenses which cannot be tabulated accurately. This is indeed a worthwhile though expensive commitment.

Operation Freedom Ride has given the nation — and the world — some realization of what the Negro traveler undergoes. Even more, it has given a vivid demonstration of the power of nonviolent social action. The inevitable victory for human decency has been brought closer. SCLC has conscientiously attempted to play its part.

• VOTING •

There are those who would like for the Sit-Ins and Freedom Rides to stop and that instead the revolutionary energy be channeled off into a campaign of voter registration. This might be less of a problem for moderates and certain government officials; less of a confrontation for those who deplore confrontations.

SCLC does not recognize "the either-or" theory of social change; rather, the "both-and" theory. It is not the courts or Sit-Ins; Freedom Rides or political action. All of these measures help reach the common goal of freedom and equality for all of God's children.

Thus, SCLC has planned for a stepped-up South-wide campaign of voter registration and hopes to get the large financial support that such an endeavor requires. In the meantime, as a sort of pilot project, SCLC is cooperating with the Atlanta citizens committee to secure some 10,000 new voters within a three-month span. Jim Wood, Public Relations Director for SCLC, is presently giving full time to this effort and SCLC is making other contributions of funds, facilities and personnel to this drive. It is hoped that new and more effective techniques will be developed in Atlanta so that a similar methodology may be applied elsewhere.

Leadership Training

It has been found that many persons do not vote because they are illiterate. To this end, SCLC has been seeking to set up literacy training centers that will give potential voters at least a "functional literacy" in a very short while and at the same time introduce them to the general philosophy of nonviolent social action.

This venture is meant to be an ongoing, long-range project. SCLC is gratified that the Marshall Field Foundation has granted $26,000 in much needed financial support. This has been done in cooperation with the Congregational Church.

After several trys, a training center for teachers of literacy has been set-up at Dorchester Community Center in McIntosh, Georgia, thirty miles south of Savannah.

Mrs. Dorothy Cotton, Educational Consultant for SCLC, has special responsibilities for this program and Mrs. Septima Clark, fully experienced in this work, has agreed to direct the instruction of these teachers for an intensive two-weeks course. She has joined SCLC staff.

A number of retired school teachers have volunteered to take this training in order that they may be better prepared to teach the would-be voters who would learn to read and write. Many more are needed. Friends and well-wishers are urged to help us recruit others.

Contributions

It is a healthy sign that financial support of SCLC is gradually becoming as dependent upon sustained subscription giving as upon collections at mass meetings. For too long the burden of financial responsibility for the organization has rested largely upon the shoulders of our President. He found it necessary to speak continually in order that our monthly payroll could be met.

Within the past year, a substantial number of our friends and well-wishers have been persuaded to make and redeem pledges for a definite sum each year and this has enabled us to plan ahead a bit, instead of living, so to speak, hand-to-mouth.

Nevertheless, our income is still far beneath the call for our services; consequently, campaigns all over the nation are still necessary in order to balance our budget. Moreover, many of these mass meetings are such great spiritual experiences that we hope our friends will see that their contributions at the moment of inspiration are followed by regular, periodic giving during the months ahead.

Recently, several impressive rallies were held in different sections of the country that demonstrated the financial as well as moral support of our crusade. The Baptists of the Greater New York area sponsored a series of meetings that resulted every time in a standing-room only crowd. At the final meeting in Albany, Governor Nelson Rockefeller was present. Before hand, he had held an off-the-record conference with Dr. King and Rev. Walker. Dr. Sandy F. Ray sent a certified check for $18,000 to SCLC on behalf of the Empire State Baptist Convention, the sponsoring organization.

In California, Dr. King, along with such stars of the entertainment world as Toni Harper, Dick Gregory, Mahalia Jackson, Herb Jeffries, George Shearing and Sammy Davis, Jr., with the Governor of the state and scores of other political and civic leaders in attendance, appeared before some 20,000 enthusiastic listeners on June 18th. The police estimated that more than twice that number had to be turned away from the Sports Arena. Some 6,000, who waited until the meeting was over, were admitted afterwards and for them Dr. King obligingly repeated his speech. Over $26,000 was raised.

San Francisco also had a successful rally on July 23rd at the Cow Palace.

On July 9th some 12,000 persons cheered at the Pittsburgh rally. Among the program sponsors was heavy-weight champion Floyd Patterson. Sammy Davis, Jr., would have been there but for the birth of his daughter which occurred about the same time.

The special civil rights night of the National Sunday School and BTU Congress, held in St. Louis, was also remarkably successful. In addition to Dr. King, other SCLC luminaries participated in the program—the Revs. Abernathy, Shuttlesworth, C. K. Steele of Tallahassee and Kelly Miller Smith of Nashville. More than 12,000 delegates and friends contributed $5,500 that Dr. O. Clay Maxwell, Congress President turned over to SCLC.

A dinner for friends who gathered at Theodore Kheel's home netted $7,000 of which Mike Quill's International Transport Workers Union donated $2,000, ear-marked for the legal defense fund of SCLC Alabama leaders who have been sued for libel by public officials in that state.

Many smaller groups throughout the country have sent in contributions that in proportion to their membership represent as great gifts as those listed above. All are needed and fully appreciated.

DIRECTOR AND WIFE JAILED

The newspapers have carried some account of the jailing and treatment of the Rev. Wyatt Tee Walker, Executive Director of SCLC, and his wife, Ann. They were Freedom Riders, who on their well-publicized departure from Atlanta found a mob as the reception committee in Montgomery. The threat of a bomb that supposedly was hidden in the bus terminal gave police the excuse for not permitting the Freedom Riders to enter the Montgomery depot. It was being cleared for bomb searching.

Upon arrival in Jackson, Mississippi, the Walkers and their companions were promptly arrested and, as the papers have reported, their stay in jail were quite rigorous. Upon their release, a controversy broke out between Jackson law-enforcing officials and the Walkers. A $275 ring and $75 in currency were missing when the jailers returned the belongings to the prisoners. When Walker made these losses public, the Jackson authorities attempted to put the blame upon Negro trusties. However, the latest word from the sheriff is that the Mrs. Walker will get her wedding ring and money or the sheriff himself will make them good.

VIGNETTE OF THE MONTH

Abernathy of Montgomery

The Rev. Ralph David Abernathy was in Atlanta at the home office of SCLC over the weekend of July 7th and he looked tired. He had a right to appear this way, for there are few men in America who have taken the battering that Abernathy has. As the world knows, Abernathy was second in command every step of the Montgomery bus boycott. Then, when Martin Luther King, Jr., shifted his base of operation to Atlanta, Abernathy became commander-in-chief of the famous MIA (Montgomery Improvement Association.) This meant that he was now the principal target of the segregationists — and this often meant the law-enforcing as well as lawless elements. Too, hardly a week passed without some direct or snide abuse by the local press.

Last spring Abernathy was in the midst of the anti-jim crow demonstrations that rocked the campus of Alabama State College. He did all that he could to prevent the slaughter of academic freedom — but in vain. There before his eyes, he saw faculty members kicked out and students expelled and those who remained shackled by self-incriminating oaths and a system of espionage and surveillance.

Because of an advertisement in the New York Times in the interest of fund raising for the defense of Martin Luther King, Jr., and the sit-in students, Abernathy, Rev. Joseph E. Lowery of Mobile and the Rev. Fred Shuttlesworth of Birmingham — all SCLC Board members and the Rev. S. S. Seay, Sr. of the MIA — were sued by Montgomery officials and the Governor of Alabama. When the all-white juries in local courts decided that the integration leaders had libeled city officials, Abernathy was stripped of his few worldly possessions. His joint interest, with his sisters and brothers in the family farm homestead that has been established by their parents, was seized and sold as was his automobile, though it was joint property of his wife.

When the Freedom Riders pushed through the Montgomery mob, Abernathy was right there. His church — First Baptist — was the object of the young hoodlum mass assault that brought forth the first action of the U.S. Marshals.

When he, Wyatt Walker, Shuttlesworth, Bernard Lee and others were seeing off a contingent of Freedom Riders to Mississippi, they decided to eat at the bus station restaurant. To their surprise, they were arrested, even though a similar group had eaten there the day before.

Abernathy was asked about things in Montgomery. He answered that the Freedom Rides had helped greatly. Despite the violence, Negroes, along with whites, are now using the general waiting rooms at transportation depots and though reluctantly, officials and depot managers are taking down the "white" and "colored" signs. Local people are encouraged by the bravery and success of "the outsiders." However, the lid is still down on Alabama State College. Although students from all over the nation are participants, to date not a single 'Bama State student or teacher has joined a Freedom Ride!

Abernathy laughs when he recounts some of his experiences in jail. True to the spirit of nonviolence, the Freedom Riders won over other prison inmates and soon had them singing the songs of freedom. "By now," Abernathy chuckles, "the movement has no doubt spread through the prison camps of the whole sovereign state of Alabama."

When the jailers put into a cell section with the Freedom Riders a prisoner whom they hoped would upset and perhaps assault the non-violenters, the first night he raised such a ruckus that nobody could sleep. However, the next day when he recognized Rev. Abernathy, he, too, joined the movement and thereafter threw his fits against the guards and jailers.

Despite adversity, good fortune has occasionally smiled on Abernathy. He has been given a new automobile by the joint effort of the people of Montgomery and California. The Victory Baptist Church of Los Angeles, Dr. A. A. Peters pastor, made the presentation of a 1961 Electra Buick. (His old car was a '56 Century Buick.)

Even better news than that, the Federal District Court at Montgomery has ruled that Abernathy, Lowery, Shuttlesworth and Seay were fraudulently held responsible for the New York Times ad by those officials who were suing them. The three SCLC leaders and the Rev. Seay are now free of suits pending and probably will be able to recover damages for the judgment that has been executed against them. The two suits that were lost in the lower Alabama courts are now being appealed.

Rev. Abernathy has received a call from the West Hunter Baptist Church of Atlanta. This is an attractive offer. As we go to press, he is still pondering this difficult decision. If Abernathy should leave Alabama, it will be a terrible loss. Like Fred Shuttlesworth in Birmingham, he has become such a bulwark of courage and fortitude that it would be most difficult to replace him.

Record of Suffering

It is surprising that so little writing has come out of the travail and imprisonment of what is presumed to be part of the most articulate sector of our society. College youths and other intellectuals, preachers, and teachers are regarded as specialists, who are endowed with talents and abilities for reading and writing — not to mention speaking. And yet few poems, essays, pamphlets and books have appeared from the pens of participants in the civil rights struggle. And this includes the Sit-Ins and Freedom Rides. The usual account that the public reads is done by some journalist. This is very well but quite different from what a participant himself would write.

In the light of this general condition, we are all thankful to the Rev. Wyatt Tee Walker. Not only did he keep a diary while he was in jail in Montgomery, but has also written up and submitted to the Department of Justice a clear and succint account of what he and his fellow passengers underwent during their Freedom Ride from Atlanta to Jackson, Mississippi.

Moreover, Rev. Walker and his wife, Ann, exchanged notes by way of trusties and other messengers while they were in the Jackson jail. This correspondence gives striking sidelights on living conditions there. The Afro-American and the Atlanta Inquirer have published some of these letters and leaves from the Walker diary.

We ask all 'jailbirds' — of the Sit-Ins and Freedom Rides especially — to write us a long letter, telling about the treatment, good and bad, to which they were subjected and above all, their own thoughts and feelings while confined.

We will be happy to publish these singly or as a collection, if the response lives up to expectations. For example, wouldn't it be wonderful to know what Jim Lawson was thinking while he was behind the bars or what are the details that caused Jim Farmer to issue the public statement that his stay in the Mississippi prison tried his very faith in human nature.

Briefs . . .

Farewell:

Mrs. Ernestine Brown, who for two years served as a devoted secretary in SCLC's home office, has moved over to the Lockheed Aircraft Corporation at Marietta, Georgia, where she has helped make a break-through to positions previously denied Negroes.

Hail:

Mrs. Virginia McCarton Brown, A.B. degree from Clark College, Atlanta, has joined SCLC office staff as clerk-typist.

Mrs. Edwina Hudson Smith, native Atlantan, recently returned from California, has been appointed manager of the SCLC home office. She reveals that she attended both San Francisco State College and the University of California at Berkeley where she studied sociology and anthropology and engaged in modern and primitive dancing during her leisure hours.

Bernard Lee, leader of the nationally famous anti-jim crow demonstrations of Alabama State College students and presently continuing his education at Morris Brown College, Atlanta, has given valuable assistance to the SCLC staff — especially with the Freedom Rides.

Marion Barry, one of Fisk University's great contributions to the Sit-In movement, has the difficult assignment of field work for SCLC in Mississippi. Diane Nash and Charles Sherrod of SNCC were also part of operation Mississippi.

Standbys:

Two other SCLC staff members have been with the organization so long now that they are "old-reliables" rather than "new comers." Miss Dora Edith McDonald became secretary to Dr. King on November 1, 1960. For a half dozen years she had been secretary to J. B. Blayton, Sr., head of the Mutual Federal Savings and Loan Association. Miss McDonald holds the B.S. in Business Administration from South Carolina State College, and collects antique china in her spare time.

She succeeded Mrs. Maude L. Ballou, who had served Dr. King through the dark days of the famous Montgomery bus boycott. After four devoted years to MIA and afterwards to SCLC, Mrs. Ballou accompanied her family when it moved to Virginia last fall.

Mrs. Lillie A. Hunter is another alumna of the Montgomery struggle. She was Dr. King's secretary at the Dexter Avenue Baptist Church where her record-keeping was so efficient that she was invited to become the bookkeeper for SCLC. She accepted the position on March 7, 1960. After working hours, she plays progressive jazz records and writes poetry.

The work of our field representative, the Rev. Harry Blake, has been outstanding in Louisiana. Not only has he assisted many mothers of fatherless children in getting restored to the public welfare rolls but Rev. Blake gave invaluable assistance to the federal civil right commission's investigation of voter discrimination and disfranchisement. Not only did he himself testify but he secured many affidavits and persuaded several persons to run the risk of presenting at an open hearing evidence of malpractice on the part of Louisiana officials who handle registration and voting.

Of our affiliates, the state of Virginia seems to be forging ahead. It is now in process of setting up as a state office under the dynamic leadership of Dr. Milton Reid.

CONVENTION ISSUE

SCLC Convention In Nashville, September 27-29

The Annual Convention of SCLC is scheduled to open in Nashville Tennessee with a scintillating benefit concert billed as a 'Tribute to the Freedom Riders' starring Harry Belafonte and the Belafonte Folk Singers. The show will be augmented by Miriam Makeba and the Chad Mitchell Trio. The intermission of the benefit will provide one of the high moments of the three-day meeting when ten young collegians who decided to continue the Freedom Ride after it was stopped by mob violence at Anniston and Birmingham will be especially honored. Dr. King and Mr. Belafonte are scheduled to make the awards.

The top names of the civil rights struggle in the Deep South will grace the platforms at the Nashville meeting. The Rev. James Lawson has been named as keynoter; James Farmer, National Director of CORE will address the plenary session as will Spottswood Robinson, Dean of the Howard University Law School and member of the Civil Rights Commission. William Kunstler of the American Civil Liberties Union will address the Lawyer's Forum and Seminar on Friday. Dr. King will speak at the city-wide Freedom Rally at the War Memorial Auditorium Wednesday evening.

The Nashville Christian Leadership Council serves as host affiliate with its president, Kelly Miller Smith as Coordinator. All sessions (day) will be held at the Clark Memorial Methodist Church with the exception of the Lawyer's Forum and Seminar on Friday that will meet at First Baptist Church. The Belafonte concert will be held in the Ryman Auditorium.

The theme of the three-day meeting is "The Deep South in Social Revolution." In addition to the annual business session on Thursday morning, workshops will be conducted daily in Nonviolence, Voter Registration, Community Organization and the Rural South as they relate to the present sharp change in social patterns across the South. More than two hundred registered delegates are expected to attend from the seventy affiliates of SCLC and other human relations organizations around the nation.

Citizenship Schools in Action

SCLC is moving forward in its Leadership Training Program. In the July workshop thirteen were trained from three different states: Louisiana, Georgia and South Carolina. Four of the persons are now able to operate centers training others to teach. Others in the class are setting up local classes. In August fifteen persons attended from Virginia, Tennessee, and Georgia. The September class has participants coming in from Prince Edward County, Dinwiddie, and Petersburg, Virginia and from Atlanta, Georgia.

Mrs. Dorothy Cotton, Mrs. Septima Clark and the Reverend Andrew Young will tour key area Louisiana and South Carolina during the month of October explaining the Citizenship Program and recruiting persons to take the five-day intensive training course at Dorchester Center, McIntosh, Georgia. All churches and organizations affiliated with SCLC are participating in this effort to help all of our people become fully participating citizens. Other groups which share our basic aims and philosophy are invited to join hands with us. Our staff and program are at your service.

Recent statistics have shown that in ten or twelve southern states there are over two million illiterates. Your help is needed if we are to effectively erase the cause of much of our suffering. Not only must we have basic reading and writing skills, but we must know something about Social Security, health benefits available, how equal job opportunities and better housing facilities are acquired, how government is run and those who control it. There are not enough governmental jobs to go around, but one way in which we can all participate in government is to register and vote.

For detailed information on the Citizenship School contact Mrs. Dorothy F. Cotton, Educational Director at SCLC. Join Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., in his noble efforts to reach all of our people—wherever they are.

HARRY BELAFONTE AND MARIAM MAKEBA STAR IN BENEFIT CONCERT

Harry Belafonte has become one of the world's best known artists through his individuality as a singer of folk songs and distinctiveness in choice of material and method of presentation.

He has emerged not only as a name of stature among the few "real stars", but as a unique combination of creative artist and commercial success — a man who has discovered the formula for maintaining a great mass appeal without compromising his art.

He has been called the "true musical historian of our times" and "the man who has brought folk singing into its own with other musical forms such as jazz, opera, and the classics".

The Belafonte repertoire knows no bounds of locale or geographic limitations. His songs are the songs of people all over the globe, of all fields of endeavor and every area of expression.

Miriam Makeba, a favorite performer in her native Union of South Africa, is a unique blending of singer, actress and visual historian of a great culture who has stirred music enthusiasts of the United States to extreme heights of praise within the short period that she has been in this country. Miss Makeba, an Xosa tribeswoman, lived most of her life in Prospect Township, Johannesburg, South Africa before coming to this country.

VIGNETTE OF THE MONTH

Shuttlesworth of Birmingham

The nationally televised 'CBS REPORT', Who Speaks for Birmingham, described the Reverend Fred L. Shuttlesworth of Birmingham, ". . . the man most feared by southern racists and the voice of the new militancy among Birmingham Negroes . . ." Friend and foe alike, with understandable respect, agree that this Alabama-born-and-bred Baptist minister is probably the most courageous man on the civil rights scene in the Deep South.

Fred Shuttlesworth has been pastor of the Bethel Baptist Church for the past eight years. It has been the focal center of the fight for freedom in Birmingham ever since 1956 when the NAACP was enjoined from operating in Alabama. In May of the same year, the Alabama Christian Movement for Human Rights was born with Fred Shuttlesworth as president. ACMHR bridged a gap that was desperately needed in the wake of the NAACP's forced exit from Alabama.

Shuttleworth's civil rights biography reads like something akin to an Horatio Alger story: Christmas 1956, Shuttlesworth home bombed and completely demolished; winter 1957, Bethel Baptist dynamited by racists; late 1957, Shuttlesworth and wife, mobbed, beaten, and stabbed; jailed eight times —four times during the Freedom Rides; sued for three million dollars by state officials of Alabama; automobile and personal property sold at public auction; drivers license revoked for a whole year; the three Shuttlesworth children illegally arrested and beaten at Gadsden (Alabama).

Dixie's most fearless freedom fighter is currently involved in twenty-seven criminal and civil actions. He has received sentences totaling three and a half years in time and $5,000 in fines. Fred Shuttlesworth is without a doubt the most abused and arrested minister in the nation.

Birmingham has been described as the 'worst city this side of Johannesburg, South Africa.' Despite the likes of Eugene (Bull) Connor and deeply entrenched habits of segregation in both the Negro and white community, Fred Shuttlesworth and the ACMHR have had an impact that Birmingham will long remember. The desegregation of the city buses, delayed through seemingly endless litigation and police harassment, is now a reality. Visitors to Birmingham today are shown street lights, paved streets, Negro policemen — all credited to Shuttlesworth and ACMHR. In the north Birmingham section, residents will point out 'Shuttlesworth School', 'Shuttlesworth Park' and 'Shuttlesworth Pool', each hurriedly built to stave off the persistent demands of Shuttlesworth and Company for adequate tax supported facilities.

Standing shoulder to shoulder with the dynamic leader is Mrs. Ruby Shuttlesworth. They have been the 'one-two punch' of Birmingham. Their three children have already demonstrated their mettle in the Greyhound incident at Gadsden. Mr. Shuttlesworth has high praise for the hard-core of faithful workers without whom, he confesses, "we couldn't have a movement". W. E. Shortridge, Treasurer of ACMHR and stabilizing force, Reverend Billups, the President's right-hand man, the George Prices, Mrs. Lola Hendricks, the Reverend Nelson H. Smith, are but a few of the dedicated and courageous people who have helped Fred Shuttlesworth make Birmingham a little better place to live.

Nationally famous in the civil rights struggle, Mr. Shuttlesworth is in demand all over the nation. His personal magnetism attracts great crowds wherever he speaks. He has traveled and lectured in Europe. He is a founder and Secretary of SCLC.

The anti-climax of this vignette is the fact that Fred Shuttlesworth, whose name has become synonymous with Birmingham, is leaving Birmingham. Late last month, Fred formally severed his ties with the faithful congregation of Bethel to accept the pastorate of the Revelation Baptist Church in Cincinnati, Ohio. The hard and cold reality of educating three children on the modest salary of a southern pastor influenced Mr. Shuttlesworth's decision to leave. ACMHR unanimously requested him to continue as president. He is determined to see the Birmingham struggle end in victory. Although he has accepted the new church in Cincinnati, Mr. Shuttlesworth commutes weekly to insure positive leadership in Birmingham. He continues to serve as Secretary of SCLC and on the Board of the Southern Conference Educational Fund. Everyone is agreed that the loss of Fred Shuttlesworth's full-time energies is difficult for the struggle to sustain. It will be a long time before we find another 'man for Birmingham'.

The most recent issue of the Movement Newsletter of Birmingham had this to say: ". . . the South has not finished with Shuttlesworth,—nor has Shuttlesworth finished with the South!"

Mob Wins Again In Alabama

Eleven freedom fighters, ten clergymen and one graduate law student, succumbed to Alabama's brand of 'justice before the law' on September 15. Judge Alex Marks of the Montgomery County Court found all eleven guilty of two charges of 'breach of the peace' and 'unlawful assembly' with single exception of SCLC director, Wyatt Tee Walker, who was acquitted of the first charge.

Evidently operating under the logic of 'jailing the bank president instead of arresting the bank robber', Judge Marks imposed fines and/or jail terms on each. Counsel for the defendants argued brilliantly on every point of law producing the incontrovertible evidence from the Federal Court that General Graham testified under oath that the eleven were arrested because he was 'disgusted'. Despite the introduction of several Federal questions that established violations of the 1st and 14th amendment and the presentation of the Federal Judge Johnson (Middle District of Alabama) ruling that the arrests were made 'solely to enforce segregation', all were convicted. The group included the Reverend Ralph D. Abernathy, SCLC treasurer and Montgomery Improvement Association President, Fred L. Shuttlesworth of Birmingham and SCLC Secretary, and Bernard Lee, Special Assistant to Mr. Walker. In addition to SCLC personnel, four New England professors tasted Alabama justice; William Coffin and Gaylord Noyce of the Yale University Faculty and John David Maguire and David Swift of Wesleyan University in Middletown, Connecticut. The other three are graduate students; George Bundy Smith of the Yale Law School and Clyde Carter and Joseph Charles Jones of the Divinity School of Johnson C. Smith University at Charlotte, N. C. Dr. Abernathy and Bernard Lee were fined $100 and sentenced to ten days in the county jail; the others were meted the same fine and sentenced to fifteen days in the county jail with the exception of SCLC Director Wyatt Tee Walker who was not fined but sentenced to ninety days in jail. All of the cases were appealed to the Circuit Court.

The defendants were represented by Fred Gray, Charles Conley, and S. S. Seay, Jr. of Montgomery, Louis Pollack of the Yale Law faculty, and Jack Greenberg and Norman Amaker of the Legal Defense and Education Fund.

Members of Kenya Legislative Council, Kadu Party, visit SCLC. Left to right, Daniel T. Moi, Secretary of Education; Wyatt Tee Walker, Executive Director of SCLC; Wafula Wabuge, Deputy General Secretary; J. K. Oletipis, Secretary of Agriculture; and Fred Van Cort, State Department. They conferred with Dr. King for two hours discussing the problems of Kenya and the Deep South.

TO: Friends of the Union

FROM: Duke Employees Local 77, American Federation of State, County, and Municipal Employees, AFL-CIO

DATE: March 28, 1966

Local 77 has reached a critical phase in its campaign to gain recognition from Duke University. Thus, it seems a good time to post you on current events so that you will understand possible future actions of the Union and the University. We also hope that through contact with you we can draw on your ideas for our campaign.

BACKGROUND: Since affiliation with AFSCME in September, 1965, Local 77's negotiating committee has held that although improved wages and hours are a vital concern, the protection of non-academic employees against the arbitrary use of power by departmental supervisors at Duke is of equal importance. Since Duke lacks a centralized and objectively interpretable personnel policy and since most supervisors and department heads can best be described as "red-necks", Negro employees suffer not only low wages but also job insecurity and cruel disregard of their dignity.

The Union's position is that a bi-lateral binding agreement (contract) is essential to guarantee equality and dignity for Duke employees. With such an agreement objective personnel policies can be established and enforced as can bargaining power for wages and other economic benefits. Three points that the Union would want in such an agreement are: impartial third party arbitration of grievances, seniority rights with respect to lay-off and promotion, and payroll deduction of Union dues. The final point is necessary to give the Local the economic stability necessary to be a continuing force working for the employees.

LEGAL SITUATION: There are no state or federal laws providing for unionization of employees at a private non-profit institution such as Duke University, nor are there any laws prohibiting unionization. The Taft-Hartley Act specifically excludes private non-profit hospitals from the Act's jurisdiction and the NLRB has interpreted the Act to exclude private non-profit universities. This exclusion does not prohibit unionization but simply denies the employees the protection of the law. There are no state laws governing unionization of private universities or their employees.

CAMPUS SUPPORT: A number of students are working actively among the employees to explain the value of union membership and to learn of specific employee problems. A number of faculty members have given the Union their advice and support, particularly in terms of communicating with the Administration --often a difficult chore.

NATIONAL CIVIL RIGHTS AND LABOR SUPPORT: There are national implications to the effort to organize Duke University. Duke is a prominent symbol of wealth and Southern paternalism. The success or failure of a union campaign at Duke will effect similar campaigns in the South. In addition, the campaign at Duke is in progress at the same time that a massive campaign to organize what Walter Reuther calls the "working poor" is getting started in the South. Floyd McKissick

Martin Luther King, Walter Reuther, and other liberal labor and civil rights leaders, including Jerry Worth, President of AFSCME, are in contact with one another about such a campaign and their staffs are actively working on plans for a southwide organizing drive. As you would expect, these national leaders have become interested in the Duke campaign. Success here will give impetus to their efforts. On March 18, two AFSCME national office staff members plus Norman Hill of the Industrial Union Department of the AFL-CIO, and Rev. B. Elton Cox of CORE came to Durham to meet with Union leaders and Duke faculty members to study the Duke situation and plan the involvement of their national organizations in the campaign. As a result of these visits, a clear commitment to the Local's campaign has been made to the University by SCLC, CORE, SNCC and AFSCME. Each of these groups indicated to the University by mail or by wire that if the Local was not granted a contract, the national organizations would involve themselves in the campaign. Since this involvement would engender unfavorable national publicity for Duke and jepordize the University's fund raising efforts, we feel certain that this kind of pressure will be meaningful to the University.

PROGRAM: Since affiliation in September, Local 77 has requested recognition by the University under the following terms: that the Local represent only those employees of the University who voluntarily join the Union; that the University and Union establish a bi-lateral binding agreement on wages, hours, and working condition; and that the University retain the right to extend unilaterally to non-union employees the same rights won by union employees. This proposal remains open for the University to consider at any time.

At the suggestion of interested faculty members, Local 77 has submitted an additional proposal to the University. This proposal suggests that a Union recognition election be held among the employees to determine whether or not the University's employees wish Union representation. The proposal calls for withdrawal of the Union should it be defeated in such an election.

TACTICS: To reinforce the effect of our new proposal, members of the faculty are holding conversations with administration officials to convince them of the fairness of the Union's requests and to convince them of the reality of the potential involvement of national civil rights and labor leaders in the Duke situation if local level agreement is not reached very soon. Should the administration fail to be convinced and continue to refuse to accomodate the local, the Local will have to call in the commitments it has for assistance from national organizations. Non-strike picketing will begin on the campus. Membership rallies including McKissick, King, and other crowd attractors will be held for employees. News conferences will be held in New York, Washington, Durham, and Atlanta to publicize our case. The Local will not begin any of this sort of activity until it receives a reply from the University. Late last week we received a request for a few additional days time to consider the election proposal. We hope that when that reply is received later this week, we will find that the Union and the University have reached agreement. If not, we hope that we will be able to call on you for your support and assistance in continuing and stepping up the drive to improve the economic and personnel practices of the largest employer in Durham.

TO: Friends of Local 77

FROM: Local 77

DATE: April 4, 1966

Local 77 is seeking four major personnel policy concessions from Duke University. They are: (1) A binding bi-lateral agreement between the Union and University, (2) arbitration of employee grievances, (3) seniority rights with respect to lay-off and promotion, and (4) payroll deduction of union dues.

A contract is our ultimate goal. The University's resistance to integration and its failure to deal fairly with employees and the Union requires that a legally binding agreement be established.

The Union is flexible about the nature of Union recognition and bargaining rights. The University offers as rebutle to our demands that the Local is not representative. But for seven months the Local has proposed to the University that they recognize our Union as representative of only those employees who voluntarily join the Union. We have also proposed that the contract we request be binding only for those who do voluntarily join the Union and leave to the University the right to extend, unilaterally, the contract provisions to non-union employees. This proposal has been consistently rejected without explanation. Thus at the suggestion of several Duke faculty members, the Union has formulated a second proposal including two concessions to the University. This proposal, one that we consider final, calls for an election among employees to determine whether or not they want a Union. If the University will accept this proposal, we are prepared to cease activity at Duke if we lose, -- if the University will in turn agree to a concrete indication of recognition if the Union wins the election. We propose that this recognition be payroll deducation of dues. This traditionally signals the end of union busting on an employer's part.

The second concession that the proposal offers is that the election be held only among service employees and exclude clerical and technical employees. Until now, we have been seeking recognition for all non-academic employees. We have learned that this is not to the University's liking and have decided that our major concern must be for the service employees and thus will concede this point.

The right to arbitration of grievances would be a major point in a contract, should one be obtained. All attempts at justice will come to naught if final judgments on personnel policy and interpretation are left to members of the University administration. Impartial third party decisions must be possible for the fair settlement of disputes between employee and employer and no fair minded employer who intends to respect his employees and acts in a fair and reasonable manner can have reason to fear or resist arbitration.

Yet up to now, Duke has done just that.

The University resists granting seniority rights in regard to lay-off and promotion for obvious reasons. Hiring practices are basically disciminatory and the promotion of Negroes on the basis of length of service is inimical to such a system. The only Negroes who are promoted are those whom the employers feel can be used as instruments of control and token indications of fairness. The ability to lay-off employees arbitrarily also helps maintain a system of humiliation. Without the right to job security, Negro employees have no defense against arbitrary lay-off and demands by these employees for fair employment policies put them in danger of loss of their jobs.

Duke University is one of the richest in the nationa. It can afford every service available to fight a Union. Therefore, Duke employees must have financial solvency to maintain their union. In the United States it is accepted that many organizations are maintained by payroll deduction plans. The University has extended payroll deduction of contributions to the United Fund, but denies this right to Local 77. It claims that the reason for this is that United Fund contributions are "beneficial". Yet for years it has asked its Negro employees to allow these payroll deduction contributions to an organization supporting agencies that do not make their services open to Negroes. This raises the question of to whom and to what deducted contributions must be "beneficial" if the right of payroll deduction is to be granted.

University administrators have repeatedly asked Oliver Harvey, President of the Local, why, if Duke employees want their Union so badly, they don't pay their dues in cash. He has replied that that is exactly what they do do and will continue to do so long as payroll deduction is denied. But payroll deduction is a great convenience, especially to poor people, and it is not more morally reprehensible for the Union to ask for payroll deduction that it is for the United Fund. The reasons are quite the same.

FLORIDA F.S.M.

Compiled from Reports by Lucien Cross and Alan Levin

In the early weeks of the winter trimester, Lucien Cross moved in front of the main University of Florida (UF) library armed with table, chair, reams of anti-war literature and a mind full of arguments opposed to US involvement in Vietnam. At first he distributed lit free; but, because of the expense, after about a week, he began to sell copies of Viet-Report, an anti-war publication.

Several days later, Alan Levin, presidential candidate of the campus protest party, Freedom Party, began selling the Charlatan magazine which the previous trimester had been refused access to the campus for "explained reasons". Levin stated his sole purpose in this action was "to protest the censorship according to content and the confused and arbitrary procedures followed for the approval of literature." Working with Cross and other interested students, Levin reviewed all the restrictive policies of the administration and encouraged students and non-students to join in establishing a Free Speech Area on the UF campus. Within one week, response to this call came from off- and on-campus civil rights, peace, and other groups.

Administration Cracks Down

The administration, scared to death of another Berkeley, responded by ordering Levin and Cross to petition for permission to sell their literature on campus. Due to the fact that they were not interfering with the processes of the university, Levin and Cross refused and explained their position in an open letter to the Dean. They were brought then before the Faculty-Student Disciplinary Committee in a closed session, the result of which was disciplinary probation for the remainder of their undergraduate careers. The following day all the participants in the Free Speech area were notified by letter of the administration's decision to prohibit the sale of any literature on campus and a temporary ban on the distribution of free lit.

It should be pointed out that in checking into the administration's permit procedures for selling literature, it was discovered that not only were there no formalized procedures, but that the administration appeared unwilling to create any. Therefore, the students set about drawing up their own permit procedures. This move was quite significant in that it marked the first time Florida students had taken the responsibility of legislating and administering an aspect of their university which is primarily their concern. Also by creating formal permit procedures, the university was forced to admit publicly and condone its policy of censoring literature on the basis of content.

Presidential Campaign Continues

During the course of the controversy, Levin continued his issue-oriented campaign for president of the student body. The platform of the Freedom Party called for the abolition of compulsory ROTC, student participation in the anti-poverty program, rigorous elimination of all vestiges of racial discrimination on campus, personnel and disciplinary procedures which are written, formal, and public, and, of course, free speech on campus. Levin was overwhelmingly defeated in the campaign; however, another protest party, Apathy Party, taking a stand between FP's radicalism and the conservatism of the two fraternity block parties received 2,334 votes while the winning party received only 3,362 votes or 37% of the total votes cast.

Student participants in FSM and FP are continuing their work for free speech. In addition they are supporting the boycott of Schenley products in sympathy with the grape strike; they are organizing a march to oppose the war in Vietnam to coincide with the International Days of Protest; and, they will be helping to campaign for John Due, a CORE lawyer, who is running for the Florida state senate.

THE IMPACT

CIVIL LIBERTIES

On March 5, the national office of the W.E.B. DuBois Clubs in San Francisco was destroyed in the explosion of a terrorist bomb, DuBois club members were beaten on a Brooklyn street, and the Venice, California chapter was evicted from its office. This followed the action of Attorney General Katzenbach on the previous day, petitioning the Subversive Activities Control Board to order the DuBois Clubs to register as a "Communist front" organization under the 1950 McCarran Act.

Suppression of Dissent

The act is unconstitutional. Because it declares organizations guilty, then requires them to register, it has a built-in verdict. It violates the rights of free speech, assembly and the protection against guilt by association; and the Supreme Court has thrown out each provision that has been enforced. The action of the Attorney General cannot convict the DuBois Club of any crime, but is an attempt to discredit and isolate the DuBois Club and divide the peace movement.

It is also an effort to define who may participate in the political process and who may not, and as such is a direct infringement of civil liberties. The basis of Katzenbach's argument that the DuBois Club is a Communist front is that their position on various issues parallels Moscow's position. This is guilt by association and strikes at the core of a free society. When the government can put certain opinions outside the pale and deny the holders' of these opinions various rights, the decision making process is unnecessarily prejudiced.

Outgrowth of Vietnam War

This action, and the violent responses to it, are indicative of a climate of opinion in our country which is encouraged by the war in Vietnam. Committed as it is to the myth of a national concensus behind our policy, the administration finds it necessary to discredit the growing body of dissenters from the policy. It is a traditional device in American politics to avoid issues raised by the opposition by shifting the debate to personalities or credentials. For the American public, the cry "Communist" is sufficient to dismiss the criticism of the person so labelled, allowing the American public to avoid the social problems it refuses to confront.

The bombing is also a symptom of a growing reliance on violence. The labeling of an organization as Communist seems to justify violence against it in much the same way as the labeling of all native opposition in Vietnam as Communist justifies our killing them. Labeling a group not only avoids the necessity of dealing with the issues it raises, but also dehumanizes its members and justifies any means of dealing with them.

Urge United Response

The DuBois action is not the first, nor will it be the last occasion in which an organization has been popularly discredited without a fair hearing. The charges brought against them represent an attack on all who work for change in that it encourages the simple dismissal of unpopular criticism. Whether or not one is in sympathy with the particular objectives of the DuBois Club, one must protest this arbitrary treatment.

The National DuBois office plans to take the legal offensive through the Federal courts. The precedent they hope to employ is that of the Dobronski case which ruled in principle that action cannot be brought against a person or organization that in effect produces consequences as disruptive as a conviction itself. They hope to fight the case from as broad a base as possible by having other organizations join them as litigants. For further information, write to:

OF THE LAW

NEW ELECTIONS

The United States Court of Appeals for the fifth circuit handed down on March 11 what could well become a landmark decision. The impact of this decision was to force new elections in Sunflower County, Mississippi.

Background

On April 8, 1965, the Federal District Court had recognized that "for many, many years" the county had denied Negroes their right to vote. The court ordered at that time that discriminatory practices cease and entered a "freeze" order for a one year period to allow deprived Negro citizens the opportunity to "catch up" and participate on equal footing in the election process. In less than three weeks after this ruling 306 Negroes had registered.

State Evades Ruling

Municipal elections had been scheduled for June 8, 1966, with primaries to be held on May 11 and 18. However, Mississippi law requires voters to register four months in advance and pay a poll tax for the two preceding years. This in effect excluded Negro voters and candidates, because the four month period was two months before the court order allowing Negroes to register.

Mrs. Hamer Responds

In response to this situation, Mrs. Fannie Lou Hamer, former Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party candidate for Congress, and four other residents brought on behalf of all the Negro voters and potential candidates in the county a case against Mr. Cecil C. Campbell, Circuit Clerk and Registrar of Sunflower County. They asked the U. S. District Court (Northern Mississippi) to (1) delay the forthcoming municipal elections and fix new dates for them. (2) fix a new cut-off date for voter registration for the new elections, (3) fix a new cut off date for registration of new candidates, and (4) suspend the requirement that poll taxes shall be paid as a prerequisite for voting. They also requested an injunction against the holding of new elections until the court ruled on their other request. The Norther Mississippi U.S. District Court ruled against the Sunflower County Negroes. They appealed to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth District.

Final Decision

The Court of Appeals ruled that the District Court had erred in not stopping the elections. The Court of Appeals saw that unless the originally scheduled elections were enjoined, "for four years Negroes would be governed by city officials whose election they had no opportunity to participate in, either as voters or candidates." However, Circuit Court Judge Brown made it clear that the Court will not set aside elections simply on the grounds that a substantial number of citizens have been denied the right to vote.

Important Precedent

The important factors in the success of Mrs. Hamer's case are that the appellants attempted to enjoin the overruled elections and that they had demonstrated their willingness to fulfill the legal requirements for voting privileges and candidature. The final legal meaning of this ruling is not yet clear but its meaning so far as the Movement is concerned would seem to be that we can expect very real assistance from the courts so long as we document our attempted compliance with election requirements. If discrimination prevents candidates from running for election, the path of just recourse of this grievance has been clarified in this case. Since the M.F.D.P. challenged the seating of the regular Democratic Congressmen from Mississippi last summer, Negroes have been trying without success to force new elections. This decision makes it possible for new elections to be held in Deep South counties, but it will require hard work and numerous litigations.

INSURGENT PRESS

by Jim Moore

The Catalyst was created to serve the Tennessee Tech campus by a group of students who were interested in combating the complacency and apathy of the masses. After considerable thought, the students decided to print "A Review of Opinion" rather than a partisan newspaper. This decision was made because in this particular situation, there is a great need to present the controversial issues from both points of view. At Tenn Tech there are no organized student movements on either the left or right. (This situation is not unique in the South). Therefore, the editorial policy was established to allow all points of view to be published by any interested person. The editors do not oppose partisan newsletters and consider themselves a part of the New South student movement; but alignment with SSOC, SNCC, or NSA would only have succeeded in breaking communication with the vast majority of a largely conservative campus.

Communication Opened

The Catalyst has succeeded in opening communication between conflicting points of view. It has invited the participation of both those opposing the War in Vietnam and those supporting it. Other subjects concerning Moral Rearmament, teacher evaluation, the Great Society, etc., have been discussed because of these added facilities to the academic community. Subject matter may include issues facing our campus or the community of nations, and no effort is made to discourage the presentation of any point of view. I emphasize this point because we have a great fear that the student freedom movement on our campus may become a different type of legalistic conformity --or blind action as merely a professional liberal with inconsistent views toward the purposes of reform.

The first issue of the Catalyst was published and distributed at the expense of the editors. It was favorably accepted by the students, faculty, and administration as a legitimate publication of student interest. Many disagreed with and criticized the positions taken by the writers, but there was an amazing plurality of the campus willing to allow anyone to present his viewpoints. Because of the progressive image of the periodical, it was invited to become a project of a campus club (Speech Activities) and will continue as their project in presenting controversial issues for the enlightenment of this academic community.

In some situations, students can successfully pursue an editorial policy which restricts points of view which disagree with the freedom student movements; however, many are forced to compromise their own positions in order to communicate with an apathetic society. The term compromise should not scare you in this context. It merely means that the truly tolerant person will not only tolerate the presentation of a conflicting opinion but will encourage its presentation for all to consider. This has been a rewarding approach on the Tech campus, and we feel that similar situations exist on many southern campuses which necessitate a non-partisan publication that will become involved with the basic questions facing their campus, their community, their nation, and their world.

OTHER NEWSLETTERS

OVER 30...

by Elizabeth Tornquist

"Don't trust anybody over thirty" is now so common that even Harper's is quoting it. But it is also common knowledge that the older liberals and radicals in the middle class have a good deal to offer the growing movement on the left. They are not so much taking the long chance and risking their place in the world; but they are wise in the ways of the society, they have talents, skills, contacts and money, and they approach politics with a coherence developed over years of trying to fit hard facts into ideal visions. All this is reason enough for trying to involve more of them in the "movement". But there is another, perhaps more important reason: if the movement is not to stagnate, it must extend outward and begin to draw these people into its ranks; and only active use of their talents will draw them in. Conscience money will not do it.

Surely, No Easy Answers

I do not have the answer to the question "How?"; I only have a few specific suggestions based on experience. I see two main problems: finding the potential radicals in the middle class and finding the right things to ask of them.

It seems wise to start with the campuses; though there are just as many potential radicals in other professions, the academic profession is most accessible to students, and it is the students who are going to extend the movement.

The first step in finding potential allies is to become fully aware of what is happening around campus. Individual acts--such as letters to the editor--should be sought out by following the press and the campus gossip. A file for future reference should be kept of the names and actions of those who have some how committed themselves.

There are several ways to bring such people together initially. A non-partisan, non-activist political discussion group is one good way to do this. The Durham discussion group asks professors, graduate students and members of the community to speak on such topics as Textile Organizing, Politics and the Novel, Cuba, China, Keynesian Economics, etc. The group is unstructured and has no commitment to any projects; but people who come for the talk meet others who are involved in action, and they often get involved as a result.

Another good way to bring people into "the movement" is to keep them informed through a monthly newsletter about the progress of all liberal and radical political activities in the area. If the newsletter is distributed to the whole campus, many people--who would otherwise remain ignorant--just may discover that there are projects they would like to help with, and they will come forward without solicitation. (A striking example of the effect of a newsletter is the recent report to the Duke faculty by the union of non-academic employees. Many people who before were quite unaware of what was going on immediately offered their support to the union.)

Do's and Don't's

Once you have contacts, the question is how to approach them and what to ask them to do. I can think of several do's and don't's which are well-known to radical students, but are not always practiced by them. 1) Never ask anybody beyond undergraduate school to attend a meeting unless you know exactly what you mean to do at that meeting; it is important not to waste the time of busy, uncommitted faculty in fruitless discussions and long hashings over strategy. 2) Don't ask faculty members to form an organization. They already belong to too many committees and groups, and the less organization there is, the better they like it. 3) Don't ask a man to do busywork until he is thoroughly committed. And even then, try to make the best use of his talents, for his sake and yours. 4) Try to give faculty members the impression that you are responsibly square like them. They are very quick to suspect that student radicalism is merely a form of adolescent rebellion, and it's wise to calm those fears. 5) When you ask a man to do something, try to let him do it his way, if that is not going to defeat your cause. The more responsibility you can offer him and the more you accept his ideas about strategy and tactics, the more likely he is to get seriously involved. Older people feel a real psychological difficulty in accepting the leadership of students; try to keep your control over project developments subtle and flexible. 6) Ask older people to get involved in something that is already going; don't ask them to initiate a project for you. Few of them have the time or desire to get involved in the mess of starting; they are cautious; they want to see that it's real before they commit themselves. At the beginning, it's often helpful and always good politics to ask them for ideas and strategy; don't ask for action until the action is prepared for. 7) Never suggest that older people get involved where there is no chance of victory. They get very tired of hearing young radicals say, "You could take over the League of Women Voters." They've been in these organizations all their lives; if you can't find more hopeful projects, you will not get them on your side. 8) Never force people away because they aren't radical enough. If you say "We don't want anybody who's unwilling to go to jail" (as a civil rights leader in Chapel Hill once did), you merely alienate people who might become more radical through involvement.

Political Psychology

It is my impression that success in organizing Negroes and the poor has come in part from following these do's and don't's. All I am saying is that in spite of their money and status, the middle class academic world has a similar political psychology, and to organize them you must use the same patience, skill and subtlety as with other unorganized and politically powerless groups.

The specific projects you ask people to work on must, of course depend on the situation in their area. Duke faculty members and graduate students have in the last year become involved in a number of projects which were suggested or encouraged by radical undergraduates. They have raised money for civil rights workers, held a teach-in on Vietnam, formed an ad hoc faculty committee to rally support for the union of non-academic employees and investigate administration positions on the union; attended union meetings and advised the social and the organizing committees; aided in the formation of a union newspaper and offered a reporters' clinic to teach writing; raised money for the non-official campus newspaper The Real World and contributed articles; supported (and picketed with) the striking school employees; and circulated petitions opposing the speaker policy at state schools; in addition, they have done political work which has no connection with students, like raising money for the congressional campaign of a local liberal.

There are many other projects possible here: it is easy to take over the precinct organizations of the Democratic Party by organizing support before the precinct meetings; a civil rights movement could be started in nearby Chatham County, where the citizens are ready and willing to work; a weekly liberal newspaper on the model of I.F. Stone could get financial backing and contributions of articles. One can think of dozens of things. And there are many people who are willing to work on all such projects as organizers, researchers, speakers, fund-raisers, and writers.

Need For Full Time Staff

Because they have other roles to fill, faculty do not have time to organize the projects they are involved in. SSOC can help here by recruiting people to work full-time in communities which desire a worker and can support him.

FARMERS ORGANIZE

by John Zippert

The New South must have a just economic structure as well as just political structures. The structures cannot be separated--it is the political strength that whites have wielded which has made possible the preservation of the system of economic suppression. The other side of the coin is that economic inequality has worked to preserve the system; the economic power of the rich and the white have enabled them to control the political apparatus. In order to bring about basic changes in the system, one must not only organize on a political basis by gaining and using the vote, but also attack the system at its economic base.

Whites Control Economy

All over our land, the economy is controlled by whites. White men own the stores, do the hiring and firing, set the prices, and control the sources of capital necessary for an individual to set up a business. It is a closed economic system into which Negroes are brought on the terms set by whites. In order to change this, people have set up various insurgent economic organizations. In the Mississippi Delta, sharecroppers have organized the Mississippi Freedom Labor Union. A Poor Peoples Corporation and a brick making factory have been set up. In St. Landry Parish, Louisiana, Negro farmers are joining together to form several co-operatives.

Co-ops Formed

The Opelousas Progressive Co-op, the largest of the co-ops they are forming, has 200 members who have pledged to set up and support a food store, financed by $10 pledges by each member. In this way, they can raise capital independently of the power structure, and can possibly get money from the poverty program. The planning is being done by the people who belong to the co-op. Each member has one vote; each man participates in the decisions about what will happen in the co-op and what his money will work for. The profits will go back to the shareholders on the basis of how much they use the store, in order to encourage doing business with the co-op, as well as to realize the profits themselves, rather than giving them to the white man, as in the past. The co-op will make jobs for Negroes as managers, cashiers, and clerks, and buy produce from Negroes.

Dealing more basically with the economic basis of the society are two other organizations for St. Landry Parish small farmers, perhaps to be merged soon, a sweet potato marketing co-op and a farm supply co-op. The farm supply co-op will buy seed, fertilizer, and poison in large quantities and then pass the savings on in the form of lower prices to the individual member. Again, the capital will be raised by the members and borrowed from the government. These same small farmers are organizing a sweet potato marketing co-op, in which they have agreed to sell their sweet potatoes to the co-op. In this way, they will have a large enough quantity to store, ship, and sell the potatoes themselves, rather than being forced to accept the terms of the local buyer. As well as giving people more money for their potatoes, the co-op will also create new jobs.

The Future of the South

It may be that the future lies in the cities--that rural organizing will be outdated by urbanization and the increased efficiency of mechanized large scale agriculture. Nevertheless, some people have made a commitment to the rural South, to stay with it and change it, rather than flee to the dubious haven of the Northern ghetto. These people, forming co-ops in which for the first time they may join together on a basis of trust and competence, forging out an economic organization independent of white dominance, controlling their own resources, and making their own jobs, are creating an island of possibility for the emergence of a New South.

AGONY AND ECSTASY

GOD IS DEAD CONTROVERSY AT EMORY

by Dr. Jack Boozer--Reprinted from the Emory Wheel

Because of the support which people of the South give to religion, one might speak of the contemporary revolution in religious understanding as having unique sharpness for the South. Various pieces of correspondence which have come to many persons at Emory in recent weeks are indicative of this, although the letters have come from other sections of the United States as well.

The fact that one must scrutinize the letters, all of which are motivated by religious conviction, suggests that religion plays an ambiguous role in the lives of people. I believe that this is especially true in the South, but that the agony of reappraisal now taking place offers the possibility of an "ecstasy" of resolution in the New South.

Faith and Life

The crucial question upon which the outcome depends is that of the relationship between faith in God and other human activity. The particular way in which the issue has come into focus recently is apparent in the reaction of the religious community to the presence of a faculty member at Emory who held what was regarded by some to be a subversive opinion.

Various bits of advice were given President Atwood as to how to handle the situation. "Fire him." "Discipline him." "Do not increase his salary and perhaps he will leave." Fortunately for everyone who is really interested in Emory's being a university, Dr. Atwood handled these suggestions with singular clarity and firmness.

The End of Christendom

But what about the religious community? What about those persons whose religious faith leads them to be intolerant, who think that religious faith is safe only if alternatives are suppressed?

The predominantly Protestant Christian faith of the southern people has been too neatly identified with a white, isolationist (states-rights), agrarian, paternalistic, privileged culture, and the powers of sharp, intellectual criticism have been discouraged if not suppressed. The question which the man of faith is now being forced to answer is whether his faith encourages and sustains criticism.

Any faith which discourages the exercise of man's critical facilities will have little to offer contemporary man. This means that any religious community which seeks to control the culture, including educational institutions, is of little value.

South Given Opportunity

To be quite specific, the leaders of The Methodist Church in the South have been slow to respond to the recent "God talk" at Emory. They have the opportunity to claim Emory with pride and to show that The Methodist Church supports an educational institution on educational terms, without exercising control. The South has the same kind of opportunity to use her concern for God to assist people to develop and exercise their faculties of criticism, creativity, and appreciation.

It is not yet clear what the Methodists and the South will do with this rare opportunity. That there is agony in the camp is unquestioned. Whether the agony will be productive of a religious vision and power for the New South, indeed, of ecstasy, depends upon what the persons in the religious communities do in the next few critical months.

Some say the opportunity has been missed, once and for all. I think that there is yet time left, but the issue is urgent.

RIGHTIST APPOINTED

From a Report by University of Florida Chapter, SDS

On March 12, 1966 President Johnson, to the surprise of everyone in Florida, announced the nomination of Farris Bryant as Director of the Office of Emergency Planning.

Who Is Farris Bryant?

(1) Bryant is an open and committed segregationist. As state senator, he attempted to apply interposition in the school desegregation decision. As governor, he testified against the public accomodations act before congressional committees.

(2) His term as governor was nearly disastrous for Florida higher education. He made the Board of Regents directly responsible to him, and instituted unconstitutional regental orders, fingerprinting, compulsory civil defense training, legislative committee investigations, administrative denial of appropriated funds for salary increases, and conspiracies to terminate activist teachers, to send qualified Negro students out of state, to politically screen new students and teachers, etc.

(3) Bryant's additional rightwing activities also include: required fingerprinting and a qualifying civil defense test for all public employees, and institution of the Florida Legislative Investigating Committee, a state model of the House Un-American Activities Committee. Finally, as chairman of the Governors' Conference Committee on Cold War Education, he published PATHS TO UNDERSTANDING, which outlines complete plans for state centers of civil defense training, cold war propaganda, and anti-subversive activities, with investigative powers, and in time of war, police power.

(4) Finally, in Florida, Bryant is politically bankrupt. He has no organization, the press, both liberal and conservative is against him, his record is dismal and he is generally distrusted.

Why Was He Nominated?

Thus it seems evident that Bryant's nomination has more to do with his rightist and cold war avocation than with his administrative skills or political influence. The former were never taken seriously until the advent of the war in Vietnam and the consequent anti-war movement, with dissent rising both in Congress and throughout the population. Thus, particularly in the light of future elections, it is entirely conceivable that he may want to take the burden of merchandising the cold war off the backs of the policy-makers and relocate it closer to the people.

The nomination of Bryant appears to be an adoption of the strategy both explicit and implicit in Paths to Understanding. The strategy of domestic counter-insurgency at a political level, decentralized in personnel and administration and financed and initially trained through federal resources, is precisely the background and expertise that Bryant brings to the OEP.

Recommendations for Action

(1) Urgent appeals should be sent to all friendly Senators calling for a full scale investigation of the Bryant nomination. His segregationist background combined with his extremist activities may make him intolerable to a majority of the Senate.

(2) Bryant's nomination associates segregation, war panic, cold war education, control of the opinion making processes, and many civil rights organizations, civil liberties groups, peace groups, and liberal coalitions may be united in action.

MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE

by Sue Thrasher

On the weekend of February 25-27, seventy-one persons attended a statewide student conference held at the Mount Beulah Conference Center in Edwards, Mississippi. The schools represented were: Rust College, Alcorn A & M, Mississippi State, Mississippi Industrial, Jackson State, Tougaloo, Mississippi Valley State, Mississippi State College for Women, and Millsaps College. Colleges represented from out of state were: Miles College in Birmingham, Stillman College in Tuscaloosa, and Fisk and A & I State Universities in Nashville, Tennessee.

Discussion of Issues

The program began on Friday evening with a discussion of "The Relevance of the Church". Clifton Whitley, chaplain at Rust College gave the principle address. He was followed by Mrs. Jane Schutt of the United Church Women, and Rev. Fred Lowry of the NCC Delta Ministry. Rev. Lowry introduced the group to Mrs. Wilson, who told of the plight of the Delta Negroes who are being pushed off the plantations by mechanization. These speakers were followed by a rather lengthy discussion of the social gospel.

On Saturday morning Kenneth Dean, Director of the Mississippi Council on Human Relations, and John Lewis, Chairman of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, led a discussion which revolved around the strategy of the civil rights movement. Isaac Foster of the Mississippi Freedom Labor Union also gave some background on the formation of the Labor Union and the strategies now being used in the Mississippi Delta by the Poor Peoples' Conference.

Political Confrontation

The Saturday afternoon session centered around the politics and economy of the state. Claude Ramsey, state director of the AFL-CIO, and also associated with the Mississippi Democratic Conference opened the session. After a rather sharp questioning period, Mrs. Annie Devine, former congresswoman of the Freecom Democratic Party responded to Mr. Ramsey's remarks. This discussion was probably the most tension filled of the entire meeting; it was also a very honest view of the political struggle now going on in the state.

Saturday evening was spent in small group discussions, most of which centered around strategy for social change. Following these discussions, the films Danger on the Right, No Hiding Place, and The Streets of Greenwood were shown.

Sunday morning was devoted to a discussion of the University. Howard Spencer, Tougaloo College; Betty Hill, Mississippi Valley State; Lee Makamson, Millsaps; Bill Scott, Rust College; and Tommy Richardson from Alcorn A & M, participated in a panel discussion about university restrictions on their own campuses. There was some general discussion about what could be done, but lunch cut the discussion short.

Homeless Sharecroppers

Perhaps the most educational value of the conference came as an aside -- in the form of thirteen Negro families who are now living at Mount Beulah. The families have spent most of their lives living and working on Delta plantations. Many of them were told to leave because they were being replaced by machines; others left because an opportunity to build a better life was opened to them through the Poor Peoples' Conference. (See Feb. newsletter.) In meeting and talking with the plantation folk, students learned first hand of the blatant injustices of the "southern way of life." The twelve-year-old boy who had never been to school, the old gray-haired man who sat quietly on the steps listening, and the anger of a young mother leveled at a Mississippi moderate -- all spoke very eloquently about "Mississippi 1966".

ACTION AT ALCORN

Compiled from Reports

Alcorn A & M College in Lorman, Mississippi is again the scene of strife that points up the interrelation between the freedom movement, greater job opportunities, and university reform. The present demonstrations are the first since those held at Alcorn in April, 1964. The previous demonstrations were in protest of a situation where students were not informed of book prices for their courses, but were simply presented with non-itemized bills at the end of the term; where male students were not allowed to meet their dates at the girl's dorm but were forced to do so on the street corner or at the Student Union Building; where there was no duly-elected student representative on the disciplinary committee; and where dorm hours for women were arbitrarily set at 9:30, weekends included.

All students who participated in the protests of '64 are denied nomination for class honors and have been excluded from possible honors awards upon graduation. (A thousand students were suspended in '64. They were forced into buses at bayonet point after an all-night "sit out".)

Student Movement Organized

An organization has just ben formed, however, that is speaking again to these problems. The STUDENT MOVEMENT OF ALCORN COLLEGE (SMAC) was sparked by the work of Charles Evers, NAACP Field Secretary, in presenting grievances of the college employees to the administration. Mr. Evers led a demonstration that sought to present a list of 32 complaints to college president, Mr. G. D. Boyd. When Mr. Evers tried to come on campus, he along with 175 others, including 7 Alcorn students, were arrested. Along with requests for better pay and working conditions for the employees, Mr. Evers' petition contained the request of better treatment and more mature privilegos for students.

The first real success the students have achieved is that men can now escort their dates back to the dorm. While the students recognize this to be a gain over their position before, they know that it is no more than a beginning. Other problem areas are coming to light that had not been fully recognized before. The library now closes at 8:30 every weekday night and at noon on Saturdays. It is not open at all on Sunday.

Students Fear Administration

One of SMAC's biggest problems is that students out of the fear of administration reprisal, are reluctant to speak out. There is no established due-process for student disciplinary cases and dissenters are arbitrarily removed. Students are being threatened with loss of their campus jobs or their National Defense Loans if they "cause any trouble".

The Student Council does not exercise a forceful voice on campus to criticize actions of the deans; e.g. the Student Council president was given a list of grievances by a SMAC worker, but he was not allowed by a dean to present them to the student body. Fraternities and sororities are forbidden any private social functions.

Strength In Unity

SMAC is now handing out leaflets on the Alcorn campus in the hope that the student body will come to recognize that they must stand together if they would make their college into a real experience in higher education, without the leftovers of a big kid's kindergarten. SMAC sees correctly that insofar as the administration gets away with abusing employees, students are vulnerable to the same arbitrary power. The students must recognize with the worker that their futures are tied together. If they are going to build a society that does not tolerate the abuse that is now so widespread, they will have to work together.

RUMBLINGS AND GRUMBLINGS

Ninty Miles From Cuba's Coast, by Uncle Ed

I have just spent some time in Miami, mostly restin'--but doing some mild agitating. On Saturday, February 12, I got to participate in a rather unique demonstration as part of the southwide protest against the war in Vietnam. The average age of the demonstrators must have been sixty (60) or so. Better than half of the approximately 200 marchers were members of an 1100 member senior citizens group of the Jewish Cultural Center in Miami Beach. The man carrying a sign in front of me was eighty-three.

The president of the group, later explained to us that the future is in our hands, and that we must carry the burden of change. We generally agreed with him, though we recalled that there was not a single University of Miami student in the demonstration, and that Miami-Dade Junior College had only provided two. (Both schools have enrollments in excess of 10,000.) For many of the oldsters this is their fifth U.S. war.

Vista Volunteers and Vietnam

The average age was decreased slightly by five Vista Volunteers. They are presently working with Negro, Puerto Rican, and Mexican migrant workers in the vicinity of Homestead Air Force Base in S. Florida. Have you heard of the Harlem Vistas who are organizing a community organizers' march on Washington to protest the war? It seems they feel that the war in Vietnam makes it difficult to organize a war on poverty. Well the government thought this was a pretty crazy way for them to look at things and tried to persuade them to desist. But the Vistas were adamant; they told ole uncle that if they were fired they'd just stay in Harlem and keep right on organizing. The government did however get them to agree not to identify themselves as Vistas. The director of Vista then sent a letter to all the volunteers in the country telling them that it is O.K. for them to participate in anti-war demonstrations as long as they keep their identity a secret from the viewing public. That was pretty democratic.

"Bomb Hannoi!" (sic)

The only incident that occurred during the march was a rather lengthy one. One of our government's "guests" from Castro's Island (of which there are nearly 100,000 in the Miami area) started yelling "Communists" at us. The only break came when he left his vigil across the street and returned shortly with a sign, which read "Bomb Hannoi" (sic)--"Dead than Red" (sic). (I couldn't help but sympathize with him in one of his problems since I have had trouble with double English consonants since I took Spannish.) One of our group, a fellow who had taken part in the San Francisco to Moscow Peace Walk, tried to communicate with him--but to no avail. He just kept following and shouting "Communist".

Cubans versus Negroes and Poor Whites

I have very mixed emotions about our relaxed immigration policy vis-a-vis Cuba. (We have very low quotas for Latin America generally.) The government pays Cubans $100.00 per week if they are unemployed. A Negro gets only sixty from the state. Another problem is that, in violation of the law, many who draw the federal hand-out also work--mostly in non-skilled and semi-skilled jobs--thus depriving poor whites and Negroes of the only jobs which their inferior education equips them for. Many Cubans get federal scholarships to the University of Miami, a very expensive school--scholarships which are not available to many Negroes and whites, who happen to have been born right here. Do I sound like an isolationist? It's just that I'm irritated that quality education isn't being made available to all our native born. The fact that education is our third largest budget item only slightly moderates my irritation. I keep thinking about one room schools in Kentucky and flights to the moon and wars and stuff.

SPRING FOLK FESTIVAL

COVER STORY by Anne Romaine

The cover of the March issue of The New South Student is the same drawing used on the posters publicizing the Folk Festival which will be touring the South this spring. The itinerary and performers are as follows:

Richmond, Va.--March 31
Charlottesville, Va.--April 1
Lawrenceville, Va--April 2
Durham, N.C.--April 4
Columbia, S.C.--April 5
Laurinburg, N.C.--April 6
Tallahassee, Fla.--April 7
Atlanta, Ga.--April 8, 9
Birmingham, Ala.--April 12
Tribbett, Miss.--April 13
Tougaloo, Miss.--April 14
Tuskegee, Ala.--April 15
New Orleans, La.--April 16
Austin, Tex.--April 18, 19
Fayetteville, Ark.--April 21
Nashville, Tenn.--April 22
Lexington, Ky.--April 23

Rev. Pearly Brown--Americus, Ga. He is a blind street singer. His repertoire includes slave songs, spirituals and gospel, some of which he learned from the Carter family. He plays a twelve string guitar, bottleneck style.

Lyn Chandler-- Contemporary songwriter from New York City. He spent the better part of 1964 in the South working with civil rights organizations.

Mable Hillary--Brunswick, Georgia. She is a member of the Georgia Sea Island Singers, a group responsible for preserving Negro traditional folk culture. Her specialty is Blues.

Bernice Reagon--Albany, Ga. She helped to organize the original Freedom Singers. Because of her involvement in the civil rights movement she became interested in her own cultural background from which she draws most of her repertoire.

Gil Turner--New York City. A topical song writer and guitarist and banjo picker, he is noted for his ability in leading group singing. He has devoted much of his time to furthering the use of music in the civil rights movement.

Eleanor Walden--Atlanta, Ga. She helped to organize and is president of the Atlanta Folk Music Society. Her repertoire centers around southern Appalachian ballads.

Hedy West--North Georgia. Accompanying herself on the banjo, she sings the songs of southern Appalachia and those standardized by her family.

Additional performers who will be singing in only one or several festivals are:

Maybelle Carter--She sang with the original Carter Family from Virginia who were responsible for starting the movement toward making America conscious of its own folk tradition. Maybelle developed her own unique style of picking the autoharp.

Johnny Cash--Memphis, Tenn. He is one of the country's foremost singers of country western and contemporary music, the latter centering around the American Indian.

Barbara Dane--New York City. A Blues singer, she has devoted a lot of her time to the advancement of Unions, civil rights and peace in this country. She accompanies herself on the guitar.

Bill Monroe--Kentucky. He is the father of blue grass music. With his "Bluegrass Boys", he now sings on the Grand Ole Opry, as does Maybelle Carter.

Pete Seeger--Beacon, New York. He is America's foremost singer of folk songs.

Carolyn Hester--Raised in Austin, Texas. She has a very versatile repertoire including traditional songs of her region as well as southern mountain ballads. She also plays the guitar.

PEACE VOTE

by Bob Dewart

We of the Students for Social Action at the University of Virginia have been attempting to find a candidate to run on an independent peace platform in the November Congressional elections from Virginia's Seventh District.

The district and the state as a whole are terribly ill-informed about the Vietnam war. The press and radio present little but Pentagon propaganda. We feel that in an atmosphere such as this, the press coverage that a bona fide Congressional candidate would naturally get could be used to great advantage to expose the other side of the Vietnam issue to the public. We would mainly be concerned with running an educational campaign, since a peace candidate could hardly expect seriously to be elected.

What is Success?

This brings up the question of just what percentage of the vote we would have to get in order to consider ourselves successful. It has been said that if we fail to get a respectable number of votes, we would be doing our cause more harm than good. In this part of Virginia there is so little sentiment in favor of ending the war, that almost any action espousing peace is better than none. If we can get 5% of the electorate to vote for peace, that will represent a net gain of at least 500% to the peace movement in Virginia. Any gains that we make now will pay dividends in geometric proportions in future elections.

Finally, if we accomplish nothing else we shall force the major party candidates to take a stand on the issue of war or peace. Without a third man in the field, I feel confident that we can expect neither the Democratic incumbent nor the as yet un-named Republican challenger to take a very strong stand on the war. We can probably expect a fence-straddling performance similar to the one staged recently in New York to fill Mayor Lindsay's old seat. With a man standing firmly on principle in favor of peace, we can at least show up the opposition for what it is worth.

TO THE EDITOR

Dear Editor,

In reference to the item about the Atlanta University Speakout on page 18 of your February issue, you added a hyperbolical zero. Not 10,000, but probably about 1000 people attended the Speakout. The list of speakers as you reported it also gives a misleading impression; there were six speakers, three supporting the war and three opposing it. I know that lots of people think that any program about Vietnam at all is anti-U.S. policy, but we did have as balanced a list of speakers as possible, considering the reluctance of most pro-war people to share a platform with anti-war people.

Poll Results Given

The reason for the prevailing reluctance may be somewhat demonstrated by the results of the poll which we took, asking the members of the audience to indicate their opinion of U.S. policy in Vietnam when they came to the speakout and as they left, and also to indicate which speaker tended to sway them or gave them any significant new information or insights. Of the 114 people who turned in responses, 35 said they changed their minds, 24 in the direction of opposing U.S. policy (from favoring or undecided to opposing, or from moderately to strongly opposing) and 11 in the direction of favoring U.S. policy. Ninety-eight references to individual speakers were made in the appropriate blank, there being 67 mentions of anti-war speakers and 31 mentions of pro-war speakers. While these results seem to illustrate that a balanced argument tends to turn people against the war, or more against the war, it may only mean that the people who attend such events are people who are likely to be so swayed.

We'd be interested in surveys taken by any other sponsors of similar events.

PEACE IN VIETNAM

Reviewed by Carrie Buehl

This month, the American Friends Service Committee released the results of a study of the Vietnam situation made by a Friends' eight-man working party. The book is entitled Peace In Vietnam: A New Approach In Southeast Asia, published by Hill and Wang, New York, N.Y. It analyzes current forces operating in Vietnam, the position of the different sides involved, and possibilities for a peaceful settlement of the war.

The preface gives the major orientation of the book: "The destructiveness of modern war can produce nothing but hatred, even among those on whose behalf the fighting is ostensibly undertaken, and hatred is no foundation upon which freedom and democracy can be built."

U.S. Position Criticized

The official United States' government position can be summarized in the view that Southeast Asia is being threatened by a takeover by Communist China, which is presently working through the Hanoi government. The U.S. must honor its commitments to aid anti-Communists in South Vietnam in their struggle against aggression and their fight for democracy.

Peace In Vietnam gives many reasons why the above stated U.S. position is erroneous and dangerous. Serious doubts regarding the likelihood of the National Liberation Front (NLF) forces being Chinese Communist inspired are raised. When analyzing the situation, two often-ignored facts should be considered: 1) that a social revolution, of which Ho Chi Minh is the national hero, is taking place in all of Vietnam, and 2) that there is a nation-wide hatred of the American supported Diem regime due to Diem's changes in the traditional village governmental structure and his negating of Ho's land reforms. These factors help explain the orientation, strength, and determination of the NLF.

Nationalism and the Domino Theory

The book states what it considers as the "three realities that dominate the Southeast Asian scene: the rise of nationalism, drive for social revolution, and the advent of a militant and reawakened China". It considers nationalism to be the most powerful political force in all the Southeast Asian countries. In Vietnam, and only in Vietnam, nationalism has been forced to fuse with Communism. In Burma, Indonesia, the Phillipines, and Malaya, the Communist national movements have failed. The conclusion is that the presence of a powerful intervening country, the U.S., has prevented nationalism from taking its normal course.

The "domino" theory of the U.S. is considered and discarded. Cambodia has a very stable non-Communist government. Thailand has a strong nationalist movement and with proper treatment from the U.S. there is no reason why it should become Communist. Pro-Communists in Laos, on the other hand, already control about half the country, and the whole country may go Communist independently of what happens in Vietnam. It should be noted that the U.S. government has tampered, in past years with the Laotian government.

Peace In Vietnam briefly outlines Chinese foreign policy. Its position is that China is much less concerned with world domination than with opposing what China considers to be its main enemy, the U.S. Reasons for and suggestions to deal with the situations are given.

U.S. "Commitments"

The necessity of the U.S. honoring its "commitments" is also questioned. The only commitment that the U.S. ever made was by Eisenhower in 1954 to the Diem regime specifically, promising economic, not military, support. The argument that the SEATO treaty pledges the U.S. support in Vietnam is erroneous. It should also be considered if doggedly sticking to a mistaken course of action is more honorable than a re-evaluation and possible change in goals.

Negotiations

A documented history of negotiation overtures is examined. The fact that the U.S. turned down seven offers from Hanoi is criticized. Peace In Vietnam also presents the North Vietnam, the NLF and the U.S. negotiating positions. In many respects the three positions are quite similar. Reasons for Hanoi and NLF suspicions of the U. S. peace overtures are given.

The authors of the book feel that two steps by the U.S. are absolutely necessary for a settlement. These are that the U.S. must immediately start de-escalating the war and, secondly, that the U.S. must allow all people of Vietnam, including members of the NLF, to decide their country's course. Further steps might include a general cease fire under the supervision of the International Control Commission and a reapplication of the Geneva Agreements. During this time, a temporary provisional government in which all political segments are represented could be established that would direct the phased withdrawal of both U.S. and North Vietnam troops from South Vietnam and would conduct free elections. The neutrality of the country and amnesty for all parties should be guaranteed. A provision for massive economic aid should be included. The book concludes by saying:

> (The United States) must become aware of the subtle and dangerous assumption that the U.S. can determine the course of the whole world, either through military power or economic power.

An appendix includes the 1954 Geneva Agreements, an outline of the program of the NLF, the South Vietnam law outlawing Communists, the background of the authors, and a bibliography.

The New South Student is published each month from October through May by the Southern Student Organizing Committee of Nashville, Tennessee. Labor is donated.

In an effort to share responsibilities, the staff is taking turns producing this publication. CONFERENCE SUPPLEMENT

INTRODUCTION

by Howard Romaine

The articles by Robb Burlage and Jon Steinberg in the following pages reflect, I believe, two different conceptions of what is going on in American society--although it is to some extent difficult to compare them because Robb concentrates much more on recommending specific programs while Jon presents an analysis with recommendations for action. The articles by Dave Kotelchuck and Roy Money discuss the interrelatedness of the problems of structure and program and make recommendations for structural changes in SSOC. I hope in this article to sum up the positions expressed by Jon Steinberg and Robb Burlage as well as outline my own thoughts on the future of SSOC.

Jon's View

Jon seems to feel that the principal issue facing the South and the nation is the unequal distribution of power. Thus he sees a need for SSOC to work to increase the power of those who now have no voice and challenge those who can wield power and their allies. Because he thinks the "new southern liberals" will be part of the mainstream of American power, helping them is less important than organizing those who are voiceless.

Robb's View

On the other hand, Robb Burlage feels that the critical need is for students to get involved in many different kinds of organizing--anything from working in regular Democratic politics for a liberal candidate to community and union organizing or voter registration work. Robb seems much less assured of the inevitability of the "Great Society" and much less fearful of "Great Society" liberals.

SNCC View

Another important view that should be considered in discussing work situations which are open to southern liberal-radical students is that of SNCC. With the qualification that my interpretation of SNCC's views are necessarily inadequate, I will attempt to briefly sketch them.

There seems to be developing in SNCC a feeling that Negroes should work for unity and to build their own community and movement--rather than depend on white aid which psychologically reinforces the system which they're working to break down. Also involved is the feeling that Negroes have to recapture their own identity before integration can be truly possible. Otherwise Negroes are integrated into white society on the white man's terms. For practical purposes this means that SNCC does not feel that it is particularly desirable to have whites organizing Negroes in community projects. Whether this means that white volunteers just won't be recruited or that they will be discouraged from working in the Negro community is not clear. Part of this new approach involves an African study program for staff members as well as student exchanges between several African countries and the movement in the U.S. It also tends toward conferences that are, as one SNCC staffer put it, "esoteric rather than exoteric"--a nice way of saying primarily for black folk, I believe.

It is in light of the articles by Robb and Jon, and of the above mentioned developments in SNCC that my own thoughts on SSOC's future are presented.

Students and the Community

I had hoped that by this spring SSOC would have moved closer toward becoming an integrated southwide student organization. I envisioned an organization with much more of an action orientation, with chapters and members. The rough division of labor I saw shaping up was SNCC working primarily in the Black Belt and urban ghetto areas, and SSOC travelers organizing students into and around these projects--with the possibility of SSOC starting, or channeling more resources into, some of these projects. Also, SSOC would begin to experiment more with various kinds of white community organizing.

The basic strategy for SSOC's development I saw to be the building of statewide student movements based on action and education programs. The action would, at this point, be centered around black belt organizing projects such as tying students into FDP and MFLU organizing in Mississippi, VSCRC organizing in Virginia, SNCC's community work in Alabama, and similar projects in other states. It should also begin to include different kinds of organizing, however, such as labor union, white community work, regular political party work for "liberal" democratic candidates, etc.

Our travelers would attempt to link up students on a statewide basis with ongoing organizing in the individual states. By tying a student movement to a community near it--a community which is more or less permanent--one of the main difficulties of a student movement, its impermanence, could perhaps be partly overcome.

The campuses would serve as organizing and fund-raising bases for community projects. Students could also begin to do more research relevant to the surrounding community.

Of course, in this, the Mississippi-Berkeley syndrome of community action sparking academic oppression sparking campus revolt is quite possible, and perhaps even probable.

The Role of the Office

Along with this should go expanded activities of the SSOC central office, including a vastly increased education-research program on all pertinent issues. We should encourage a wider range of analytical writing and promote greater literature distribution through South wide, regional, and statewide conferences, and through the educational programs of local groups.

The SSOC office would also be responsible for centralized programming designed to stimulate thought, break down cultural prejudice and isolation, etc. This would include more speaking tours of radical or controversial figures, more things like the folk tour, and single issue conferences such as a southwide student forum on foreign policy should also be possible.

Another function of a central office would be to build regional support on key issues such as civil rights protests, civil liberties issues, the grape strike boycott, etc.

SNCC's Impact on SSOC

From this description of where I see SSOC moving, it should be fairly clear why SNCC's plans for the immediate future pose very difficult problems. The whole move toward black exclusiveness, whether this be at the level of community work, at the campus level, and/or organizationally, and whether it be for short or long run political or strategic reasons, or for community or activist level emotional reasons (that is, for the purpose of encouraging black people to build their own movement at the local level without white help, or for the purpose of building a consciousness among students of their African heritage as a basis for a political identification). does pose serious problems to any visionary who is thinking in terms of an integrated southern student movement in the near future.

How one judges the meaning of SNCC's trend toward black exclusiveness depends on one's individual judgment. It depends on how extensive one sees this motion - are whites excluded only at the community level, or at the campus-conference level too, or organizationally also? Is this a temporary or long term trend?

Does this represent a growing consensus in SNCC and the Negro community?

In the context of talking about foreign policy, rural and urban organizing at the SSOC conference some of these questions will certainly have to be discussed. At this point I personally do not feel I have enough understanding of what SNCC is moving toward to say precisely what this means for SSOC. In the states where SNCC is doing a lot of work with students, we probably will not be able to work toward statewide student movements on an integrated basis - at least not at the community work level. In other states we probably can and perhaps should. Hopefully, SNCC people will be able to spend a good bit of time at the SSOC conference, and we can come to a better understanding about our nutual relationship.

Assumptions

Assuming 1) that some kind of amiable or semi-amiable relationship can be worked out with SNCC, 2) that a majority of students at the spring conference do want to take on this or a similar kind of a Southwide program, and 3) that we can find sufficient resources, i.e. money and people to work full-time, then the problem of an organizational form adequate to make this program a reality is next.

Organizational Structure

The papers by Dave Kotelchuck and Roy Money deal with this problem. My thinking on this runs very parallel to Dave's. I agree that it is time now to create a Southwide multi-issue organization with student memberships. But I think essentially that this creation should simply involve certain structural changes in SSOC, and not the creation of a new organization different from SSOC.

The structure for SSOC that I would opt for would be very similar to that of SDS. Campus chapters would have virtually complete autonomy. Regional conventions would be held at least biannually to make major policy and or personnel decisions. A smaller representative body would meet more often.

If SDS would go along, I would also like to see the spring convention make our fraternal relationship more formal. By this I mean I would request that National SDS grant SSOC chapters voting privileges at National Council meetings. Similarly, SSOC would grant SDS chapters within its region full voting privileges.

I do not know what implications such structural changes would have for our tax-exempt legal status, but if certain aspects of our program endangered this status, we could create a non-tax-exempt arm of SSOC which would be separately funded to carry out these programs.

ON POLITICAL STRATEGY

by Robb Burlage

This is my acquaintance who is at the Institute for Policy Studies.

For SSOC now the issue is not simply racism. The problem is not simply the isolation decent men face. The answer is not simply better communication.

The issue is the undemocracy of the South, even the much heralded "New South", as a reflection of both regional and national elite forces, the power they spawn and the consciousness they spin. The answers are insurgency, confrontation, and action alternatives--the building of new agencies and institutions with a commitment to social justice and democracy expressed in continuous constituent action.

SSOC's Role

In my opinion, SSOC's greatest contributions to a movement for democracy in the South can come in the following ways:

Education

(1) Education -- To increase awareness among the committed as well as among the mainstream lookers-on of the existing forces for and against democracy and social justice in the South today.

SSOC must create an effective research, writing, speaking, and educational interaction program aimed at such broad education in the South, rooted in a sense of progressive Southern history, saliant social analysis, and optative new political motivation which reaches people where they are.

Action

(2) Action--- To develop alternative forms in the South of protest and organization which raise issues of democracy and social justice in all sectors of life:

(a) unionization in the workplace that demands a real say in the economic system, including not only blue collar workers but white collar, government, non-profit institution employees, (including universities and hospitals);

(b) control over public programs by those whose lives are most affected--urban renewal, public housing, public welfare, war-on-poverty, schools and training--through neighborhood unions, welfare unions, independent poverty organizations, parent groups, etc.

(c) Control over college and university policy by the community of scholars, faculty, and students, not arbitrary rule by the academic bureaucracy and the conservative absentee trustees representing monied interests;

(d) organization of more democratically based organizations to meet people's needs--consumer and producer cooperatives, free universities, experimental schools, etc.;

(e) cracking through barriers to free speech--speakers' bans, book bans, politically selective parade and meeting hall permits, etc.--with organized civil disobedience, if necessary;

(f) demanding that all citizens be provided with accurate information, freedom of debate and protest, and effective participation in control over foreign policy;

(g) political organization beginning at the grass roots confronting all issues which are meaningful and important to people---ranging from insurgent candidacies and local and state independent parties to issue-oriented participation in general party primaries and elections to demand the defeat of undemocratic forces or to demand that certain issues be defended or faced by candidates.

In these contexts, political education, community organization, and electoral action are not either or but are questions of priority and tactics in a continuum of involvement.

New Developments

The two most exciting developments in SSOC, in my opinion, are: (1) the new emphasis on the need for Southern students to develop new agencies of change at the grass roots--new neighborhood and workplace organizing in the direction of community and employee unions, and (2) the attempt, primarily on campuses thus far, to confront the Southern Cold War taboos with hard new questions.

1966 Elections

So what do the '66 elections mean to Southern democratic insurgents?

---In some Black Belt counties with large Negro registrations this will be a time of testing people-power. Insurgent Negro candidacies have a real chance of winning, especially in parts of Alabama.

---In other areas the presence of Negro or white liberal candidates, especially in areas of large Negro population, can become the focus for political education and further mobilization at the roots--a time of trying out new means of expression and awakening new community interest.

---In some states the Older South machines face new State-wide challenges in Senate and gubernatorial elections: The Byrds in Virginia, Russell in Georgia, the Wallaces in Alabama, the Clement-Ellington heirs of Crump power in Tennessee--a time to tear down the Old as well as to build the new.

---In some urban areas the few "new moderates" in Congress from the South face tests from conservative forces (e.g., Congressman Grider in Memphis)--a time to prevent reversion and defend decency, as well as to build a broader base and raise issues.

---In a few areas there will be a chance to raise new issues in more "liberal" candidacies: e.g., the independent Dugger Senate candidacy in Texas against no-choice conservative politics and for open discussion of the Vietnam War. Other opportunities may arise: An anti-war congressional candidacy in Charlottesville, Virginia? Will the grip of conservative political control in Tennessee state colleges against campus academic and political freedom, holding all SSOC groups in that state under its thumb and malice, be an issue in the Tennessee Governor's race?

I do not favor SSOC emphasizing electoral action or participation in campaigns outside of a broad educational and organizing context, nor do I favor SSOC getting into the candidate-endorsing and launching business as an organization. I would also discourage establishing at this point a SSOC "non-tax-exempt arm for political activities". That individuals or local groups of SSOC work in separate local, state, or national electoral efforts should not require a whole new programmatic or legal status for SSOC.

The Critical Need

The critical need is for SSOC people to get their feet wet in any kind of community organizing in the South, especially with constituencies not now being reached by SNCC and other insurgent civil rights groups (which doesn't mean the exclusion of SSOC working in predominantly Negro community organizing but means emphasis on new explorations outside).

What I would encourage organizationally for SSOC is:

(1) carrying out a major political education program focussed on the state and local levels across the South (as in Virginia with the Virginia Students Civil Rights Committee and the Southside project) to make students aware of the new political realities and opportunities in the context of struggling for democratic values and,

(2) encouraging some diversity of grass rooted action projects which can develop electoral action or relate to electoral campaigns as this becomes appropriate.

SSOC can do more by pressing awareness and by encouraging demonstration projects in particular areas now than by trying to become a miniature political party with no roots.

Not only should SSOC serve as a regional information center to let students know of the range of opportunities in community action that are arising in the South (summer, part-time, full-time), but it should actively help create a selected range of opportunities, as well, in cooperation with local constituent groups. Stress should be on developing new kinds of constituencies (insurgent union locals, community unions, community forums etc.). Perhaps, a range of electoral action projects could be tried, if there is enough local interest-channeling students into everything from, say, an "Academic Freedom and Excellence Committee" working in the governor's race in Tennessee, a "Youth for Human Rights" group working in the Memphis congressional race, working with unionized whites in the Virginia senatorial races as well as the Southside community project, helping expand the political base of Durham union and community organizing, or reaching out to middle class people in the Dugger campaign in Texas, to helping with insurgent campaigns in Alabama and Mississippi.

Economic issues, as via union organizing, are the best potential link between Negores and poor Whites. Broad-issue electoral campaigns raising economic issues can also be an organizing link, expecially when race is not the preoccupation. At present, this is probably most feasible in urban areas, although the barriers even here to direct cooperation between Negro and working class white groups are still slow and difficult to overcome.

Questions

All SSOCers who enter any action and organizing situation should remember that they are organizing their co-workers as well as the community at-large. Each should ask important questions of himself: How can this become a long-run base of independent and democratic people-power? How can the most important concerns be expressed? How can this experience and base be expanded to involve others? e.g., how can connections between labor and community unions and the campus be made and maintained? SSOC media, conferences, and workshops should continue to stress interrelating and asking hard questions about a growing range and intensity of real experiences.

The main point is that SSOC decisions for action emphasis should not be made out of ignorance of opportunities nor with prejudice against any means of action, including electoral. Electoral action or participation in electoral campaigns in the South related to rooted community organizing and expressing long-range democratic commitments can and must help lead the way in such insurgent experimentation and bridge-building.

I believe our greatest failures at this point will come from inaction or only-talking-to-ourselves more than from making wrong moves in the wrong constituencies, even though our ranks are small and scarce. Our greatest problems are inexperience and lack of political self-confidence. We cannot wait for the Godot of a new wave of sit-ins, a Mississippi summer, or other instant conversion experiences shared generally. We must experiment and learn from these experiments. And then we must re-set our sights as we know the terrain better.

RESPONSE

by Jon Steinberg

In deciding upon the best instrument for social change, two questions must be answered. The first is the type of change ultimately desired, and the second is what the present and possible methods for change are in American society today.

It is not the purpose of this essay to provide a blueprint for the good society. However, a broad vision, if not a blueprint, is necessary in order to decide upon any course of action. For this purpose the ideas implicit in much of the civil rights movement will be accepted.

The Vision

The basic concept is the increased participation of citizens in all aspects of the decision making bodies which effect them. This means a reduction in the size of government units to a "town meeting" level wherever possible, and open meetings and instant recall where it is not. More importantly, it means the breakup of the large military and corporative bodies which presently exercise a disproportionate amount of influence in our government as well as in the economic sphere.

Reduction in the power of the military can of course best be achieved by disarmament. The power of corporation executives can be removed in two ways, by nationalization and by workers' control, i.e. providing that the workers in a plant or office should elect the management. Nationalization would obviously mean a vast increase in the powers of federal government, and the continuation of the lack of control by those who work in the corporations. Therefore workers' control seems most attractive.

Present Trends

Now that we know what the good society will be, we can go just as deeply into the present trends in America. Far from moving towards the ideal envisioned above, American power is becoming increasingly centralized. The size and predominance of the military, federal government and "top 500" corporations is steadily increasing and concomitantly aggrandizing more areas of direct and indirect control. This is a natural consequence of the technological revolution, and mechanization and automation which hasten this change with increasing rapidity.

One consequence of this change in the South is a rapid transformation of the political scene. The balance of power in the Deep South has been held by a combination of agricultural and local business interests. Their representatives in the state and in Congress consistently supported legislation which was reactionary by Eastern standards but served the immediate interests of the "Southern Provincials". The most cursory examination of the present Southern economy will reveal the extent to which this situation is changing. In Georgia, Alabama, Tennessee, and North Carolina national corporations already clearly dominate the economy. The rest of the South is quickly approaching this state. The influx of federal money has come in pari passu, and its potential power, as evidenced by its ability to force school desegregation, is correspondingly great and increasing.

Segregation is not in the interests of either big business or national government. Furthermore, they don't believe in it, at least in the blatant kind the South has enjoyed lo these many years. Segregation leads to inferior education at a time when the need for unskilled labor is steadily decreasing. It is inefficient, causing duplication of services. It results in violence, which is anathema to a group most interested in preserving stability and the status quo. It is a black mark against America in the eyes of the world, at a time when the U.S. is trying desperately to preserve and extend its international interests. Most dangerous of all, it creates a dispossessed and disaffected element which constitutes a potential radical force and threat to the present American system.

For all of the above reasons it is apparent that Southern-style segregation is doomed. In fact, the only thing delaying its burial is the obstinacy of Southern whites. Their resistance is being overcome by the enforced desegregation initiated by government, business and civil rights groups, which is slowly proving to Southern whites that most Negroes don't want to marry their daughters. It is also lessened by the infiltration of national communications media. The power of Huntly-Brinkley, particularly on the young, is not to be denied.

Examination of the factors given above will reveal that all of them apply in one form or another to poor people in general. A review of federal domestic welfare legislation over the past six years, particularly increased social security benefits, medicare, the not yet funded rent subsidy program, and President Johnson's proposal of a " reverse income tax" indicates that influential people are aware of these needs. In addition, the United States is fabulously wealthy and can easily afford much more. In fact, there is every reason to believe that America will.

Thus if the current trend continued (and no viable opposition exists or is on the horizon) severe poverty in America will be absolished within the next fifteen years. This is a laudable achievement, but it is important to remember who is doing it and why. The purpose of these programs is not to change the present power relationships in America but to preserve them. At the present time the political struggle in the South opposes small business and agricultural interests against big business, labor and the enlightened (i.e., those who oppose segregation) poor. If the poor and the very rich have a political alliance, experience has shown who picks the candidates. Although the poor will gain from this alliance, they will gain only insofar as it serves the interests of their corporate allies. In terms of votes for welfare measures, the benefits to the poor will be substantial; this state of affairs is satisfactory unless one is concerned with who pays the piper.

Implications for SSOC

Given the above analysis, the question of where to put SSOC's resources becomes easier.

SSOC's resources at present might charitably be called pitiful. Will the Great Society Program continue without them? We have reason to believe it will. While it is conceivable that the defeat of a long-tenure Southern congressman might hasten this program by a couple of years, the history of Northern liberals in Congress indicates it will do nothing more. If SSOC puts its energies into electing Johnson liberals it is merely helping to consolidate the power of those who now possess it, both by aiding their (often good) programs and by helping to entrench them in the South at a time when the political arena here is in a state of flux. If SSOC wishes to do more than this, to give power to those who do not possess it now, it must begin to seek them out, articulate their needs (and in the process our own) and organize them so that we may work to realize our goal of a truly democratic society.

This organization can be attempted through a political campaign for a candidate who can represent this goal. It can take the form of more immediate practical gains, such as improved housing or representation on a local anti-poverty board. Probably any project would eventually involve both approaches. Coalitions with other groups will become desirable and necessary, but they will be coalitions: both sides will have to make concessions. No matter how sympathetic he may be to your objectives, it is unrealistic to expect a candidate or official to sacrifice the interests of one group supporting him unless you can offer him substantial support. For this you need organization, and to have an organization you have to organize. So get moving.

ON STRUCTURE

by Dave Kotelchuck

A saying of which many scientists are fond is that the most important step in making a discovery is that of asking the right questions. This comes to mind as the time approaches for the third annual SSOC Spring Conference.

There are, of course, two kinds of problems about which organizations like SSOC must be concerned. The first involves issues; it involves discussion of the problems which face society, and the type of action which might remedy them. Since these are discussed in some detail in other articles (and in previous conferences), they will not be discussed here.

The Problem of Structure

The second kind of problem follows from the first and relates to structure. It is here I believe that people in SSOC are not asking the right questions. For the last year or two, organizational discussion has been directed, explicitly or implicitly, to answering the question "What role can SSOC play among students who wish to encourage change in the South?" When the question is framed this way, in terms of SSOC explicitly, then the answers elicited are always ones which suggest how SSOC may modify and expand its activities to meet the needs of concerned Southern students. What is ignored, I believe, is any consideration of whether SSOC organization is the best vehicle for meeting such needs.

Of course in our changing society the role of any such organization must be re-evaluated periodically. But there is a real question in my mind as to whether SSOC, specifically, is meeting the most important needs of concerned Southern students, although it is certainly meeting some needs.

But before we get into polemics, let us first frame the questions we want to consider. They should be, I think:
(1) What are the needs of concerned young Southerners?
(2) What sorts of organizations can satisfy their needs?

(3) What role in particular can SSOC play?

I hope that at the up-coming spring conference these questions or similar ones will form a basis for the discussion of organizational problems, and that the discussion will be need-centered, not organization-centered.

Some Tentative Answers

Having raised these questions, let's try answering some of them. As regards the first question (on the needs of concerned young Southerners) it is first important to note that more and more they see the nation's and the South's problems in terms of a whole complex of issues rather than as ramifications of one issue (e.g. civil rights). There is general agreement that these issues include racial discrimination, poverty, foreign policy (especially the relationship of this country to the newly emerging countries of Asia, Africa, and Latin America) decision-making at local and national levels, and the personal alienation of man from his fellow man. I think too that those who identify with the New Left also believe that solutions to these interrelated problems will require a major restructuring of American society, although few can (or want to) predict the form restructuring will take.

How do concerned Southern young people view recent changes in the South? I think that they are viewed as all well and good--that it is better to come to grips with the problems of 20th Century America than to be mired down in those of the 19th Century, but that this is scant consolation for those who want a truly good life for all, in a world at peace. There is the further feeling that Southern people's thinking has not begun to catch up even to the modest changes going on about them.

It is the slowness with which attitudes change that is responsible for what I think is the outstanding characteristic of the life of a concerned Southern person--the pervading sense of isolation. This despite the fact that there exists, as SSOC's mailing list alone will attest, significant groups of liberals and radicals in communities and college campuses all over the South. But because these groups have grown large and had formalized structures only in recent years, there is as yet no sense of community among them. Certainly this is most apparent at the level of individual members in these groups (or groupings). When people join a local group, they do not feel that they are joining a Southwide or nation-wide movement. (There are, of course, some chapters of national groups on local campuses, but these are uncommon.) And to say that people of the left feel isolated is also to say that the actions which their groups engage in will not be as forceful as they might be, and hence not as effective. In the long view also, if the American left is to grow and effect change in society, then we are led to the second of the above questions--What sorts of organizations can satisfy the needs of concerned young Southerners?

Multi-Issue Membership Groups?

I think the kinds of organizations most needed are multi-issue membership groups that engage in both education and action. Such groups already exist on a national level (SDS, for example), but I believe that the feeling of Southern particularism is too strong even among concerned Southern young people for large scale organizing to be successful in this region. But if a Southern group engaging in these activities were to be organized, it would, I think, have great potential. The immediate advantages of such a group would, I think, be clear:

(1) It would encourage a sense of community.

(2) It would permit joint action when desired by groups multiplying the effect of any one (e.g. outside of Atlanta, little or no action was taken in the Julian Bond case, although joint Southwide efforts would have been appropriate and effective.)

(3) It would permit small local groups to discuss and initiate activities on a scale which their local membership would not permit. Thus the small size of local groups would not have such an intellectually and emotionally stifling effect as at present.

(4) It would help provide direction for the many local groups that have no effective leadership.

That this should be a membership organization is clear. It is important for a local person to feel an identification with the group, and this can best be done by allowing him through membership in a democratic group to enter the decision-making process. Thus the group's decision is to some extent his own and he feels a commitment to it.

Of course a discussion of the need for such an organization leads directly to the question, "Is this the time to get up such a group?" and the reply is, "This is just the sort of question that a meeting of South-wide groups can best answer." Usually a new group like this arises on the basis of joint action on a specific issue, as for example some of us hoped SSOC would develop in the area of civil rights. But although there seems to be no unifying issue in the South today, such a group might still develop just on the basis of a generalized need for a sense of community. If this were possible, I think it would be very exciting and might be a major step toward uniting liberals and radicals in the South, and bringing them into the mainstream of the American Left.

A Future Role For SSOC

What finally would the role of SSOC be, if such a group were founded? Let me first say that I don't think SSOC can become the multi-issue education and action organization I am talking about, primarily because SSOC has a past and a present which live with it and color the views which young Southerners have of its future. The past and present of SSOC is that of a tax-exempt, educational, service group--one which has some value to be sure, but a limited appeal to many non-affiliated young people. In any case, a group based on a new concept should not have to carry with it as baggage the guilt for mistakes of the past.

But this need not mean that SSOC must dissolve if such a new organization were formed. I think that it could continue to act as a service organization to concerned Southern young people who are affiliated with this group. It might informally set itself up as the educational and informational arm of such a group, or it might do so formally if the tax laws permit.

All sorts of possibilities then of moving in creative new directions are open to SSOC and to concerned young people in the South. Let us hope that these are not limited by the poverty of our own imaginations.

RESPONSE

by Roy Money

There are two ways of looking at the problem of structure in SSOC. One is to decide on the kind of programs needed and to see how SSOC can best structure itself to serve those needs. The other is to try to do the things that need to be done and hope that a suitable structure will work itself out. The latter posture has been pursued by SSOC too often and has met with innumerable problems. The problems center around a lack of clarity as to how SSOC should relate to its constituency and thus confusion over the programs that SSOC should be carrying out.

There are basically two structural alternatives for SSOC; that of a service organization or that of a membership organization. To make the decision that SSOC should continue to be a service organization is to see SSOC's role as limited to communication and coordination. This position is taken by those who either do not see another membership organization as needed or who feel that while such is needed SSOC cannot fill that need. To make the decision that SSOC should try to become a membership organization is to see SSOC's role as much more political and aggressive than it has been. This position is taken by those who see a membership organization as essential and who feel that SSOC should become such an organization.

So far, SSOC has been primarily a staff organization with students involved only very minimally. Perhaps we are not at a stage where a membership organization is feasible, both in terms of level of interest and the stigma attached to belonging to an organization. However, ways must be devised to greatly increase student participation in decision making and program implementation irrespective of SSOC's structure. Obviously this involves a much greater commitment to democratic processes within SSOC.

It would seem that a membership organization is needed in the South if students are to see themselves as an integral part of a "movement for change." However, since it is not readily apparent that students are presently ready for or want such an organization and since it is not clear that SSOC can successfully fill that need if students do want it filled, it is unclear as to how SSOC should respond to that need.

Caution Advised

I think we should be very careful, as Dave Kotelchuck points out, in presupposing a role for SSOC. However, we should also be realistic when talking about setting up a new organization. With as many organizations as there are now, one should approach the creation of still another one with due caution. Given Dave's analysis, which I think I share at least in part, I tend to think that SSOC should remain a service organization but should accelerate its program and try to prepare for the time when a membership organization can take roots.

The Southern Coordinating Committee to End the War in Vietnam needs full time staff. Contact them at Box 3501, Atlanta, Georgia 30302.

Approximately 125 students attended a state wide conference of Virginia students in Farmville, March 18-20. A coordinating committee was set up consisting of one student from each of 15 colleges, and plans were made for publication of a statewide newsletter. This committee will also coordinate recruitment for summer projects.

A conference on students and labor is being planned for the latter part of April in North Carolina. A planning meeting has been scheduled for April 2nd in Durham. The conference will discuss such issues as: The Economics of the South, the History of the Labor Movement in the South, and Labor and the South Today. Workshops are being planned to discuss specific ways students can relate to organized labor. For additional information write to Gene Guerrero, SSOC, Box 6403, Nashville, Tennessee, 37212.

BUILDING A MOVEMENT

Before you get into the important parts of this month's New South Student, I would like to say a few things about building a movement of southern students, which is, after all, what SSOC is all about. Specifically, I would like to discuss one of the necessary ingredients to the building of such a movement.

Several months ago a benefactor from the North gave SSOC a good bit of financial support which when combined with foundation support and miscellaneous contributions meant that we were able for the first time to initiate programs on a large scale. Most of that money is gone now and the rest will be by the middle or end of the summer. With it SSOC expanded staff from four to sixteen, supported four SSOC related campus-community projects, sponsored two regional conferences, supported campus travellers in seven states, coordinated two South-wide protest programs, sponsored one South-wide conference, put out five issues of the New South Student, and distributed a variety of literature. We will have spent something like $15,000 in the past six months. Most of you have seen this money at work.

Although SSOC programs have reached several hundred southern students, it is important to realize that the job is just beginning to be done. We must expand programs in the fall. This will require a lot of work over the summer. Some of the proposed programs are a series of foreign policy workshops, more state campus travellers, a long range students and labor project, increased support to campus-community projects, and white community work. To implement these and other programs we must have, among other things, increased financial support.

From the beginning SSOC has pretty much relied on the North for money. We will continue to look North, but we must realize that support from the North will not be enough and that in fact it will probably decrease because of the increased activity up there.

We must begin to support our own programs. There are many sympathetic persons in the South who will support us. We must seek these people out and ask them to help. Also, there is a basic point which must be considered. We must have dependable support which will not be alienated as we develop programs which deal in a fundamental way with the problems of the South. The only group we can depend on for that support is our own constituency - you. Most, perhaps two thousand of you, are southern students. Many of the rest of you are related to the southern campus as professors, campus ministers, or recent college graduates. Almost all of you are able to support the building of a wouthern student movement. Some of you are already doing so. However only about five per cent of you support this newsletter financially. I can think of few students in the South who could not afford to pledge one dollar a month. Most professors could pledge five dollars a month.

We all must consider what it will take to build a student movement and what this will mean to the South. It will take more than your physical involvement and moral support. It will take your financial support as well. This is not something that would be nice or help a little. It is absolutely necessary.

MEETING AT BUCKEYE COVE

by Jody Palmour

The South is an underdeveloped, exploited area plagued by poverty, ignorance, and distrust. We have little more than the beginnings of an organized, popular politics, Southern students have seemed most prepared to build the required political movement that would free the South from the national problems so grotesquely caricatured in our land.

SSOC wants to help co-ordinate isolated, often times individual, efforts into a southern liberation front that will revolutionize our society, both economically and culturally, through comprehensive, non-violent programming. We will not be seduced into becoming like the carbon monoxide, ghetto North.

What We Gonna Do About It?

SSOC ain't gonna do nuthin. The peoples is. And we're calling a metting--the revolutionary council--to map out plans for the people's taking power in the South. We're inviting active student types to come to a camp in Buckeye Cove near Ashville, North Carolina on June 6 through 10 to report on what they have done this year, what their resources and plans are for next year.

SSOC staff members will present their analysis of where the South now stands and will offer concrete proposals of program and strategy. Delegates will offer their own proposals and the conference as a whole will decide on implementation for the coming year.

Resource People

In addition to you, we are inviting resource people to offer programs or general areas of concern they think we should work on. They will be talking about the relation of foreign policy programming to the domestic issues before the movement; radical education projects to create intellectually critical, radical professions and disciplines of study; the potential of full community organizing around labor unions; the role of nationalistic or racist sentiment during crucial stages of revolutionary development; the possibilities and models for white organizing in the South; and the meaning of radical art and the part it has played in human development.

The outside resource people will have approximately two hours to address the whole group. After each of their talks there will be a panel with the speaker and four or five representatives of the people who have been working on programs related to his proposal. We will contact delegates in advance so they can accept assignments and do preparatory thinking.

Delegates

The conference is not to be like the one in Atlanta where we were trying to do two incompatible things at the same time. We brought together both long time movement people and those just beginning an apolitical, moral protest against their society. SSOC, the movement, has a real responsibility for both groups of people. This meeting is for those already commited to building a political movement in the South.

Those individuals who are consciously building movements of people to change their own social environment are urged to come to this meeting. Eligibility does not imply that you are the head of a many-legged political machine about to devour all that stand in your way.

We want people who recognize the political and human need to build in the South a land where men are made neither slaves nor owners of slaves.

Things to Bring

The most important thing to bring is a thorough analysis of your own local situation, plus firm demands to make of SSOC for your own work, You might also need to bring sleeping bags, flashlights, axes, lawnmowers, fishing tackle, notebook and pencil. (We plan in the off hours to experiment with the CCC notion of organizing the poor.)

The staff has done much planning for this meeting. We think it could spell the beginnings of a new effectiveness in the southern movement. Personal planning about one's home community work is essential to a regional conference such as this. We've got to work setting it up, as you do to prepare for it.

If you want to come but can't, we'll send copies of a comprehensive report of the proceedings if you are concerned enough to write out your accomplishments this year and what your plans are for next year.

We have to make assignments and logistical plans, so let us know in the mail tonight if you're coming. We need your phone number and where you can be reached by mail before the beginning of the conference. The buck is passed to you, Baby.

SUMMER PROJECTS

The following are three possibilities for summer work. The list is not by any means complete but simply represents projects the SSOC staff are familiar with and feel would be of particular interest to you.

THE MISSISSIPPI FREEDOM DEMOCRATIC PARTY

The MFDP is recruiting southern students to work in voter registration, adult education, etc., for the summer. Southern Negro students will get first preference; southern whites are next in priority. You need to hurry and write on this. Write to the MFDP, 507½ Farish Street, Jackson, Miss., or to SSOC.

NORTHERN COMMUNITY ORGANIZING WITH ERAP

Five ERAP projects plan summer projects which are open to students. For instance in Cleveland there will be programs around Welfare, Community Psychiatry, Journalism, Law, Theater, Children, and Photography. This includes projects in both poor white and Negro areas. Indicate what experience you have had, what program interests you, whether you can raise $200 subsistence, and whether you can visit Cleveland for a day or so before the summer, in a letter to the Cleveland Project, 2908 Jay St., Cleveland 18, (216-781-3739). The other project addresses are: Join, 4533 N. Sheridan Rd., Chicago; Newark Community Union, 471 Clinton Ave., Newark, N.J.; Boston Project, c/o Larry Gordon, 10 Brookford St., Dorchester, Mass.; Hill Neighborhood Union, 605 Congress Ave., New Haven, Conn. 06519.

STUDENTS AND LABOR PROJECTS IN CAROLINAS

SSOC will coordinate over the summer a project to involve students in labor organizing in the Upper South. This program grew out of the Students and Labor conference held last month in Durham.

Plans for the project are not yet complete. The program may involve around eight students working in several union situations with a basic salary and expenses covered by the labor movement. If this is not possible a smaller number of students will work in two or possibly three locations living on basic subsistence.

One of the probable locations is the Durham area where students would work to assist the campaign of service employees at Duke. This would involve both traditional union activity and community organizing joined together. Another may be semi-rural textile and packinghouse plants which have bitterly fought unions in the past. For more information write SSOC. Please write as soon as possible.

DELTAS: MISSISSIPPI AND VIETNAM

by Howard Romaine

Some of us in SSOC feel that there is a connection between what is going on in Vietnam and American actions in Santo Domingo, and that they reveal very basic traits of our foreign policy. We feel that these are not mistakes, but are merely examples of a new American imperialism that is very threatening to the movement for social change we are trying to build here in America, as well as in direct contradiction to the values which have led us into the movement. Many of us wonder if we would not be the "Communists" who are being bombed or kept out of office by the marines if we were doing similar work in an underdeveloped country.

Because of these questions which have come to most of our minds, we have tried to read and relate what is going on in these countries to what we have experienced here in the South. Some of the people who speak loudest and hardest about defending "freedom" in Vietnam are the very same people who own mile after mile of plantation land where black people are still not allowed to vote, and are hardly even allowed to eat. When the most vigorous spokesmen for the War are people like Stennis and Eastland of Mississippi, Long of Louisiana, and Thurmond of South Carolina, we cannot help but wonder what they mean by defending "freedom" in Asia. When these people speak in their home states about defending "freedom" against "Communist subversion," we know they are talking about us and what we are trying to do. So when we see our President embrace a little man in Hawaii who talks very much like a little man that happens to be Governor of Alabama, and when we read that most of the support for the Saigon government comes from big landowners and profiteers who sound very much like the plantation owners in the Deep South and their accomplices, the company stores, then we develop very gut feelings about which side we're on.

But it is not enough to know which side we're on. So that you all can think some of these things over this summer, if you're interested, I've prepared a list of some topics concerning our foreign policy. If you can read nothing else, I hope you'll at least get hold of Vietnam by Gettleman ($.65 from SSOC), the Vietnam Reader by Raskin and Fall ($1.75 from SSOC) a subscription to and back issues from Viet Report, and subscription to I.F. Stone's Weekly. A complete copy of the recommended reading list is available free from SSOC.

BLACK CONSCIOUSNESS

by Ed Hamlett

Pensacola Beach, Fla.-- A bunch of white folks from New Orleans, Nashville, and Ala. are here to talk about white community organizing. The informal meeting was called by people in New Orleans who gave up their apartments to black folks for a weekend meeting to talk about Black Consciousness.

I said BLACK CONSCIOUSNESS, not BELOVED COMMUNITY. Movement people in the South don't talk about the latter so much anymore. They're less idealistic (some would say less naive) than they used to be. The reasons for the dampening of idealism are not difficult to discover: Some restaurants open to middle-class Negroes (lower-class white places remain off-limits); A few hundred thousand newly registered voters-- with the same old "Segs" running and winning; a few thousand Negro kids in previously all-white schools--learning about the blessings of the white man's civilization, white history, and white accomplishments; and the vast majority of the other Negro kids in all-black, still inferior, white-controlled schools-- and they learn about the white man too, in many cases from textbooks discarded by whites years ago.

THE MOVEMENT'S BELOVED COMMUNITY

But, you protest, the Beloved Community was to have been built first within the Movement, if not immediately in the larger society. So what about that "band of brothers and circle of trust"? The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (Snick), which is what I'm talking about mainly, has always had whites on its staff. They were there initially for at least two reasons: 1)To demonstrate in the South that whites and Negroes could work togehter under any circumstances to build the "Beloved Community"; and, 2)To utilize their vitially needed skills and labor. The first two whites were from the South; soon northern Negroes and whites came in to work. In early days there was a good deal of talk about and feeling for the Beloved Community, which, everyone hoped, was being built. Victories came frequently.

ONE THOUSAND WHITE YANKS

In the fall of 1963 it was discovered in the Freedom Vote campaign in Mississippi that the presence of northern whites in fairly large numbers brought protection to the work from the federal government, that it had never given to black workers Additionally, because Snick had all but deserted its early black campus base, Negroes could not be recruited in sufficient numbers to meet the projected personnel needs for the work in voter registration, freedom schools and general community organizing. Thus, the call went out for 1,000 northern volunteers to help open up Mississippi in the summer of 1964. By the previous spring many local Negroes had begun to carry on the day-to-day work of their own freedom organizations--doing mimeographing, typing, and leg work. And then the volunteers came. They were more "efficient" in almost every way. They meant well; they tried hard; they had been invited to come; but some of the hosts soon has second thoughts.

BENEFIT OR LIABILITY?

Neverthelass, most of those involved will admit that the volunteers were instrumental in helping to secure the basic rights of blacks to organize, picket and vote. But, the "flood" of whites produced serious problems. It took almost a year for local participation in daily work to be built up again. Antagonisms between local, black staff and white volunteers produced psychological damage to some in both groups that was slow to mend, if at all. Whether the above advances could have been accomplished by blacks alone, thus avoiding the liabilities of white participation, is a question which can never be answered.

WHITE WORKERS NOW

I stated earlier that there were intially two primary reasons for white participation in Snick:1)To demonstrate that blacks and whites can work together to build the Beloved Community; and, 2) To secure needed skills. It is now clear to most people in the South that the first is true. With regard to the second, the vital functions of typing, printing, and research can be done, and in many cases now are being done, by Negroes. It is agreed that those whites who are still performing these tasks can do the Movement a valuable service by training local people to perform them.

If these reasons for white involvement are no longer important, what about the other,past justifications? To give protection? No. To help secure the right to leaflet and to demonstrate?--No. Are there new justifications? Many blacks say that there are absolutely none; in fact, some say that for whites to remain would be extremely detrimental. And here we must look at the question of Black Consciousness, and what it is.

WHAT IS BLACK CONSCIOUSNESS?

Blacks, all blacks, must be aware that they are not inferior to whites. They must know that black people have made significant contributions to world civilization over the centuries, including here in the United States. It is their being aware that whites, in many cases, are bad judges of the value of these contributions. It is their being conscious that even the English language is, at times, inherently inadequate for describing Africans or Afro-Americans, their achievements and culture. (Check Roget's Thesaurus for synonyms for "black," then look at those for "white.") And it is more. It is not only having facts and knowledge about history, and sociological statistics, etc.; it is also believing and feeling in one's GUTS that they are true. For example, the Negroes in Wilcox County, Alabama must be disabused of the belief that Mr. Calhoun, the recent black candidate for sheriff who lost in spite of the fact that Negroes outvoted whites by a huge majority, can do as good a job as sheriff as the white man that the Negroes put in office, and maybe better. Many blacks assert that this will not happen if whites continue to help to do the organizing, the research, and all the other things.

LET "WHITEY" DO IT.

It is increasingly contended that the very presence of whites has a very serious intimidating effect on the masses of black people. Because they have been taught it all their lives, many continue to believe that "if you're black, stay back," and that "white is right." Thus many black people have developed the habit of letting the whites take the initiative. So militant blacks want to remove this impediment. "Let whitey do it" is saved for white organizing and fighting in Vietnam.

If you do not readily take to this line of reasoning, as I did not, you are offered other compelling arguments for confining your work to the white community. Let me state three more that I know.

WHAT WHITES CAN DO

1) There is much talk by whites about an interracial movement of the poor. But there is no movement of poor whites with whom the thousands of organized Negroes may ally themselves. (See article on White Organizing in this issue of NSS.) Most blacks in the Movement realize that poor Negroes need allies, and that over and above the questions of black consciousness and unity, there must be class unity. But they question whether poor whites, who do the dirty work of bombing and beating, can be organized. None of us whites are demonstrating to them that they are wrong; but we are agreed that whites must do it. (Many Negroes argue that disaffected middleclass whites have been taking the easy route and escaping to the black community.)

2) There is also the problem of racism in America which pervades all classes of whites. That is must be eliminated is obvious. This means that whites too must be made conscious of Negro history, African contributions to man's culture, and all the other things discussed above. The implications of this task for our educational system at all levels are far reaching. Whites who man school boards, who teach whites, who write books, and

WHITE ORGANIZING: NEW ODYSSEY

White civil rights workers throughout the South are now navigating difficult currents in their journey home. On one side of their frail craft lies the Scylla of Black Consciousness (see article in this newsletter), with the implication that whites cannot continue their present role in the Negro freedom movement; on the other side lies the stark statistical Charybdis of the Alabama Democratic primary, in which at most 3% of all whites voting chose Richmond Flowers, despite the fact that he was the only candidate who offered a platform geared to the interests of the poor.

The only existing Southern organizing project involving whites is the Southern Mountain Project of the Southern Conference Educational Fund (SCEF). The SMP will attempt to build an interracial movement of the poor, using an integrated staff to organize around permanent unemployment pay, better medical care, effective anti-poverty programs and more responsive elected officials. Their East Tennessee based experimental project has been in operation since last June, chiefly familiarizing the community with them and vice versa. It is still too early to judge its potentiality.

While accepting the basic SMP program most civil rights workers are inclined to believe that, even disregarding the importance of building black consciousness, initial interracial organization is an Achilles Heel which foredooms the project to failure.

Some find the siren song of rural white organizing most enticing, and would like to begin in one of the poorer counties of Appalachia, either in Kentucky or East Tennessee. Others favor initiating a project in a Border State city, such as Louisville, Wheeling or St. Louis, with the idea that knowledge and Deep South migrants found there would make eventual organizing further South more fruitful (a sort of human Trojan Horse technique).

Those with personal experience cite obstacles beyond the racial question which make white organizing more difficult than work in black communities. Poor whites, particularly in rural areas, are extremely suspicious of outsiders. Also, despite their oppression, they tend to identify more strongly than Negroes with the existing community leadership, making it more difficult for them to perceive the broad patterns of exploitation and build a competing organization. In the Negro community the clergy has often been important in beginning movement groups; this would be unlikely in a white community. For these reasons an urban community, where rural in-migrants are themselves strangers, socially dislocated and unrelated to local power elements, seems a more likely starting point.

The actual location of a project will probably be determined by the proclivities of the organizers. At its April Conference, SSOC voted to support a white community project whose organizers seem capable and committed, without specifying location. Even Alabama and Mississippi were not excluded, since SSOC sees, as Odysseus with the Cyclops that in the land of the one-eyed the two-eyed is king. Two young men who have worked with SNCC in Alabama have expressed a desire to begin a project, but neither can commit himself for longer than 3 months and SSOC is attempting to find someone who could begin with them and continue the project for at least a year, with the (If you are interested please write immediately).

In any event, it looks like a long trip and young Southern white activists are presently hesitant to attest that any Penelopes are eagerly waiting to welcome them.

VIETNAM DRAFT EXAM

Although this newsletter is going to press before May 14th and returns are still incomplete, it is already clear that the National Vietnam Exam program will involve significantly more Southern students than any previous peace or civil rights effort in menory! In Louisiana every single testing center for the Seledtive Service College Qualification Test (there are sixteen) will be attended by people passing out the National Vietnam Exam. This countertest on the issues of the War in Vietman was composed by scholars from the Inter-University Committee for Debate on Foreign Policy and Students for a Democratic Society. SSOC is co-ordinating its distribution in twelve Southern States, not only at schools with a history of social action, but at many traditionally dormant colleges.

The power of this organized response to the "draft tests" is made clear by the support we are already getting. On Tuesday Rep. Adam Clayton Powell stated that the draft tests are "reminiscent of Hitler's twin system of eugenics and education--weed out the intellactually deprived or socially undesirables by conscripting them or cannon fodder."

The overwhelming success of this program raises two crucial questions: Can campus people follow up the Vietnam Exam by starting organized social action groups and continuing creative programing? Can SSOC continue to unite Southern students around significant programs which both old and new activists will respond to? The answer to both of these questions clearly depends on you.

SCC MEETS

The Southern Coordinating Committee To End the War in Vietnam held its second conference on April 23-24 in Nashville.

The eighty participants came from twelve states, representing colleges and independent anti-war committees, or themselves. At least fifty-two committees are known to exist in the South. The conferees voted to become the southern region of the National Coordinating Commettee, formalizing a previously functional role.

A large part of the discussion centered around the problem of confronting the traditional conservatism of most Southerners, who now view the Vietnam conflict as a Holy War Against Communism, and thus are not initially open to any alternatives to present U.S. policies. It was suggested that volunteers work full time this summer to involve people throughout the South in an examination of the War.

Much debate involved the small role by Negroes in the anti-war movement in the South. Civil rights workers present felt that although there is substantial opposition to the War in the Negro community, the freedom movement is of much greater concern at present and absorbs all of their enerfies.

Finances, the eternal Governor Wallace of left of center causes, was brought up, and several committees pledged support. The SCC office is attempting to find a full time fundraiser to bring the office budget up to meager.

Dwain Wilder, present SCC secretary, emphasized that staff is a primary need of the SCC, both for the summer volunteer program and for the office in all capacities. The conference failed to come up with a solution to this problem, although several participants said they had possible recruits in mind.

Many people in attendance were concerned by the lack of program discussion, other than the "town meeting summer" and the SDS draft exam (see articles in this newsletter). This hiatus reflected a general feeling that massive programs are unrealistic in the near future since the Southern peace movement is still a miniscule, though growing, minority in a hostile or indifferent land.

who program for the mass media must be confronted with the issue of racism. And whites must forcefully make this confrontation--no small task.

Furthermore, those of us who cherish the idea of an integrated society, whether we be white or Negro, must ask oursevles if it is integration or assimilation that we are about at present. If it is the latter, and I think it is, then perhaps we must wait for real integration. The whole discussion of integration has to do with absorption, not with sharing. This must stop!

3) The Blacks who say that the war in Vietnam is a racist, white man's war assert that whites must end it. A corollary of this is that they will admit of no responsibility for participation in the Peace Movement as such.

SOME SERIOUS QUESTIONS

In the last analysis, I must admit that I have serious questions about much of what I have tried to relate in the above. When I heard about the recent all-black meeting in New Orleans, I was not half joking when I suggested that we whites must hold "sit-ins" at the affair to protest and "obviously unjust situation." The injustice is not so obvious to me now. Furthermore, it must be emphasized that many, many in Snick and in the community do not hold with all or even part of these views. Others accept them as a temporary tactic, some as a long range strategy.

There are several questions, some implicit in this paper, which I am not prepared to deal with at this time, but which must be answered soon:

1) Who is "black"?Those advocating Black Consciousness now accept the white definition. Is Ralph Bunche "black"?
2) H w can blacks be unified so that BC can be developed in such a "white" land?
3) Is there danger of an ideology of Black Superiority developing from this?
4) Where is the "Beloved Community"?

Much rough road will be traveled in the thrashing out of this whole thing in the South. The Northern Student Movement was at this point two years ago. It is now all black with many white friends. Snick and other viable parts of the southern black Movement appear to be heading in the same direction. Wailing and gnashing of teeth is senseless. What is needed is a serious attempt at understanding and openness; and much work in the white community.

ALCORN

FOUR MORE EXPELLED

Four student leaders at Alcorn College, Lorman Mississippi, have been kicked out of school for "conduct unbecoming to a student." Their case has been taken by the Lawyer's Constitutional Defense Committee in Jackson, an affiliate of ACLU. The administration acted on May 4. A demonstration, planned for that evening, was called off. There have been no demonstrations since early April at Alcorn.

TWO BUILDINGS MYSTERIOUSLY DESTROYED

The student union building was wrecked from top to bottom recently. This included two demolished color T.V. sets, a wrecked book store and grill. In addition, a tool shed containing many valuable tools belonging to a construction company was burned to the ground.

Clifton McFarland, Jr., a student from Natchez who was suspended in early March for "interfering with a security officer," has been granted a hearing by the State Board of Trustees. McFarland, also represented by LCDC, will appeal his case to the courts if the Board's decision is unfavorable. Ousted in a Kangaroo Court type proceeding, McFarland was suspected by the administration of being a member of the NAACP.

SUMMER PEACE PROJECTS

The South, except in a few isolated areas, has not participated in the raging debate over the present crisis in foreign policy that has swept the country. Because of this lack SSOC is sponsoring a Summer Foreign Policy Education project to have students working in cities of the South talking to clergymen, labor people, other students, professional people, etc. The purpose of this project will be to organize people to talk and learn about why we are involved in Viet Nam, what the arguments are for staying there, and what the arguments are for leaving. We will need to try a lot of different thing---setting up discussion seminars, door-to-door canvassing, community teach-ins, etc. We hope to have a south-wide newsletter for discussion among summer volunteers as well as an end of the summer evaluation session. Finally, we need contributions for subsistence wages, for the orientation, etc. Contributions are tax-exempt. Make checks payable to SSOC for the Summer Foreign Policy Education Project.

We need volunteers immediately. Please fill out the application form on the opposite page. We need offers of free room and/or board for the summer from concerned adults and local committees in the South.

There will be an orientation session including discussions led by competent people on the war and the issues raised by it, as well as discussions on various kinds of organizing and programming. Experienced people will be present. We hope that volunteers will prepare working papers for the orientation to serve as a basis for discussion groups.

An Alabama student informed us this week that she is going to Peru with the Methodist Board of Missions instead of the Peace Corps so that she will have more political freedom.

DUKE EMPLOYEES' LOCAL

For the past year, employees, students and union representatives have been working to organize a union of campus service employees at Duke University in Durham, North Carolina.

A number of gains have been achieved from the effort so far. The university is raising wages. It has been forced to establish a grievance procedure, and several employees who were fired because of union activity have regained their jobs. There is a new relationship between employees and supervisors which is beginning to strip away much of the Old South paternalism.

However the university refuses to recognize the employees' right to collective bargaining. This is not surprising. North Carolina has the largest percentage of unorganized workers in the nation. Only 7% of the state's work force is organized. The dominant industries, textiles, furniture, and tobacco, have fought unions bitterly. The power behind the university is a reflection of the industrial power of the state.

Students at Duke are planning to expand their part in the union effort over the summer. They will begin community organizing in three Negro areas of Durham where most Duke service employees live. The students will work with the union activists living in these areas to tie community work to the union campaign.

The union needs your support for the summer activities. If they succeed, Duke will become the first organized campus in the South, and they will have forced a major power to change.

Contributions for the Duke campaign can be sent directly to Duke Local 77, AFSCME, 604 West Chapel Hill Street, Durham, North Carolina. (A complete history of the Duke campaign is available from SSOC).

Dear Friends:

SSOC has undergone several important changes since you last heard from us. During the past summer two meetings were held at the new SSOC camp in Buckeye Cove, North Carolina and decisions made there reflect the growth and development of the organization.

The June Buckeye Cove meeting was the result of a mandate from the Spring SSOC Conference to hold a summer meeting for the purpose of resolving the questions of membership and programming for the coming year. Last week the executive committee met at Buckeye Cove to finalize plans for the winter-spring program and to incorporate these plans into foundation proposals.

The decisions of these meetings are described more fully in the attached sheets. The general feeling of both meetings seemed to be that SSOC should "tighten up." In order to expedite our servicing of active and committed students, to insure that SSOC reflects the wishes and needs of its constituency, and to begin creating a genuine movement of southern students, SSOC has become a membership organization. The membership fee is $5.00 per year, including a subscription to THE NEW SOUTH STUDENT. Non-members wishing to receive THE NEW SOUTH STUDENT may subscribe for $3.00 per year. Following the October issue of THE NEW SOUTH STUDENT, names of non-paying subscribers will be removed from the mailing list. We feel it is time to face the fact that if SSOC is to continue its work, it must become at least partially self-sustaining.

Programs for the fall include a conference on the university to be held in the Carolinas, a Florida conference on migrant farm labor, speaker tours in the deep and middle South, state-wide campus travelers in Florida, Tennessee, and Virginia, and a greatly expanded literature program. In addition, SSOC will help support three related community projects in Nashville, Southside Virginia, and Atlanta. SSOC staff for the fall presently numbers seven.

Read the enclosed information carefully and send in your membership and NEW SOUTH STUDENT blank in the self-addressed envelope. Let us hear from you on your plans for the fall and specific things we can do to help you, as well as your thoughts on what SSOC should be doing.

For a New South,

Steve Wise

P.S. If you have recently sent in the $3.00 subscription fee, an additional $2.00 will make you a SSOC member. PLEASE INCLUDE YOUR ZIP CODE ON ALL CORRESPONDENCE WITH US.

WHAT'S HAPPENIN'?

Plans for the coming year are open. Part of this openness is a conscious effort to remain flexible enough to meet needs when they arise, and part is forced on the organization by uncertainty about things like money and staff availability.

Conferences

There are two conferences planned for the fall. One is a conference on the university and its reformation planned for the Carolinas around Thanksgiving. It is hoped that SSOC and the Southern Project of NSA will be able to co-sponsor this conference. The second is a conference on migrant farm labor to be held in late October or early November in Florida. This conference will coincide with a drive by organized labor to organize farm workers in that state. Following the conference a SSOC traveller will remain in the state to help relate students to the drive and provide general servicing. Plans are also being made for another Christmas workshop on the South to be held at the Institute for Policy Studies in Washington. Some thought is being given to another students and labor conference for the winter to be held in Texas, perhaps.

Travellers

SSOC will have regional travellers in Virginia, Tennessee, and Florida this fall. Other staff members will be doing some general campus travelling, and travelling to campuses in response to specific needs.

Publications

Because of its continued expansion in scope and size, the New South Student will have a full-time editor this year. The format of the paper will be basically the same, but coverage will be expanded. The work-list mailing will continue and will be sent to SSOC members. Finally the office will continue to reprint and publish articles and working papers on various topics.

Community Projects

SSOC will continue to support the Virginia Students Civil Rights Committee's project in southside Virginia and the North Nashville Project. The North Nashville Project has been working in two black areas of the city, and this fall a SSOC staff member will begin work in a poor white area. Another staff member has begun a project in Atlanta working with members of the university and middle-class community.

Speakers

The SSOC office will begin a speaker program this fall. Information on speakers who are willing and/or eager to do speaking around the South will be compiled and sent to campus groups. In addition several speaker tours are planned for the spring.

Membership and Chapter Servicing

As SSOC chapters are formed and membership increases, SSOC will be searching for effective ways to service and coordinate the activities of active students. Planned are an expanded literature distribution program, the speaker program, and available staff to assist chapters with their own programs.

Folk Tour

Another folk tour is planned for this year. The tour will cover more schools and earlier notice will be given so that chapters will be able to make more adequate arrangements. A workshop is planned for this fall to make plans for the tour.

SSOC Camp

SSOC has a five-year lease on a camp in Buckeye Cove, North Carolina. The camp can be used for weekend meetings and seminars in good weather, and is available for general use by SSOC chapters and members. Plans are being made for a summer-long seminar or institute to be held at the camp.

In thinking about SSOC programs for the coming year it might be helpful to review some of the things SSOC was able to do last year:

Held a two-week workshop at Highlander Center in September, 1965. The workshop dealt with programs for the '65-'66 school year.

Co-sponsored with the Southern Project of the National Student Association a conference for Florida students.

Sponsored a regional conference on university reform held Thanksgiving weekend at the University of Arkansas.

Assisted the Virginia Students' Civil Rights Committee in holding a state-wide student conference.

Sponsored at the Institute for Policy Studies in Washington a Christmas workshop focusing on economic and political trends in the South.

Planned and held a student conference in Mississippi which examined projected problems in the state.

Sponsored a conference on students and labor held in April in North Carolina.

Gave assistance to two SSOC-related community projects in southside Virginia and Atlanta, and helped initiate a third in Nashville.

Coordinated the SDS draft exam program in the South.

Disseminated information on the student revolt at Alcorn A & M College in Mississippi and sponsored a related southern protest of poor education in the South.

Sponsored a movement folk tour which visited twenty southern campuses and communities.

Published nine issues of the New South Student.

Recruited seven students to work on a summer drive to organize eastern migrant farm workers into a labor union.

Sponsored a South-wide, issue-oriented conference in Atlanta in the spring.

Made campus visits to approximately one hundred southern schools during the school year.

Leased for five years a three hundred acre camp near Asheville, North Carolina to be used for student and movement meetings, seminars, and recreation.

We are anxious to hear your ideas on the projected programs for the coming year as well as any other suggestions you may have. The degree of success of any SSOC program is wholly dependent on your participation and critical evaluation.

THE BEGINNING OF THE END

Many of you have been receiving THE NEW SOUTH STUDENT for nearly two years now. During that time you have seen it grow from a four-page bulletin going out to fifty people to a 25-page newsletter reaching more than 4,000 readers monthly with expanded coverage of campus and community social action across the South, as well as opinion columns, programming suggestions, book reviews, and feature articles.

Concurrent with the growth of THE NEW SOUTH STUDENT has been an increase in the cost of publishing and our largess, in the form of free subscriptions, must now necessarily come to an end. If THE NEW SOUTH STUDENT is to continue to expand and improve, its readership must begin to financially support it.

In October you will receive the first issue of THE NEW SOUTH STUDENT for this school year. Regrettably, unless we hear from you, this will also be the last issue you receive. A year's subscription to THE NEW SOUTH STUDENT is $3.00. An additional $2.00 will make you a full-fledged member of SSOC. Let us hear from you by using the enclosed order blank and self-addressed envelope.

RURAL COMMUNITY OGANIZATION

by

RURAL COMMUNITY ORGANIZING

by John Zippert

The dilemmas faced in rural community organization attempts can best be related in a sad and simple story. A sharecropper who has been very active in the project, has eight children, works 12 acres of cotton, 10 acres of corn and 5 acres of sweet potatoes. All of his children but one are of school age. This September he sent one of his children to integrate the first grade at the local white elementary school. When I went by his farm in mid-October (almost two months after school had opened) three of his children were in the field digging potatoes...they had not as yet attended a day of the school session. Here was a man so radical in his social beliefs that he challenged one of the power structure's most prized institutions, yet he was unable to free himself and was a captive of a traditional economic system somewhat akin to slavery. It was clear that if this man did not keep his children in the field he would have had no income on which to support his family and send the others to school. (Just as a note of academic interest, when all seven of his children attend school, it costs him $75 a year to pay for the "family plan" of the Federal FREE School Lunch Program for them!)

People have been moving off the land and into urban areas ever since about the time Frederick Jackson Turner proclaimed "the frontier closed." The number of rural people, especially Negroes who have moved up to the ghettos of our Northern cities from the South, must be staggering. It is clear that if a man is a small farmer and has a big family, they will be an asset until they grow old enough to want to strike out for themselves. At this point they must leave to find work. Most of them don't find it on the farms but join the ranks of poorly educated unskilled workers. This is mostly due to economic and school segregation experienced by Negroes due to the intimidation and pervasiveness of the power structure in the South.

Nowadays people are being kicked off the land by landlords who are turning to the economies of scale offered in mechanized agriculture. A cotton picker can do the work of fifteen (15) hand pickers in a single day - with only two men needed to operate it. Some of the plantation hands or 'croppers' are hired back as day laborers for fifty cents an hour (50¢) and make about $6 a day for working from can to can't (see the sun, that is). In Louisiana, many of the farmers who used to market their sweet potatoes with local shippers are finding these shippers are renting large tracts of land (displacing the small farmer) and becoming large growers as well. These grower-shippers are using four-row tractors and implements, mechanized sweet potato digging machines and hiring large amounts of labor at harvesting time for sub-standard wages (they often hire the children of the small growers). Thus, they are producing sweet potatoes at a lower cost per crate than the small grower who farms intensively, often with a mule team or at best a one-row tractor. When the small farmer comes to sell his potatoes he gets less than it actually cost to produce them while the shipper is still in a position by strict grading to reap a handsome profit through his marketing knowhow and contacts.

Since most small farmers grow one or two"cash crops" they are caught in a squeeze because they do not have the resources, knowhow or encouragement to diversify their crops. The Cooperative Extension Service, while connected with the United States Department of Agriculture, is primarily an agency of the state affiliate with the states white land grant college. In the South, the Extension Service has been unresponsive and has lacked initiative in working for or with small Negro farmers. The Soil Conservation Service works primarily with larger farmers who have some spare land to conserve rather than with small farmers who seem to be people in need of a certain amount of conserving before they all disappear from the land. The ACP program, which is part of the services of the Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service is supposed to subsidize 50% of the costs of certain conservation practices such as fertilization, irrigation and drainage of the land. Most poor farmers cannot put up the other half; some are never informed or fully knowledgeable about these benefits; some do not have enough land to benefit and others (sharecroppers) do not own the land and often the bossman is unintorested because it would take his funds to improve a tenant's land. Part of our organizing attempts among poor small Negro farmers must be in the area of agronomics, agribusiness, conservation and other agricultural techniques. Possibly mid-Western state university schools of agriculture are the places to hunt for volunteers. If it seems far fetched to see a civil rights worker running a "freedom school" on agricultural techniques it may be the only way out. This is not to say that poor farmers should not demand their rights to equal and fair service with large and white farmers. Many letters and petitions have been sent but the USDA hierarchy moves slowly. One reason for this is that the Senate and House Committees on Agriculture are chaired by southerners Ellender (D. La.) and Cooley (D. SC) and dominated by conservative legislators.

Many policies and programs of the U.S. Department of Agriculture structuraly exclude the sharecropper. He is, in most instances, excluded from borrowing under most of the regular FHA loan programs. Only the new Economic Opportunity Loan under Title III of the Economic Opportunity Act provides some relief. Under this program a farmer or resident of a rural town may borrow up to $2,500 for anything that will increase his family income. Several ladies have acquired sewing machines under this provision on the supposition that they would sew for their neighbors to make some money toward the liberal repayment terms of the loan. Several mechanics and blacksmiths shops have been modernized with these funds. But even when the government goes out of its way to help people with a loan program there are provisions clearly discriminatory to the small Negro farmer. Because of Hurricane Betsy there is in Louisiana a program to give farmers an FHA Emergency Loan at 3% interest. Part of the principal amount borrowed will be excused if a farmer can show crop losses due to the storm. Up to $1,800 will be excused in this way. However, no matter how much you borrow you must pay back the first $500 of the loan although you can get the next thousand excused. Thus the small operator whose borrowing is done in the hundreds and not the thousands receives no pro-rated principal excuse provision. The poorest man gets the least help-the usual story.

The credit problems of the poor farmer would make material in in itself. Most poor people borrow with a local grocer or the bossman at 8 to 10% interest. But they start borrowing on April 1 and pay back in October, so they only have the money for half a year, which doubles the interest rate. Most farmers do not get the entire principal amount on the first day of the interest period but collect it as they need it. All of this added together means that the small farmer often pays a twenty percent (20%) interest rate for his money. Organizing farmers for education on credit practices and demanding a special low interest, possibly a rate only to cover processing costs by FHA, should be instituted to help low income farmers.

One of the best programs around which to organize rural people is the allotment program as administered by the local Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service (ASCS) Committee and Office. Since a man's allotment and parity check often determine his income this program reaches all the farmers on the basis of economic interest and direct importance. The ASC structure superficially appears to be very democratic in that all people who have an interest in the allotment program: landowners, tenants, sharecroppers and their wives, are all supposed to vote for the committees that administer this program on a local level. In the South, until the civil rights organizations began to tackle ASCS elections, no ballots were sent to sharecroppers. In Louisiana and Mississippi there was wholesale and as yet uninvestigated fraud in the ASCS elections. The elections do give farmers, especially Negro farmers, a chance for political participation linked with basic economic issues. The elections are not like ordinary projects but have a certain limited goal (election of a Negro county committeeman) toward which people can work and measure their accomplishment. By running candidates in each ward of the parish where I am working last summer we were able to create an informal parish-wide farmers organization with natural leaders (the men who had run as ASCS candidates and those who worked hardest to elect them). The election gave the people in some wards a chance to participate in a nominating convention where more people wanted to run than there were places. Since there was adversity on the part of the ASCS Office Manager in his reluctance to send ballots to sharecroppers, we drew closer together by having to take direct action in terms of a "crowd-in and complain -in" at his office as well as some letterwriting to Washington. We won a victory in terms of his grudging concession to send ballots to all eligible voters. In the end he cheated us by sending ballots to all white ladies because they owned a little property but not sending any ballots to Negro ladies because he said he did not know which Negro farmers were married.

Out of contacts between farmers from different parts of the parish came a discussion of other common problems. One of these was the low price farmer's were getting for sweet potatoes. Various alternatives to this problem were discussed including a co-op or a union to withhold crops from the market until a basic and fair return price was paid. These farmers are now planning to borrow a quarter of a million dollars from the FHA under the loans to cooperatives section, Title III, Section 303 of the Economic Opportunity Act to open a sweet potato marketing co-op. If the co-op does well in the fresh market, its members hope to negotiate a loan for a processing plant to can their own sweet potatoes in the coming years. These OEO loans to cooperatives can be helpful in organizing farmers to acquire machinery comparable to that owned by bigger operators. Six to ten small cotton farmers having a combined acreage of 100 acres of cotton can buy a $15,000 cotton picker from the FHA under its OEO loaning power. They do not need any capital; all they have to do is form themselves together as a co-op. One group who bought a cotton picker cooperatively last year in my area was able to pay their note despite Hurricane Betsy and send their children to school on the first day. A group of ten men can form a feeder pig co-op. The co-op can buy some land(less than an acre will do) and put a building and buy the pigs for breeding. All of this will be financed by the FHA. Each man will have a certain day when he must take care of the operation so no one man is burdened by the load. All share in the business's profits and a small amount is set aside in retains to pay back the FHA co-op loan. This type of co-op would give sharecroppers and day laborers something to fall back on, or a supplement to their income that the bossman could not share in or control.

There is great need to pull together all the organizations of poor Negro farmers to exert pressure on Washington for more liberal loan programs, subsidy payments for crop diversification, higher price supports, greater educational efforts among small farmers, more job training and retraining programs for poorly educated youth and displaced farmers, income supplements to farmers to maintain themselves on the land with limited resources and even more limited incomes. Surely in Louisiana some pressure could be exerted by the vote to rid us of Allen J. Ellender as Senator. One of the best programs to organize for is one which hires and trains poor farmers to work to help and train others in their own ranks. In this way the government could provide an income supplement to every fourth or fifth farmer for him to help the other three or four to do better.

FARMERS ORGANIZE

by John Zippert

The New South must have a just economic structure as well as just political structures. The structures cannot be separated--it is the political strength that whites have wielded which has made possible the preservation of the system of economic suppression. The other side of the coin is that economic inequality has worked to preserve the system; the economic power of the rich and the white have enabled them to control the political apparatus. In order to bring about basic changes in the system, one must not only organize on a political basis by gaining and using the vote, but also attack the system at its economic base.

Whites Control Economy

All over our land, the economy is controlled by whites. White men own the stores, do the hiring and firing, set the prices, and control the sources of capital necessary for an individual to set up a business. It is a closed economic system into which Negroes are brought on the terms set by whites. In order to change this, people have set up various insurgent economic organizations. In the Mississippi Delta, sharecroppers have organized the Mississippi Freedom Labor Union. A Poor Peoples Corporation and a brick making factory have been set up. In St. Landry Parish, Louisiana, Negro farmers are joining together to form several co-operatives.

Co-ops Formed

The Opelousas Progressive Co-op, the largest of the co-ops they are forming, has 200 members who have pledged to set up and support a food store, financed by $10 pledges by each member. In this way, they can raise capital independently of the power structure, and can possibly get money from the poverty program. The planning is being done by the people who belong to the co-op. Each member has one vote; each man participates in the decisions about what will happen in the co-op and what his money will work for. The profits will go back to the shareholders on the basis of how much they use the store, in order to encourage doing business with the co-op, as well as to realize the profits themselves, rather than giving them to the white man, as in the past. The co-op will make jobs for Negroes as managers, cashiers, and clerks, and buy produce from Negroes.

Dealing more basically with the economic basis of the society are two other organizations for St. Landry Parish small farmers, perhaps to be merged soon, a sweet potato marketing co-op and a farm supply co-op. The farm supply co-op will buy seed, fertilizer, and poison in large quantities and then pass the savings on in the form of lower prices to the individual member. Again, the capital will be raised by the members and borrowed from the government. These same small farmers are organizing a sweet potato marketing co-op, in which they have agreed to sell their sweet potatoes to the co-op. In this way, they will have a large enough quantity to store, ship, and sell the potatoes themselves, rather than being forced to accept the terms of the local buyer. As well as giving people more money for their potatoes, the co-op will also create new jobs.

The Future of the South

It may be that the future lies in the cities--that rural organizing will be outdated by urbanization and the increased efficiency of mechanized large scale agriculture. Nevertheless, some people have made a commitment to the rural South, to stay with it and change it, rather than flee to the dubious haven of the Northern ghetto. These people, forming co-ops in which for the first time they may join together on a basis of trust and competence, forging out an economic organization independent of white dominance, controlling their own resources, and making their own jobs, are creating an island of possibility for the emergence of a New South.

A PARABLE

OF NO VIOLENCE, SOME VIOLENCE AND GREAT VIOLENCE, by Clarence Jordan

It came to pass in those days that injustice multiplied throughout the land. The poor were oppressed and pushed around exceedingly. They smiled through their tears by day, but hid their faces under their pillows by night. And they cried out for deliverance, but the strong and haughty men who ruled over them told them to keep quiet. They did so, and the strong men said to one another, "See, they are content."

But a Leader arose among the poor. He told them to lift up their voices and let their cries be heard in the streets of the cities. When they did as he said, their oppressors moved among them and cracked their heads with clubs and filled their eyes and lungs with painful gas. But the Leader said, "Be not afraid; we shall overcome them with non-violence." So he taught them to pray in the streets and in the market places for their tormentors. He urged them not to strike back when they were beaten and carried off to jail.

Then a Man of Some Violence stood up among the strong and said, "Our poor are no longer content as they were before strangers entered among them. Lest they make themselves equal with us, and perhaps even rule over us, let us diligently suppress their cries in our streets and their groans before the eyes of the nation." This seemed good to the strong, and they did so. They made blood to flow and they caused bones to break.

But the poor cried out all the more, and some of them wanted to shed the blood of their oppressors. Then the Leader said, "No, we must do no violence, for this will hurt our cause." And the people shouted back, "Then what shall we do?"

Now there was in that country a Man of Great Violence, who ruled over all the people, both great and small. And the Leader of the poor said to them, "Let us call upon this Man of Great Violence, for he is a man who also deals justly and loves mercy. Surely he will hear our prayer for freedom and justice." This pleased the poor, and they made their voices heard before the Man of Great Violence.

But he was a very busy man indeed. He had cities to bomb in distant lands, and villages to burn, and people to make nauseated with gas, so he turned not aside. Yet the Leader, the Man of No Violence, would give him no rest, for the Man of Some Violence was still cracking the heads of the poor as they walked in the streets crying for deliverance. Moreover, the People of Great Violence also spoke to their ruler, saying, "You must give justice to the People of No Violence." And the ruler gave heed to their voice, for it was they who supplied him with men and money for deadly weapons and fearful bombs with which to kill many people in faraway lands. So he called before him the Man of Some Violence and ordered him to let the People of No Violence walk in the streets and cry aloud for justice and freedom. This made the Man of Some Violence, and the strong men with him exceedingly angry toward both the Man of No Violence and the Man of Great Violence. And his anger waxed even hotter when some of the people who supplied the Man of Great Violence with men and money took their places beside the Man of No Violence and said, "We too are non-violent and love justice. You must no longer afflict the poor."

And it came to pass that the Man of Great Violence placed his strong men, armed with deadly weapons, along the roads and streets in order that the Leader and the poor and the non-violent might walk unmolested as they sang, "We Shall Overcome." And when the men with deadly weapons held back the Man of Some Violence and his followers, the Leader of the People of No Violence shouted, "We have overcome." And still another said to his oppressors, "Now we will make the laws and you will pick the cotton." And hate and anger and pride flowed freely.

Now when the Man of Great Violence had established justice in his own land, he breathed easier, for he could give greater diligence to the slaughter of peoples across the sea. And his people were relieved too, and they were even more eager to give him the men and money and machines he needed to crack many heads and kill multitudes so that he might establish justice and freedom throughout the whole world.

And some of the People of Great Violence who had stood beside the Man of No Violence, returned to their homes. They praised their ruler and the Leader of the poor, but they damned the Man of Some Violence. And they said solemnly from their pulpits: "God loves all people." And their hearers were glad, and went joyfully back to their task of providing the Man of Great Violence with sufficient weapons to ensure justice and freedom to all people (who might survive) for all time (if there is any).

NONVIOLENCE

WHY IT WON'T WORK, by Brian Peterson

Anyone seriously interested in meaningful social change should ponder the fact that radical shifts in power in society in the past have come only after power has been forcibly wrested from the hands of those already holding it and placed in new hands. This is most clearly apparent in social revolutions where power has shifted from a backward social class based on outmoded economic and social institutions, to a progressive social class, based on new and more efficient methods of production, distribution and social control. Here comes to mind the shift from more or less feudal to more or less bourgeois social forms in the English Civil War in the 17th Century, the French Revolution in the 18th century, the American Civil War in the 19th Century, the Chinese Revolution of Sun Yat Sen in 1911-1912, and the February Revolution in Russia in 1917. The shift from capitalism to socialism, when revolutionary, has required force or the threat of force in the following countries: Russia, Outer Mongolia, China, Yugoslavia, Albania, Bulgaria, Rumania, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Poland, and Democratic Germany, not to mention Democratic Vietnam, Democratic Korea, and Cuba. All other countries which are sometimes called socialist are not yet fully out from under capitalist control. Indeed, many of the above mentioned countries may require further internal revolutions and the use of force to keep them from drifting further toward a semi capitalistic, managerial-controlled society. This force must be more ruthlessly applied than it has been in the past, but it must also be more clearly separate from attempts at counter revolution.

Anyone who suggests that pacificism is an absolute for the movement is a bourgeois reformist who is not seriously concerned with revolutionary social change. Even as a tactical matter, it is often necessary to use force. Such force is used to defend neighborhoods against nightriders, to stop police brutality on the spot, and to protect peaceful demonstrations from harassment. If we ask the police to protect us, we are sanctioning the use of violence for political purposes. If we are men, we will protect ourselves. Watts is a good example of the ambiguity here. Martin Luther King supported police violence to "restore law and order", but from a pure pacifist position this is no more legitimate than to support the rioters. So the question becomes: which violence do you support? Police violence and army violence or black mob riot violence?

What is the pacifist alternative in Viet Nam? Should the Vietnamese let the French or the Americans run their country? Should they try Gandhi's techniques? Gandhi's techniques worked ONLY because he did not seek a basic shift in social power: imperialism and native capitalism were so close that they could shift positions at the helm without disturbing either British financial interests or the basic social hierarchy. The socialist revolution which is coming in India will require blood, and lots of it, to water the tree of liberty.

Let's get rid of our illusions of nonviolence and get down to the serious business of changing the South.

PEACE POLITICS

A DISSENT, by David S. Messner

All of us are becoming more acutely aware that we are arriving--much too rapidly for the state of our preparation--at a critical junction in the history of this nation, perhaps in the history of Western culture. Our policy-makers protect themselves from reality with an official shield of private delusion and the rhetoric of self-interest. Their policies have generated a costly, ugly, and dangerous war. More than most of our almost habitual wars, this war is tyrannical and oppressive. It is a sickening and horrifying instance of the official betrayal of the American Revolution. We appear to have sold our birthright of moral idealism for a regard for the cynical manipulations of "realpolitik." The revulsion burning within each of us finds its expression in the question of what is to be done.

Suggested Action

One suggestion has been to run peace candidates in congressional elections. This is suggested as the most direct and efficient response to a rapidly deteriorating situation. Peace candidacies can eliminate Democratic incumbents in certain crucial districts, and thus the president may be made to feel the power of an electorate aroused and alarmed by his war. Such a strategy may well result in the election of candidates considerably more belligerent and considerably less idealistic than the incumbent. But still, it is hoped, the President will be made aware that his conduct of the war is sufficiently culpable to confer the balance of power upon a new opposition. Further, should a peace candidate be elected, he can then proceed to dilute the war hysteria by his presence and activity.

Secondly, it is argued that a peace candidacy will be the most effective way of dissuading the people from their warlike proclivities. The people orient their awareness of issues and their political activity to electoral politics. Thus, it is argued, such a situation as a peace candidacy will find people more receptive to the idea of peace and more willing to volunteer their services "for peace," than they would be in other situations in which peace was advocated.

Thirdly, it is argued that electoral politics offers the best vantage-point from the standpoint of publicity. Lectures and pamphleteering, for instance, demand that people think. And that, in itself, is unthinkable. But in a political campaign, people are not themselves. They will accept leaflets, TV advertisements, speeches, etc. with at least a bland politeness and, who knows, some of it may rub off, i.e., they may begin to think.

These points, while not exhaustive, are I think, representative. With each of them, I disagree.

In the first place, I think it is just obvious that the victory of a pro-war conservative over a pro-war liberal is a liability, not an asset. No garrison state with such destructive armaments as ours can afford to entrust its destiny for two years (or two days!) to people so lacking in vision, understanding, and moral compassion as pro-war conservatives. In the 1860's demagogues seizing power could not blow up the world. In the 1960's they can.

Further, conservatives in general are very paternalistic about the "military-industrial complex". Profit is their primary criterion for distinguishing good from bad policy, and they have found this paternalism to be lucrative beyond expectation. They tend, therefore, to look rather more benevolently upon war than the pro-war liberals.

Another difference. Liberals, in general, espouse a certain amount of compassionate idealism in the domestic programs they work for. They generally have less motivation than conservatives to protect the military-industrial complex. Thus, and by so much, they are more amenable to the suggestion that they are compromising their idealistic domestic programs to support an enterprise alien in spirit to their hopes and convictions.

On the other hand, not only does war not interfere with the domestic programs of the conservatives; it furthers them--the growth of the corporate state, and the maintenance of the maldistribution of wealth.

Success?

The success of a policy of merely defeating incumbent candidates, in some cases, will deprive the President of support for his more decent impulses; conversely, it will also stimulate his less decent impulses. All of this, in my judgement, constitutes a serious liability which we can ill afford in a time such as the present.

Secondly, I think it is true that people do orient their political awareness to electoral politics. But this is bane, not blessing. So long as this is the case, any progress is at the mercy of the whims, neuroses, and cynical manipulations of the electoral process.

Presumably, the present war is a product of this process, broadly conceived. The elements of psychosis and cynical manipulation are obvious enough to all but the most deluded at any rate. So presently, war is more important than aid to the poverty-stricken and aid to education. This has been a bitter and disillusioning, but well-learned lesson for those of us who worked for the Great Persuader in 1964.

The Lesson

So far as I am concerned, the lesson is simply this: unless the people bring moral commitments to the electoral process, they will almost always become dupes at the mercy of egotists who may be non-malevolent, but who are simply cynical. It amounts to an exploitation by design or by fate--take your pick--of the people's confidence.

In order to avert this, the people must be possessed of both moral and pragmatic criteria with which they can judge the actual and proposed performances in the political arena. For obvious reasons, the political arena is better adapted to explicate the pragmatic than the moral value of given policies. And yet, opposing and seemingly equally formidable cases may be made out on purely pragmatic grounds, so far as the people are concerned.

What I wish to suggest is that this familiar means-end notion of pragmatism is, in this instance, incomplete and, to a considerable degree, self-defeating in the long run. It is the notion which we like to cite such groups as the Minutemen and the Klan for using. Therefore, we who wish to convert men, as it were, from analyzing policy in terms of "deterrent values" to what I like to term "compassion values" must give serious consideration to how we propose to effect this change.

One thing I am certain of, and that is this: the change will not occur automatically, or as a by-product of registering enough people to vote, and running candidates who have some idealism. The reason, I think, is simply this: some of the cynicism of our leaders, jovial as it may be, rubs off on the people. They take with a grain of salt anything they observe in the political arena. Unfortunately, that includes a display of moral idealism.

From this, one might justly conclude that, so far from being the ideal form of action for furthering the cause of peace, political candidacies operate under severe limitations which are to some extent unique to the political arena. From this, in turn, it appears obvious that means other than engagement in electoral politics will have to be found and implemented just in order to assure the success of that engagement in the political process. And that additional factor, I want to suggest, is the instilling of moral considerations as a part of pragmatic criteria in the minds of the people.

Finally, I wish to suggest that, in my opinion, the notion of "power" is a basically irrational notion upon which to base a hope for progress. The acquisition of power may--I say may--be achieved with no sacrifice of egalitarian idealism. That seems to be only rarely the case. But even more rare is the maintenance, without such a sacrifice, of the power acquired. In this sense, it appears obvious that the notion of power tends in the long run to be self-defeating, for those possessed of some moral idealism. In this connection, such tragic figures as Woodrow Wilson and the late Adlai Stevenson might be mentioned.

Why Does Power Corrupt?

Why must this be? The central factor seems to me to be this: the people do not clearly prefer a response of love and non-violence to a way of hate and violence. When they descend to the level of hate and violence, they become a natural target or opportunity for the self-seeking paranoia or, perhaps the delusions of grandeur of the cynical political operator. When people are willing to hate and resort to violence, any political hack can utilize their senseless hostility and further corrupt it to senseless bestiality for the accomplishment of enormous evil. Consider Adolf Hitler and the German people--their ovens. Consider Lyndon Johnson and the American people--their napalm cremations. Clearly, such institutionalized bestiality would be impossible without the consent of the people to resort to violence in the first place.

It is obvious, isn't it, that if people learn not to hate and to justify violence, political hacks will have lost their opportunity. We will no longer be plagued with wars which seek to harden our delusions of grandeur and our xenophobia.

Disrupts Egalitarianism

Another disagreeable fact about the possession of power is this: it tends to be disruptive to the realization of egalitarian ideals. He who possesses the power is in some sense a master, while the rest are his subjects. When the power is abused, as it almost always is at some time or other, resentment is generated which can rapidly become hate. Consider our relations with Latin America, and, of late, Saigon. Again, only when he who holds power will relinquish it before he resorts to violence to retain his power will this degeneration to hatred and violence be averted; similarly, it will be averted only when those who do not possess power determine never to resort to violence and hostility to acquire it.

All of this suggests that the acquisition of power dare never be an end in itself. When it becomes that, when it becomes so important that people will employ violence to acquire it, then, for one who is possessed of moral idealism, it becomes self-defeating. It becomes susceptible to cynical manipulation and is often characterized by a virulent anti-egalitarianism.

Therefore, if policies having "compassion values" are to be preferred to policies having "deterrent values"--e.g. if "food-for-peace" programs are to be preferred to "arms-for-war" programs--the people must learn how to conduct themselves and how to choose policies which will make the latter, grim alternatives unnecessary and superfluous.

In closing, I do not propose that we cease our current activity. What I do propose is that we do some hard analysis with regard to better aligning goals and policies, and with regard to better aligning goals and policies, and with regard to the reaction of the one upon the other. We ought to become more clear about why we're doing what we're doing and especially about what will be required for the successful implementation of our long-range goals. I, for one, do not think it is at all obvious that our present activity, if continued, will automatically bring about the realization of these goals.

LSU REPORT

Paul Jansen is from Hartford, Conn. For the last two years he has been attending Louisiana State University in Baton Rouge. The liberal student group on campus is called the Student Liberal Federation. Paul recently retired as president of that group. He established residence in Louisiana and was listed by the treasurer's office as an in-state student for purposes of determining his tuition--a not uncommon thing for college students to do. He helped to organize the teach-in on Vietnam which was held at L.S.U. on February 8, 1966. Al Nelson, a Spartacist, was one of the participants in that teach-in. During the course of the evening someone asked if Nelson was a communist. He replied that he was (or still is). The press lambasted the University. A legislator took up the matter as a personal crusade. He called the president of the University and demanded that Nelson be picked up. He asked that the University come out against having left-wingers on campus. The president wisely refused.

The Hartford, Conn. newspapers carried accounts of the Louisiana incident. Paul's father, a Danish immigrant, has been harrassed in the past for his socialist views. Because of his son's activity he has been fired from his job. Relatives in a nearby town have been harrassed.

Paul and two Negro friends, all of whom lived in the dorms, were harrassed to the point that they had to move out. They secured an apartment in the Negro community. Paul was reclassified as an out-of-state student. His tuition was upped immediately.

Sometime later the decision was made to hold another Vietnam rally. A representative of the Student Peace Union was asked to speak on campus. This time though the opponents of free speech were ready. The SPU speaker was not allowed to talk. Paul Jansen read his address, while the man from SPU sat with him on the platform.

Fortunately, there is some good news to report. After having been evicted from the apartment in the Negro community, Paul and his two roomates, both Negro, found an apartment in the white community. At last report they are living quietly in their integrated housing.

The other good thing is that the SPU campus representative was allowed to speak in Baton Rouge--at the Fellowship Baptist Church, a formerly all-white church which was associated with the Southern Baptist Convention.

CALL TO ACTION

May 14, 1966 promises to be a very important day for college students around the country. It is the first date that the Selective Service College Qualification Test will be given. Scores on this test will be used by the local draft boards to determine which full-time students will lose their deferments from the draft.

On that day there will be a lot of anxious people walking into the 1700 examination centers. People who know their educational background is inadequate will have to face the likelihood that they will have to leave their homes, their girls and their careers in order to serve in the Armed Forces. They will have to face the possibility that they may soon find themselves dropping bombs on Vietnamese villages or creeping around the jungles trying to decide whether a peasant should be shot. Because the exam is presenting a threat to college men and to the women close to them, it is bound to raise questions in people's minds.

The danger is that this questioning will lead only to nervous anxiety. The hope is that those who take the College Qualification Test will begin to question their situation in a serious way; that they will be able to see the social inequities and problems behind it and that they will find a way they can work to save future generations from their dilemma.

Students for a Democratic Society is sponsoring a nation-wide effort to stimulate students to respond constructively to the government's "Beat-The-Draft" exam. In their "Call for an Examination of Conscience" - which has been reproduced as a leaflet - SDS asks some penetrating questions:

> "What about all the guys our age who don't even get this chance? Those whose parents didn't have enough money to send them to college? Those whose backgrounds didn't even teach them they should want to go? Do we smell a little old-fashioned class privilege here?"
> "On the basis of our answers to questions about poems and physics and geometry, we will or will not be 'eligible' for the draft, will or will not be inducted, will or will not be sent to Vietnam, maybe to kill, maybe to die. SO WHAT DOES GEOMETRY HAVE TO DO WITH THE VIETNAM WAR? If the government intends to train us to be killers if we fail its test, why doesn't it ask us instead what we think this war is all about?...Why doesn't the government look for people who WANT to be soldiers in this war? And if nobody WANTS to fight it, and if they can't persuade us, then why don't they quit trying to force us to fight? After all, the thing about American democracy is supposed to be that the government belongs to the people. Or maybe things have changed? Maybe now its the other way around? MAYBE THE REAL BATTLE FOR DEMOCRACY IS RIGHT HERE IN AMERICA?"

On May 14th, SDS is going to pass out its own test to those taking the College Qualification Test. This test has been prepared by distinguished scholars and asks only fair and objective questions about the War in Vietnam. The hope is that students will "grade" these tests themselves and decide whether they "know enough about the Vietnamese to take some day the personal responsibility for their death."

It is now virtually certain that these tests will be distributed at all the testing centers in the North. SSOC is co-operating with SDS and other groups in an effort to cover as many Southern testing centers as possible. Won't you join in this exciting and significant program? PLEASE WRITE THE SSOC OFFICE NOW AND LET US KNOW AT WHICH CENTERS YOUR GROUP CAN DISTRIBUTE THE SDS EXAM?

HEY OLD PEOPLE

"While brave men die," you deride
Those nasty young Americans who have been trying To keep those brave men from dying.

You are surprised that we don't realize
How lucky we are to be "Free"
And you don't understand why we can't see
That this is the way everyone should be.

But, ruling generation, have no fear,
We know that some have it worse than we have it here;
But the issue should instead be, with us you see,
That this isn't the way its supposed to be.

In Sunday school you taught us, "thou shalt not kill";
In grade and high school, we were taught constantly
That we live in the "land of the brave and the home of the FREE",
And of course the President follows the people's will,
And WAR is declared in Congress by passing a bill,
And then, of course, it's alright to KILL.

So, our's is not a frustration from comparison
With systems more favorable than our's
It's from telling us we're in an open grassland
And them putting us behind bloody iron bars.

What do you want us to do?
"Accept your responsibility," you say--O.K.
I'm willing to go out and vote today;
But that right isn't part of our position,
We're only tools of death in a blind expedition.

The first "mature" task you ask us to perform
Is to change a human into an unrecognizable form;
You want us to go with your troops the whole world wide
And take a vigorous part in your Holy, benevolent Genocide.

Our first reply is naturally "Why?"
But when we determine the historical, political reason,
Our answer is "No!", and you call it Treason.
Still we ask, "For what reason must those people die?"
And "For what just cause should we, your B-52's fly?"

But YOU OLD PEOPLE who originally made (acquiesced to) the decision
Can do nothing but RED-bait, and accuse in sneering derision, Quoting, "Blessed be the Peacemakers for they shall inherit the Prison."

VIET NAM

AN ABSENCE OF RECTITUDE By Joe McNulty

During the 1964 campaign for the Presidency, President Lyndon Baines Johnson went to great lengths to picture his opponent, Sen. Barry Goldwater, as a "shoot from the hip" radical whose actions would involve the United States in a dangerous, protracted conflict in South-East Asia.

Conversely, he presented himself as a rational, restrained leader dedicated to peace and a policy of limited military involvement.

An August 29, 1964, President Johnson stated, "I have had advice to load our planes with bombs and drop them on certain areas that would enlarge the war and escalate the war, and result in our committing a good many American boys to fight a war that I think ought to be fought by the boys of Asia to protect their own land."

On election day, by the greatest landslide in our national history, Americans defeated the man who advocated increased American involvement in Southeast Asia.

Conflict Intensifies

In November, 1964, approximately 25,000 American "advisors" were in South Vietnam. Today, over 212,000 American troops are in combat there, and their death rate is averaging around 100 men each week.

What has caused this drastic alteration of the intensity of the conflict and extent of the American involvement in Southeast Asia?

The standard administration reply is that massive Communist infiltration from North Vietnam has forced us to respond to our " commitment" to South Vietnam through the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization.

This explanation sounds rather hollow in face of the facts.

The Department of Defense reports that 60,000 North Vietnamese have infiltrated into the South since 1960, while 330,000 Viet Cong have been recruited and trained from the native South Vietnamese in the same time period.

It is also interesting to note that by the terms of the 1954 Geneva Accords, the South Vietnamese have no legal right to make or become party to any military alliance.

All of this evidence is added to the fact that, because of their failure to allow an election in 1956 as stipulated by the Geneva Accords, the present government in Saigon is illegal.

Freedom and Honor?

Secretary of State Dean Rusk has said that we are supporting freedom and democracy for the South Vietnamese. At the same time we maintain by force of arms, the regime of Nguyen Cao Ky who has said, "People ask me who my heroes are. I have only one--Adolph Hitler."

Talk of honor is meaningless in this situation. There is no honor in massive intervention by the United States at the request of a corrupt, inefficient and illegal government headed by a professed admirer of Hitler.

There is no honor in the deaths of American soldiers supporting a military dictatorship which, according to the government of France, is opposed by 90% of the population. Even the Department of Defense states that only 50% of the population supports the Saigon government.

Platitudes

Talk of "Freedom", "solemn obligation", or "honor", will not solve these basic incongruities of American policy.

Neither will these "platitudes of the Potomac", rectify the deceit in that grand house on Pennsylvania Avenue.

THE CHINESE REALITY

By Charlotte Bunch

As members of the University world involved in "searching for truth", we frequently speak of the realities which shape our world. Yet, over the past 20 years, most of us have ignored,or held tight to outdated stereotypes about the oldest living civilization in the world-a civilization with approximately one-fourth of the earth's people: China.

McCarthyism drove many of our best Asian experts out of the country--leaving a decade of silence when debate, question-raising, and accurate information about China should have prevailed. Those who have gone to China report that our isolation policy has not so much isolated China from the world as it has isolated the people of China and of the U.S. from each other, producing a lamentable and dangerous situation.

As in most great civilizations, we in America are ethno-centric. Studies in almost all disciplines are approached with the idea that American society is both the norm and the ideal by which others can be judged.

Few world history, literature, and art books mention China. In political studies of international relations or communism Asian authors are not read. Sociology and psychology courses ignore the way of life of millions of Oriental peoples. All lose some of their relevance by not preparing us to live in a world with the Chinese.

More immediately, our apprehension of China is a major factor in the present Vietnamese conflict. The U.S. attitude toward Peking is based on the assumption that she has the power to stop effectively, if not control, the movement of the National Liberation Front. Yet, many scholars, including the three just returned from China and North Vietnam (Herbert Aptheker, Staughton Lynd, and Thomas Hayden), have challenged this notion, claiming that we make demands on China that are beyond her control.

Far from being academic, this is one of the U.S. assumptions about Vietnam and Asia that, if mistaken or only partly understood, could thrust us into war with China--a war which most experts declare neither the U.S. nor China wants.

It has been said that usually if nations are "close to war, the reality principle is lost." It is that reality which we as students and citizens seek to regain as a replacement for unreal stereotypes, if the collision course with China is to be hated or diverted.

As a Chinese history student just returned from two lengthy conferences on China, I want to suggest some areas for exploration by the student community that have been brought to my attention recently.

First, as U.S. citizens, we are in the position to challenge our own stereotypes of China while recognizing that the Chinese have equally distorted views of us. One need only compare some of our literature on China with the Chinese "Hate America" campaign to realize how truths have been distorted on both sides. Stereotypes are often much easier to deal with than the complexities of reality; therefore, far from bringing clarity, breaking down stereotypes thrusts us into an ambiguity where absolutes are inappropriate.

This two-way gap can only be bridged if one side is willing to take the first steps. It has been suggested that our position of strength affords us the opportunity to take the initiative. Here I will suggest something of how China may view the world and us, along with some "unthinkable thoughts" that were subjects of great debate in these conferences.

For some 4000 years, China viewed herself as the "Middle Kingdom," the center and height of civilization. With this legacy, imagine the shock when, in the 19th and 20th centuries, this superiority collapsed through internal decay and at the hands of the Western powers. The Western powers exploited China, forcing unequal treaties on her, and bringing new ideas and techniques that changed China's course as well. In addition to external troubles throughout the first half of the 20th century, China was racked by civil wars.

Communist Contributions

Into this situation the Chinese Communist government brought stability and unity for the first time since before the West entered China. It reasserted Chinese pride and position as a great nation, and it enforced a rigid and efficient administration that has made great strides in modernizing China, including the prevention of recurring famines during the hard years of 1960-62. Thus, the Chinese compare their situation today with their past, not with Western societies. China today may fall short of our ideals of living and our concept of liberty; however, the living standard of most Chinese has risen and the present regime, if not loved, is supported by most of the people.

The Chinese acceptance of authoritarianism is rooted in the Chinese concept of the role of the individual and his interaction with society. Unlike Western individualism, Chinese society centers on group endeavor, stressing the need for the subordination of the individual to the interests of the group. In the past the Chinese saw as his major concern not his own salvation and achievements but the welfare and demands of his family group.

In the desperate drive to modernize China, the Chinese are seeking to transfer this loyalty to the state. Similarly the state should provide social security for the people reducing their dependence on family security.

The internal aims and problems of China have demanded some type of central control, but today the degree of control exercised by the Communist Party from the top down is questioned. Several economists and educators noted that many important decisions are made at lower levels, and an expert on Chinese leadership suggested that the complexities of bureaucracy may be leading to the control of the State over the Party, the reverse of the Communist model.

These explorations into decentralization tendencies in China also suggested that the Party may be more pragmatic and flexible than has often been thought. Perhaps the greatest pragmatism of the Chinese Communists is their adaptation of Marxism to a non-Western peasant land. One conference participant suggested that the Chinese may have used Communism for their national needs more than international Communism has used China.

Whatever the balance of Communism and nationalism, the Communist Revolution was genuinely Chinese, growing out of Chinese circumstances, and can not be considered a Russian product. Some people suggested that the Sino-Soviet tension predates 1949 and that the 1950's reflect mainly a marriage of convenience between these two Communist powers. Just how important Russian aid has been to China is still debated. Thus, when the Chinese assert that, just as America had to break away from Europe, Asia can not be dominated by foreigners, and "foreigners" includes the U.S.S.R.

Chinese Conception

To the Chinese, this is a world of the "haves" and "have-nots" in which the U.S.S.R. seems to be joining the U.S.A. as a "have" nation dedicated to maintaining the status quo so unsatisfactory to the poor of the world. From this perspective China is proud of her victory in ousting Western influences from her soil and in her great material advancement since then. She is proud to be self-reliant, claiming that dependence on Western powers only leads to subservience to them. She then sees herself as a revolutionary model to inspire the underdeveloped "have-not" nations of the world.

Thus Chinese hostility toward the U.S.

rests on her view of us as the status quo oppressors, as well as her historical hatred of the Western humiliation of China which has been largely directed to the U.S. This hostility is further increased by the Chinese sense of being encircled by hostile powers, especially the U.S. military, and her continual fear of a U.S. attack on her borders.

I began with two premises: that China is here to stay, and that we must establish contact with its stereotypes and hostilities.

Contrary to popular myth, however, helpful source materials on and from China do go beyond the Reader's Digest mentality. Numerous books, papers, articles, both academic works and reports from persons who have visited China recently as well as translations of Chinese newspapers and books can be found in University libraries.

Conferences suggested many ways by which the U.S. could begin the task of breaking through the barrier. They include: (1) Striving to end U.S. identification with the status quo by supporting more adequate programs of social and economic change in countries where this change is being demanded. (2) Recognizing and encouraging China to take her place with its responsibilities and privileges in the world community. (3) Promoting various forms of exchanges, communications, and trade with China. (4) Ending our "trading with the enemy act" provisions now governing trade with China. (5) Allowing our allies more freedom in their relationships to China. (6) Ceasing unnecessary provocative acts and statements toward China that increase her fear of U.S. invasion. (7) Supporting the moves made by the government for greater communication, e.g., physicians travel permits.

Some people maintain that these measures will be of little interest to China unless we are ready to discuss the position of Taiwan and the possibility of Taiwanese free elections to determine her status, and to reconsider the role of the U.S. in Asia, particularly in Vietnam.

Most of the ideas here are still controversial; this is by no means a definitive work. Our task is neither to excuse nor to pass judgement on the Chinese Communists. Instead, it is to try to understand how the world looks from their eyes, and put that into our perspective.

("The Chinese Reality" was originally printed in the real world, an insurgent newspaper at Duke University.)

ATTENTION !

All who receive this bulletin are urged to report at once to the editors any sign of a highly contagious pestilence known as the Slater Catering Service. It is now known to be taking over the food services of the southern colleges and universities, as well as hospitals and other institutions. Slater comes in and pensions, seniority, and job security go out. Slater comes in and decent food service goes out. It is believed that Slater, which has its national headquarters in Pennsylvania, is not even unionized in the North. Be on the lookout for the tentacles of this monopolistic octopus, and report the state of your campus food service to SSOC. Is it unionized? Can it be? Is your food good? Do the students want to demonstrate against it? Let's coordinate our activities and unite students and labor right on the campus through unionizing food service workers and demonstrating against poor food and high prices.

HUMANISM

AND THE MOVEMENT By Steve Wise

It is time, I think, for the Movement to begin to exert a deeper challenge to the stodginess and stultification of the Great Society consensus. The consensus represents the desires of the American middle class: everything and everyone must conform to the consensus. The American middle class cannot tolerate nonconformity. Thus all must merge, by means of Great Society programs, into middle class life. For example, today we have a poverty program aimed not only at producing people useful for the purposes of the economic establishment, but also aimed at instilling middle class values into the poor so that they will never perceive any radical alternative to the status quo. Thus the Appalachian mountaineers must give up their "quaint" ways and conform to the dictates of industrial "progress." Or, poor Negroes must acquire the values of the Protestant moral and work ethics, so that they, like the stereotypic black bourgeoisie, will become pliable Toms. All of this points out, I think, the crying need for a replenishment and renewal of American culture. The acute need is for an emphasis on humanism.

It eems to me that there is a dichotomy, somewhat hidden perhaps, in the present comments and writings of Movement people. Very generally, SDS people's comments seem to fall into the old American materialistic-technological strain, while SNCC people's comments seem to tend towards a more humanistic bent. Let me illustrate that by a very general contrast of the recent articles in The New Republic by SDS and SNCC people. With the SDS articles the emphasis is upon agencies of oppression; with the SNCC articles the emphasis is upon the victims of oppression. The SDS articles are primarily concerned with structural devices, economic interests, power, production, bureaucracy, the welfare state, managed society, profits and capitalism, militarism, and policies, etc. The SNCC articles are primarily concerned with the poor, the "unqualified" people, the "excluded" people, feelings, hopes, fears, freedom, personal integrity, and the destruction of the human personality, etc. I do not want to push this contrast too far, but I do think that the contrast has been present for some time in the Movement. It is not that SDS and SNCC are talking about different things, for they are not; but rather, that they choose to emphasize those things in different ways. It is that emphasis of SNCC upon mankind, freedom, personality, etc., that I find more humanistic than the emphasis of SDS upon structural devices, economic interests, technological advances, etc. As noted above, the desperate need of American culture is for a renewal and replenishment of its humanism. The incipient humanism of SNCC may well prove to be the needed stimulus for such renewal, unless the new cult of black power developing in SNCC is transformed into a mere replica of white power.

Suggestions

A possible means of enriching American humanism is, I think, through gaining knowledge of and experience with what John Gillin calls "the Modern Latin American" culture, or mestizo or ladino culture, i.e. the predominantly national culture which is the historic product of the blending of Indian, colonial Spanish and modern Western civilizations in most Latin American countries. The contrast of this culture with American culture should prove quite instructive in delineating various alternatives to the peculiar American form of Western culture. For example, ideologically Modern Latin American culture is humanistic rather than puritanical; intellectually, it is characterized by logic and dialectics rather than by empiricism and pragmatics; mysticism and fantasy rather than science exert a strong influence. The fact that the Reformation, the mercantile movement, the Industrial and mechanical revolutions, the rise of modern science and technology, and laissez-faire capitalism never obtained a firm foothold in Spain undoubtedly is one of the reasons that Modern Latin American culture differs so greatly from American. (Let me make it clear that I am not arguing for the substitution of one for the other, but rather for the humanistic influence that might possibly come from the one.)

It seems to me that one excellent means of attaining knowledge of and experience with Modern Latin American culture would be in exchanging Movement people, particularly students, with Latin American students engaged in social reform, political revolution, etc. Hopefully, such contact and exposure will add much cultural knowledge to the Movement, and perhaps enable the Movement to develop a more qualitative humanism to challenge American mediocrity. In addition, there will be many other advantages that should accrue from such an exchange program. If C. Wright Mills is correct--and I think he is--in his assertion that the historic agency for social change has passed from the working class to the young intelligentsia and the students, then certainly there would be advantages in establishing an identification and communication among Western Hemispheric student movements. For one thing, it could possibly influence American foreign policy in better directions. (I understand that SNCC is considering something similar with regard to Africa.) Recently, Jack Hood Vaughn, new director of the Peace Corps, proposed a "reverse Peace Corps plan" under which citizens of other countries would come to the United States to work and teach. If the plan ever comes to fruition, it probably will be oriented in much the same way as the VISTA program or the poverty program, i.e. it will serve to buttress the status quo, and any challenges to the status quo will be checked by the governmental bureaucracy. I think the Movement can steal some of the thunder from Hood's plan by instituting its own exchange program, which, hopefully, would give qualitative impetus to the Movement's efforts to smash the status quo.

ART AND THE MOVEMENT

by JON STEINBERG

A radical movement of the communist variety is generally committed to an artistic policy of "socialist realism" which, broadly speaking, means a literal interpretation of events designed to uplift its audience and further the vision of communism.

This was not always the case. Lunacharsky, the first Bolshevik Minister of the Arts, made valiant efforts to preserve artistic freedom and monuments of tsarist art. Unfortunately he was less than successful and resigned. Throughout much of the twenties, however, artistic creation flourished. One need only recall Mayakovsky, Babel, Eisenstein and the Russian Futurists.

As we are all aware, this period ended with the execution, imprisonment or suicide of many of its foremost exponents and the silencing of the rest.

While it is difficult to attribute to political or economic factors the flowering of individual genius, the fact remains that of all the millions of people born in the world, creative geniuses tend to cluster in nations which have a well developed heritage and are experiencing a great social, economic and, in some cases, political upheavel; in a word, a revolution. Renaissance Italy, L'Age D'Or in France, and Elizabethan England come readily to mind along with the Russian Revolution.

With the exception of segments of the Negro population, America does not appear to be in a state of upheaval at the moment. Assuming that we are eager to develop artistic genius (I hope so), we are then faced with the problem of how best to approximate a real social upheaval while awaiting (though not passively) the Great Change.

Any competent, creative writer, with the possible exception of nature poets, relates to his environment in his work on a level broader than, though including, direct personal relationships. That is, he must take social realities (as he sees them) into account, even if not the political and economic influences which help to shape them. If the radical writer is one who examines these social factors or their determinants in depth, subtly using his knowledge to add fullness to his characters and plot, then radical writing becomes synonymous with good writing. If radical writing means allowing social or economic or political considerations to overshadow the portrayal of the personal human element involved it is at best an essay and at worst similar to most Soviet writing of the thirties and forties. These standards apply whether the subject matter is radical in a political sense or not, although we are still faced with deciding if the writer's perspective of social realities conform to our concept of what the radical thinks they are.

Ideal Qualities

Despite this difficulty, we are happily faced with the conclusion that qualities which we seek to foster: the fullest development of man's personality, sensitivity and responsiveness to others, are essential to the good writer. Unfortunately, it is a bit premature to raise the revolutionary slogan "Every man a Thomas Mann", since genius also requires creativity and style. Creativity is a very elusive faculty, but one thing that we do know is that it involves the ability to break old sets and establish new, yet apt, combinations. It would therefore seem quite possible that upheavel in the social environment increases the liklihood that this will occur in a manner conducive to a flowering of the arts.

Given the present, relatively static, American societal structure, the most relevant question is whether we can internalize this process. That is, instead of altering the present American societal structure, altering the individual's perspective of it so radically that he is forced to create new patterns of his own. It is apparent from past experience that if this is done to individuals in isolation we will have succeeded in creating a number of socially alienated neurotics. While neurosis may be a factor conducive to artistic creation, we should hesitate to consider it an objective. If we do not, then we have an obligation to the American radical to offer him some form of supportive community.

Communities

Artists particularly appear to need such a community, though it need not be a radical one: witness the reactionary group of Pound and Eliot in England between the wars. It need not constitute a majority view within the national or regional intellectual group, but it does seem to need enough support to make it appear to be a worthy point of view to a writer, who is usually particularly sensitive to the opinions of others. For any artist his audience is extremely important. Art is a form of communication and although the prospective audience may be limited, consciously or unconsciously, it is always a primary consideration in the artist's work. Therefore the radical community has an obligation not only to directly encourage writers, but to develop an audience for them.

Other than the nebulous concept of sensitizing an individual to others, the two most effective ways of developing an appreciation for literature appear to be reading and writing, which themselves can deepen sensitivity. The availability of earlier works of the same culture is important to the prospective writer also, since the artist's thinking is refined by his reading of the works of others which are culturally relevant, even if he ultimately rejects most of their premises. As the nations of the world draw closer together in terms of common experience, a national tradition will of course become less important.

Encourage Reading

Since it is established that it is good for everybody to read, it seems clear that we should encourage this radical concept, far ahead of its time though it may be. Part of encouraging reading could reasonably include providing reading material for others. This would have the additional benefit of pleasing writers, who generally like to see their work published. Thus we can promote a symbiotic relationship between the writer and other members of a potential radical community, deepening and strengthening the community by increasing and developing its common experience.

The problem remains of how to decide what literature to print given a limited amount of resources. There are two questions which must be answered in order to determine the solution. One is, have we developed our thinking on our radicalism sufficiently to determine conclusively what is or is not writing which conforms to it? (This is meant to be a rhetorical question and I will treat it as such). Given the fact that we have not, have we defined it sufficiently to preclude the possibility of ever making such a determination? (I wish more people would consider this question rhetorical).

In discussing this question let us keep in mind the reductio ad absurdum of the negative, namely, Soviet policy toward the arts under Stalin and its more recent, milder derivatives.

Individual Integrity

While it is difficult to be specific about intellectual ideals, we are seeking a society where each person has maximum freedom of individual expression in a constructive manner. This is predicated upon a belief in the integrity of the individual and the basic social instincts of man when freed of the distorting influences of our present predatory, competitive society. It is an optimistic view of man's potentialities, given the proper social, economic and political structure.

If we are attempting to build a society based upon these premises, then we must attempt not only to change the present society, but to develop the capabilities of those whom we hope will build it.

Revolutions, in the sense of destruction of the old order, are simple in comparison to the real revolution of creating a new society. We should be under no illusions that this is either an easy or a short task. It is a task whose success depends very heavily upon the people who will create the new structures; the more closely they approximate the type of people which we hope the good society will be composed of, the more likely it is that they will act to bring that society to fruition.

Therefore the advancement of the movement is best served by encouraging the development of individual expression coupled with a responsiveness to the needs of others.

Social Context

If, as was suggested above, the competent artist writes in a social context, we must work to create an intellectual (as opposed to a physical) community, based on these values. This is best achieved by encouraging the artist to write what he feels, and distribute it if its literary merit justifies its publication for others to appreciate.

ON THE BOMBING AND SMEARING OF THE W.E.B. DUBOIS CLUBS OF AMERICA

Sons and daughters of DuBois!
That smokey red hole that was your nest
Is but a moment of your solidarity with the oppressed of this earth.
Surely the brass of benevolence without love,
Surely the breaking glass of hate without grace
Will pale before symphonies as the backs and broken bodies of this world cry, "No more!
    We will fight wars of political expediency
No more!"
And as surely your father said of himself,
Peace will be your applause.

GRUMBLINGS 'N RUMBLINGS

FROM ALCORN A & M COLLEGE, MISSISSIPPI, by Uncle Ed

The forty highway patrol cars of a few weeks before were gone from Alcorn when we entered the administration building to look up Tom's fullback friend from Alabama. Student Personnel sent us to the football stadium. We walked past the lovely chapel, which this oldest (1871) of the nation's Negro land-grant schools advertises as having been built with the labor of slaves in 1830. Until 1870, the year Negroes demanded to be admitted to Ole Miss, Alcorn was for white males.

1964--1,000 Gone

Looking over the football field, it was difficult to imagine what it looked like on that spring morning in 1964--1,000 students out on the field surrounded by several score highway patrol men with fixed bayonets and tear gas. We struggled to "hear" what the head of the state police sounded like when he said, "Well, by staying out here and carryin' on all night long, you kids (or was it niggers?) have showed that y'all just don't want to go to school--so we're goin' to take y'all home." Then the big Trailway buses rolled onto the track. At bayonet point 1000 students were herded into the buses and taken home.

Carryin' On

It's true that they were "carryin' on;" carryin' on the decade-old tradition of protest; Carryin' on about their grievances--senior students teaching classes; professors taking advantage of co-eds; Tom Mix movies as a "cultural" activity. Many of the students, after begging the administration, were readmitted that spring or summer; one only made it as far as the bottom of the Mi'sippi River. How and why he ended there is unknown.

In March, 1966 protests began again. The highway patrol, bolstered by the National Guard, was back. Tear gas shot into one of the dorms during a demonstration made it unliveable for three days. Students who ran out to escape the gas were arrested and suspended. Thus far, at least forty-five have been thrown out.

Black vs. Black vs. White?

President John Dewey Boyd scurries from his office to his 136-year-old home (also built with slave labor) three doors away. Does he remember what Alcorn was when he was getting his B.S. there years ago? Is he living in that past? He refuses to see the students about their demands, even though they come to him in groups of 1000 and 1500, or when they return with their committee of seven.

That Uncle Tom Boyd has been bought by the all-white board of trustees, and also that he is afraid of both the board and the students appears clear. But is this a struggle between black students and white trustees? It seems certain to me that it is more. The protesters have additional demands. One is that the board be desegregated; another is that the racist political hacks be replaced with educators. But more important are their demands that they have a say in writing the rules, and in selecting the committees that govern them. They identify with other students and with their friends whose consciousness has been awakened in the movement. When they say, "Send our mail to the Snick office if we get kicked out," the point is made.

"Who Decides?"

Increasingly, the question "Who decides?" is being raised by people in the student, peace, and black liberation movements through their actions. When enough people come to the conclusion that this is the central question facing us, and when they answer it "I do for me and I will," then perhaps a change will come. Considered in this light, Alcorn is not a freak or an aberration deserving of our paternalistic pity. Rather, it is a place where students are leaders in the fight to build democracy in this country. It is for us at Chapel Hill, at Fisk, and at Alice Lloyd Junior College to follow that lead. Can we decide to do that?

NEGRO COLLEGES

WHAT IS THEIR FUTURE? By Richard Robbins

Now, late in the game, white Americans are "rediscovering" the Negro college. In this there is supreme irony. For the white community, determined to preserve racial segregation, made the separate system of higher education for Negroes necessary and inevitable. If white people now find that the majority of the Negro colleges fall short when measured against standards of educational preparation or academic freedom they should consider the extent to which whites contributed to the situation, largely through indifference and neglect. Even today most white people can name scarcely a handful of the leading Negro colleges in a system of more than 120. And I have met many college-educated whites who persist in holding to a long-passed, choir-and-spiritual conception of Fisk and Hampton. Of the state-supported schools they know nothing.

History

Through the late nineteenth century and on into the twentieth the Negro colleges, normal schools, institutes, struggled to survive and to educate in the face of innumerable obstacles. While Northern white philanthropy supplied important financial and educational assistance, even this support was all too frequently enmeshed in a system of white paternalism and Negro dependency. At first, Negroes could not even preside over and direct their own institutions. Later, Negro college presidents had to acquiesce in the humiliating and dependent role forced upon them, although there were several notable exceptions. They asked for what they could get from the white power structure--private sources or state legislatures. They kept silent about the double standard of justice which meant ample funds for white institutions and a trickle for the "colored school" across town. They accepted, at least in public, the "law" of "separate but equal" knowing it meant for Negroes separate and unequal from grade school to college. And when they turned from outer to inner world, from community to campus, they often ran their schools with an iron hand, keeping teachers and students alike strictly "in line." Booker T. Washington, famed graduate of Hampton and founder of Tuskegee, whatever his many contributions to advancing Negro education, had also contributed to a fatal weakness in curriculum in assenting to the devastating white stereotype that Negroes were, at bottom, really better with their hands than their heads. Hence the excess of courses in tailoring, carpentry, upholstery which, as W.E.B. DuBois pointed out as early as 1900, were perfectly honorable crafts but said nothing to the aspirations of those Negroes who happened to want to be historians or mathematicians and were perfectly capable of being so. All these patterns were found in my own institution, Hampton Institute. The white founders were highly motivated and deeply committed. At the same time, and for far too long a time, they kept the presidencies for themselves, kept the Negroes subordinate and dependent, and kept alive racial segregation in housing, dining, interpersonal relations --just as on the outside.

Results

We of the 1960's, black and white, can scarcely judge these men, black and white, of another era. Given the climate of the time could they have done otherwise, or better? What we do know, reading novels such as Ralph Ellison's Invisible Man or Saunders Redding's Stranger and Alone, is something of the fearful psychological price that Negro presidents, teachers, and students had to pay in order to obtain a precious, even if inadequate, education. What we do know is that, despite the oppressiveness of the segregated society outside the campus, and despite the handicapped character of the education offered within, many Negroes won through nonetheless to careers in the professions, the sciences, the arts. Yet even here the pattern of discrimination and segregation took its revenge. Knowing the barriers which lay ahead, students tended to overconcentrate in preparation for teaching, preaching and the civil service where the protected jobs were. Often this meant not only a stifling of deeper aspirations but a later reinforcement of an isolation already keenly felt in the Negro undergraduate subculture. Returning to teach exclusively in the Negro college or in "Booker T. High", Negroes were deprived of that opportunity to test their ability and experience, as individual men and women, in the full mainstream of American society. The extroadinary thing was not the number of Negro college presidents and teachers who became, like many white men with less reason, wily political manipulators and academic time servers, but the numbers who managed quand meme, to instill in students the excitement of learning something and the expectation of being somebody.

Recent Developments

Today, in Negro Higher Education many things have changed and some things are the same. The Supreme Court decision of 1954 and subsequent crises and events broke the back of segregation as an accepted way of life. Negroes have been going to integrated colleges in greater numbers in the North and in token, but steadily increasing, numbers in the South. The students themselves played a signal part, through the sit-ins, in demolishing one of the most humiliating aspects of going to a Negro college in the South: that one left the campus for relaxation only to find the movie house and lunch counter were tightly segregated. What the North Carolina A.&T. students began in 1960, sitting-in in Greensboro, has now been virtually completed, thanks to students all over the South. The public accomodations section of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 set the seal on what they accomplished.

Southern state legislatures have, belatedly, put extensive funds into the physical plant of the state Negro colleges. Many are transformed in this respect, although the legislatures have yet to show the same concern for the vital, nonmaterial resources (such as teaching personnel and cultural events) which give purpose to the spanking new buildings. Most of the private colleges in the system, both religious and nondenominational, have also launched comprehensive fund drives and building programs. And the stronger private schools--Morehouse, Hampton, Fisk, Tuskegee, Talladega, and others--are making an impressive effort to correct present deficiencies which stem from the segregated past. They have exchange programs with large universities in the North; they sponsor, with federal and foundation help, programs to upgrade the work of entering freshmen or high school graduates; they are seeking more white students to provide something of the integrated experience; they are aiming at bringing salaries and teaching loads into line with general practice in order to attract better faculty. The weaker schools, public and private, lack the resources to follow in the wake of the leaders, and they remain more imbedded in the kind of autocratic-bureaucratic system I have described above as characteristic of an earlier day. Nonetheless, they are trying to move in the same direction, however fitfully.

Student Activity

Most important of all, the students who care--not those, who like their white counterparts in white schools are simply drifting through four years or keeping out of the draft--are increasingly concerned about the very real shortcomings in their education. As their involvement in the external world of the civil rights movement is now more searching and sophisticated (jobs, and votes, and "white power structure", and Black leadership in place of breaking the color bar in the local drugstore), so their involvement in their own internal world of campus community is now less timid and passive (why such early curfews, so high-handed an administration, such gaps in the calibre of the faculty, such overprotectiveness toward girls who are in fact women?). If some of the student resentment is sheer restlessness and diffuse "bitching", common to all campuses black and white, there is nonetheless a deeper and authentic current running here among a growing number of Negro college students. They know and understand the reasons why, going all the way back to segregated kindergarten and what it means to grow up black in Mississippi or Alabama, their school is no Harvard, University of California, Oberlin, their achievement level is below par in science, mathematics, clear expression in English. But they have every reason today to ask why their school is not even up to the comparable white Mississippi State or Alabama State and why their high schools did not give them the same preparation for college as the white high schools in Jackson or Birmingham. And they want their presidents to put the same questions to state departments of education and private boards of trustees.

Still, with all the change and ferment, there remains disquiet about the present condition and future status of the Negro college system. It is true that generalizing about Negro higher education today is difficult. The complex stretches from Maryland to Mississippi, includes a Fisk and an Alcorn A.&M. (where, incidentally, the students of this state supported institution in Lorman, Miss., are up in arms against their own administration) at opposite poles of quality. Traveling to many Negro college campuses in recent months I found a pluralistic diversity and unevenness comparable to the white system-- a range of Negro colleges and not "the Negro college." The worst college in the South happens to be a bastion of white supremacy and segregationist thinking. And the best happens to be integrated.

Major Problems

Nevertheless, putting aside these qualifications and conceding that a small number of Negro colleges can stand up competitively with any schools of comparable size and level, no one can doubt that the average Negro college is below-average and that not all the grievous faults are due to the heritage of survival-in-the-midst-of-segregation. Since Negro college students are less than 5% of all college students but Negro colleges take an estimated 40-50% of the Negro population in college, we are not dealing with a minor phase of a major problem. The recent McGrath Report (The Predominantly Negro Colleges and Universities in Transition) does not advocate closing or combining the weaker schools, as suggested by a number of critics, both Negro and white. It does, however, argue that only a truly prodigious effort will bring these schools into the educational mainstream. Prof. Bernard Harleston, of Tufts University, himself a graduate of Howard, is both more biting in his criticism and more hard-hitting in his proposals than the McGrath group. He is troubled by the parochialism implicit in the location of nearly all of the Negro institutions in 17 southeastern states and by the relative scarcity of really competent scholars and teachers in the system. Writing on "The Negro in Higher Education" (Atlantic Monthly, Nov., 1965) he says harshly, "the educational opportunities which many of these institutions offer are so limited in range and depth that what they call higher education is at best a cruel hoax." In his view only a few of the schools "have yet reached or can hope to reach full educational maturity," measured in terms of "an able and intellectually curious faculty and student body, adequate library resources, laboratory and classroom facilities, and an intellectual climate committed to academic freedom and intellectual integrity." Accordingly, he concludes that "the concept of the Negro institution is an anachronism" and that "Negro institutions, like Negro education, must be integrated into the larger context of education." He recommends that the smaller and weaker schools should be closed, radically transformed, or turned into integrated junior colleges or pre-college centers. Meanwhile, the Fisks, Howards, Morgan States, can be depended upon to become multiracial, cosmopolitan, predominantly Negro institutions able to hold their own in the general competition. The others will have played out their historic role.

Much of this critique is well taken and on the mark. But I believe it to be premature. In the first place, until integration proceeds much more rapidly in Southern previously white institutions, the Negro colleges of mediocre calibre will have to stay open to accommodate those Negroes who wish to go on to college but do not qualify for, or cannot afford distant travel to, the better Negro institutions. At last count there were 7 Negro undergraduates at the University of South Carolina in Columbia, S. C. When there are 700 then it will be time to close the all-Negro Allen University in the same city, a school which is indeed pathetically inadequate and whose diploma is worth little to the Negro who obtains it. Yet to argue along these lines is only to point up a deeper problem. There are too few Negro students in the Dukes and South Carolinas of this country not only because of remaining racial restrictions in higher education but also because the Southern grade school and high school system is not preparing a large enough group of Negro students for the general college and university system. And that in turn has nothing to do with race; biological difference has no bearing on why one student passes French and the next does not. Rather, we must face the fact that in the South, especially at the high school level, no truly functional integration has yet taken place. When white and Negro high school teachers are assigned to schools across the board in large numbers; when Booker T. Washington High and Robert E. Lee High are more or less the same in the composition of their student populations and in the distribution of their students, from drop-outs to college-bound; when high school athletics in the South are played between schools of the same size and strength irrespective of race (athletics are no small matter to adolescents); when the dual racial structure of state and local educational units is terminated and a Negro is chosen to be superintendant of a "white" system because he happens to be the best man available--when all these and many other changes take place, only then will individual Negro youngsters, before college, be in a position to choose, as whites already choose, "the college that seems right for me." By the same token, on the basis of a radically changed high school experience, a given white student will conceivably be in a position to choose what was once stigmatized by his parents as "the colored school" and is still predominantly Negro in composition. He will do so not to expiate the white sins of the past nor to run up the flag of white liberalism in the present. He will do so, if he does, because high school will have prepared him to look beyond race for "the college that seems right for me." In the meantime, awaiting this far off day, the Negro students who are now in the weaker Negro colleges must protest against being short-changed educationally in their own institutions as they have protested against segregation in the community outside. The crisis at Alcorn A.&M. is the child of the sit-ins launched from North Carolina A.&T.

STUDENT ACTION

Mississippi

Tougaloo Southern Christian College, a Negro school in Mississippi has been through a traumatic week of student strikes, meetings and protests. The action followed the dismissal of a student by a disciplinary committee which had no students on it. The administration refused to rescind the dismissal but did agree to demands to revamp the committee to contain 1/3 voting student representation, and voting representatives on every other faculty committee. About 1/3 of the student body of 600 was involved.

South Carolina

On March 15, 1966, a group of students held a rally at the State House in Columbia, South Carolina. They were there in support of a compulsory school attendance law. They carried signs and a replica of a coffin to represent the 50,000 children who drop out of South Carolina schools.

When questioned about the rally, Governor Robert McNair lightly asserted that there were other methods which the students could use to express their views.

WHAT IS WRONG

WITH NEGRO COLLEGES by J. Raymond Hodkinson

It is true that Negro colleges were founded and made their way in the face of difficulties imposed from outside : hostility or indifference from the surrounding community, lack of money, the dictates of church and state, inadequate faculty, intellectual isolation, a student intake unprepared for study, and limited prospects of employment for their graduates. It is also true that many Negro colleges achieved national recognition and rendered real service to their students in the teeth of hardship and seemed even to thrive on the challenge; and still do. If it wants to, a college can be good in the face of hostility and deceive hostile authority under its very nose.

Today, however, these adverse circumstances have been considerably mitigated and many Negro colleges can call upon extensive finance, goodwill and academic assistance from state and federal agencies, industry, large universities, and an important section of the white community.

I can testify to this from my own experience. As I am well known internationally in my research field, many white colleagues were surprised at my decision to leave the well appointed University of Rochester, New York, to take over the run-down Physics Department in the obscurity of Virginia State College. They feared for my future academic reputation. Nevertheless, once I was here, I have been continually encouraged by interest and practical assistance from physicists all over the U.S.A. and from people in the city outside our gates whom I count it a privilege to have met.

Why These Restrictions?

Why, then, in so many Negro colleges are the academic standards still unbelievably low, the intellectual atmosphere suffocating, the social regualtions for students more restrictive than in a convent school? Why does the faculty have little or no voice in decisions or policy making? Why are the students treated like children in class and out and why do they put up with it? Why are student governments ineffective, student newspapers censored or suppressed? Why the rigid formality of faculty to students (and to each other), the stiffness in manner and in dress? Why the lugubrious, compulsory religion, or the injection of religion into required activities? Why may not two or three be "gathered together in His name" except the college minister be present to regulate the exchanges with the Almighty (presumably in both directions?) Why the grinding overload with superfluous courses: Philosophy in which the whole class chants I Corinthians 13 and the student is tested on what is the 3rd book after Ezekiel or the 4th before Timothy; Personal and Social Adjustment, Community Health (students in my country would be helpless with mirth at being told how to do their hair, when and what to wash, when to smile and always to be polite!); American Constitution, after 10 years in the most patriotic high schools in the Western world; Compulsory R.O.T.C. with no provision for conscientious objectors? Why no student strike at wage rates as low as 55 cents an hour for student work? Why the virtual ban on any really active civil rights activity? Why had the white students down from New England been registering Negro voters in our city for two weeks before our students even heard of it? Why the inactivity of so many social science departments? Why the moralizing, militaristic and patriotic fulminations in college assembly and the fear that students might get their own ideas on Vietnam or love? Why the censorship on what books the library may have--nothing controversial please? Why no games on Sundays, the only day the students really have time for needed fresh air and exercise? Why are they forced in some colleges to retire to their dormitories at 5:00 p.m. for the Sunday "quiet hour"?

Why the appointment as Head of a Foreign Language Department of someone who can read one foreign language and speak none? It is hard to believe, on such a campus, that one is living in this country and in this century.

A Diabolical Plot?

Why? There is one hypothesis that fits the facts too perfectly: that some of the Negro colleges have been carefully thought out to make sure that the Negro cannot possibly get an education making him competitive, yet deceive him that he is getting an education, and deceive concerned whites as well, by an elaborate show of fine buildings, a College catalogue bulging with courses and departments, and a multiplicity of schemes, officials and committees. I doubt if this were ever wholly true, even if it were once intended; I am sure it is not true now.

Exploitation

Then why? Here are the answers given by an eminent Negro sociologist and an eminent Negro historian.

"Unlike the missionary teachers, the present teachers have little interest in 'making men', but are concerned primarily with teaching as a source of income which will enable them to maintain middle-class standards and participate in Negro 'society'. It appears that the majority of them have no knowledge of books nor any real love of literature. They go through a dull routine of teaching literature or other college subjects to listless students....Conversation and books had no place in their recreation which consisted in playing cards, drinking, movies and'parties'....their interest was in automobiles, furniture, and household appliances."--E. Franklin Frazier in Black Bourgeoisie (pp. 74-5).

"The NAACP realized that by providing Negro schools and colleges with better buildings, better equipment, and better salaries for teachers and by changing the title "college" to that of "university", the South was in effect strengthening "Jim Crow" by establishing "gilded citadels of segregation" manned by Negro administrators and teachers who would have vested interest in maintaining the status quo in racial education."--Benjamin Quarles in The Negro in the Making of America (p. 237).

Even in the few years since Frazier and Quarles wrote, there have been improvements, but not enough. Let me emphasize that there are first class Negro schools, faculty, and administrations.

The Negro college teacher is a slave to the system that produced him: he deserves sympathy. Actually, he has little to fear from the import of academically better colleagues: those elementary and remedial courses he teaches will be needed for a long time yet and even more as a greater proportion of under-privileged students come in. He stands to gain by an improved status for his college.

The Negro Power Structure

The main obstacle to progress in many Negro colleges is the Negro bourgeoisie (as distinct from Negroes who form part of the numerous American bourgeoisie). Its rallying point, in the South at any rate, is the Negro Church, especially the Baptist Church, whose ministers and elders are fighting desperately to retain their grip on their people; and they are closely allied with the senior staffs of Negro grade schools and colleges. Many Negro colleges have several ordained Baptist ministers each on their faculties, including Presidents and Department heads, and the full-time salaried college ministers. Although their power is now being questioned, they contend the more strongly because this is their critical, even if not their last stand. In the Negro colleges they are striving to keep their grip on the rising Negro generation by washing their brains, closing their minds, dragging their feet over integration, keeping the students isolated mentally and physically from the outside world. They do not care overmuch if their graduates are only educated to the level needed in the substandard world of the second-class citizen: for it is only in this world that they can continue to be the top dogs and they want it to continue. Do they not realize the harm they are doing to so many young Negroes? The days of power of this bourgeoisie are surely numbered, but they may drag the Negro colleges down with them.

Why Don't Negro Students Do Something?

The most depressing fact in many Negro colleges is the utter indifference of the students to their conditions, to the welfare and progress of their race, to the world of knowledge and of art, to the satisfactions of self-development. Many have neither pride nor even self-respect. I can understand this easily, however, now that I have learned of the history and experience of the Negro, and of the terrible emotional handicaps and mental blocks to learning inflicted on young Negroes both by the circumstances of their upbringing and by the Negro collective experience. These are not minor, and many are beyond remedy. Stanley Elkins, in his book Slavery, a Problem in American Intellectual and Institutional Life, has shown the parallel results on the inmates of German concentration camps and on American Negroes during slavery and after. I am deeply upset by the difficulties and unhappiness I see in my own students but have not the training to help them. I am a research physicist by profession. I believe that they could be helped and that the salvaging of the Negro youth should be a prime national target. It needs merely people who will give of themselves, not of their money. The very worst environment for Negro students is exactly the one in which they are now imprisoned by members of their own race.

A Student Petition

One welcome but short-lived flash of light in the dark night of Negro student apathy came this time last year with a Petition, signed by half the students of Virginia State College after an impressive march on the college auditorium. "We are Virginia State College...we...strongly protest but only against what we find to be intolerable...we seek...a better college through a better student body... if we are to improve, then so must the administrative body that governs us" ran the preamble.

The Petition protested in detail eight major areas of grievance: the archaic social regulations, the underpayment (50 cents an hour in most cases) of student workers who had also no court of appeal, the excessive power of the Deans, the large body of college rules and policies not available to the student in writing, inefficiency and discourtesy in the agencies and offices of the administration, the provision of religious facilities for Protestant Christians only, and "those instructors who feel free to lecture on any and everything but the subject...who are habitually tardy..."

The administration, after fairly prompt deliberation, made a minor relaxation in the curfew hours for women; raised the minimum hourly wage-range from 50 cents to 55 cents and agreed to appoint a labor board with student participation; agreed to augment the small student representation on the Student Adjustment Committee; agreed to improve communication but pointed out that students did not however use all the existing channels or make proper use of their own student government; virtually suppressed the free expression of student opinion in their newspaper; refused the plea for religious freedom outright. The administration also agreed to continue to deliberate the problems and report back to the student body in one year. This academic year one hears nothing more from students or administration. The student action in serving the petition did secure a few minor concessions, but their failure to follow it up has thrown away a valuable initiative. This has been a dull year compared with last; we are the college of the :invisible student."

Free Students and Teachers

I came to my college hoping to find that the Negro youth of today was flexing his intellectual muscles and determined to show that the promise of the glories of the Negro past and the fine men the race has already produced was now going to be fulfilled; that they were going to show the world what they were made of, just as are the youth of any other newly-liberated race or nation today. Although I believe strongly in human rights, I felt my contribution was best made by teaching physics to Negro students and doing all I could to further the development of the whole man or woman; others could struggle in the streets but not teach physics. I now find that before I can make educational progress, the environment has to be changed first and the grip of the Negro bourgeoisie power structure in the Negro college has to be broken.

Why not just let such colleges collapse? If they were white, certainly! But in the next 20 years they will still be the only door to education for the majority of Negroes, to whom equality of admission to white colleges is meaningless when fees and entrance requirements are beyond their reach.

The Southern Students Must Act

What can students outside Negro colleges do to help? Make the maximum contact with the students at such colleges, visit, invite, let them know that there is a wider, freer world outside. Try to interest your faculty in helping, because the recruitment of enlightened faculty to Negro colleges is vital. Try to exert pressure on the political or religious authorities who appoint those all powerful Negro college presidents. Enroll in Negro colleges yourself. In all this believe in what you do, expect ingratitude and obstacles, and do it still for your faith in the potential of man, if you can believe in that; or if not, as your honorable share in a dishonorable inherited white-man's debt that is now presented to this white generation for payment.

WHAT'S HAPPENIN'

CHARLOTTESVILLE, VA.

The fabled Harlem Globetrotters are reknowned in the annals of Negro athletics. They have thrilled audiences on five continents, and have been the subject of a motion picture, "Go Man Go." Even before civil rights legislation guaranteed public accomodations, the Trotters frequently toured the South, often playing before segregated crowds.

On March 17 the Globetrotters played in Charlottesville, Va. under the sponsorship of the Student Aid Foundation of the University of Virginia. This was most ironic in light of the Foundation's background. It is a quasi-official entity of U.Va., created for the purpose of soliciting for funds to subsidize inter-collegiate athletics. No Negro schoolboy has ever been awarded an athletic scholarship!

Almost a month prior to the Trotter's visit a student sent a letter to the team's owner, informing him that his Negro athletes would probably not be welcome if they applied to the University of Virginia for athletic scholarships. No response. Then the national office of the NAACP dispatched a wire to the Globetrotter management charging "overt discrimination" at the University. No response from the Trotters. The school, however, denied the charges.

As the day of the game drew near, Students for Social Action, an activist organization, petitioned the administration for permission to demonstrate the night of the performance. Permission was granted! Then, the University President, Edgar Finley Shannon, issued a statement at the request of a student government committee which was investigating the charges of discrimination. Shannon said that the University was committed to equal opportunity in higher education and reminded the athletic department of their obligation to this pledge. He went on to inform them that he would be watching their future efforts to recruit Negro students.

Students for Social Action passed out copies of the Shannon statement the night of the Globetrotter game. By mere luck, one of the athletes was recognized outside the arena. Told of the NAACP telegram to the team's management, he was honestly incredulous, claiming none of his fellow team-mates had been told about it. He, and several other players, were irate that they had not been informed about the situation earlier.

In considering this incident one can see some gains. First, a normally impassive student government, that usually debates the traffic patterns on the campus, took issue on this longstanding problem of racial discrimination. Secondly, the University President committed himself, thereby giving tacit acknowledgement that a basic inequity does exist. But these are small gains, and will seem rather futile unless they lead to more formidable results soon. Some damn the students who have concerned themselves with this subject but without their interest nothing would have been accomplished.

As for the Student Aid Foundation, someone saw them going into the drug store to purchase some salve for their burnt fingers.

PETERSBURG, VA.

On Saturday, March 26th a group of students, teachers, and civil rights workers held a demonstration at the Federal Youth Reformatory near Petersburg, Va. Three conscientious objectors are imprisoned there for refusing to cooperate with the Selective Service System. They are: Tom Rodd, a 19 year old Quaker from Pittsburgh; Gregory Beardall, a member of the Catholic Worker Movement from New York; and Jefferson Keith, a Quaker from Rockville, Md.

A caravan of cars containing 43 people left Virginia State College in Petersburg and converged on the Federal Reformatory at 1:00 p.m. The warden of the prison met the group in front of a barricade blocking the entrance to the area. He told the leaders of the group that they would be held legally responsible if the demonstration caused the prisoners to riot. He permitted them to have a demonstration about 500 yards away, on a little knoll overlooking the prison grounds. The prisoners were in the yard taking a recreational break and watched the demonstration.

David Nolan of the Virginia Students' Civil Rights Committee read a statement calling for an end to the war and an end to the draft. Tom Gardner of the University of Virginia read a statement from Tom Rodd, one of the imprisoned C.O.'s.

The demonstration ended with singing and prayer. There were no incidents or arrests although the F.B.I. had threatened us with arrest several days before if we demonstrated on federal property.

There are conscientious objectors imprisoned at two other southern institutions: Seagoville, Texas, and Fort Hood, Texas.

MOBILE, ALABAMA

There was a freedom walk in Mobile, Ala. demanding an end to segregated schools, inadequate facilities and lack of jobs for Negroes. The marchers also called for an implementation of federal programs in the area on an integrated basis, and the teaching of Negro history in the schools.

Their statement attacked the Mobile Housing Board for "crimes against crippled old ladies, disabled old men, welfare patients and poverty stricken people." They criticized the Mobile Personnel Boards for "crimes against the 'little man' and the unemployed."

The organizer of the freedom walk, Jerry Pogue, was subsequently fired from his teaching job, and he writes: "My family is suffering and employment is impossible to find. Please allow me to know of possible employment in your area." His address is Box 71, Magazine Pt., Ala.

BIRMINGHAM, ALABAMA

SSOC's Southern Folk Festival visited Birmingham, Alabama on April 12. The meeting, sponsored by the Alabama Christian Movement for Human Rights, turned out to be a political rally for Col. Al Lingo, Alabama's public safety director. One of the speakers was Sheriff Jim Clark of Selma. The Folk Tour was just given time on the schedule to provide entertainment. Freedom Singer Bernice Reagon objected to their participating.

GAINESVILLE, FLORIDA

There was a "Speak-Out" against the war in Vietnam on March 25 in Gainesville, Florida. Julian Brown, a graduate of the University of Florida was one of the speakers.

He said: "I come here as a Marine Corps reservist, with nearly four years of enlistment. I come as one who has undergone recruit training at Parris Island and infantry training at Camp Lejeune. And, I come as one who has recently informed the commandant of the Marine Corps that I cannot and will not participate any longer in military service.

"I come with the conviction that the greatest threat to democratic and human values is not military conquest from without or military weakness from within. I come with the conviction that the greatest single threat to democratic and human values is the military itself. The only "educational" system in which our nation has invested for a somewhat equitable distribution of knowledge is military training. And what does military training teach? It teaches that the individual must cease to assume moral responsibility for his actions. Through a continual cycle of passing the buck of moral responsibility to someone in higher authority, the individual avoids confrontation with the reality that he is a hired killer. The individual's identity is usurped as he is taught to look and act like everyone else. He becomes part of an anonymous mob which collectively can commit atrocities that the individual alone would not commit. In short, the individual is taught to desensitize his conscience and to dehumanize his fellow man and himself."

AUSTIN, TEXAS

Free speech movements are "bustin' out all over". At the University of Texas at Austin, the League for Responsible Sexual Freedom was actually recognized as a campus group by the student assembly. However, this display of liberality came to an abrupt end when the League began to distribute literature.

On March 14, students set up a booth to distribute a leaflet drawn up by the League, and were promptly ordered to desist by the Dean. The leaflet advocated (1) an end to anti-miscegenation laws, (2) ar end to prosecution of adultry and fornication, and (3) a lowering of the legal age of consent.

In indignant response that afternoon, "Texas Students For Free Speech" was formed in protest of the administration policy of censorship. 4,000 leaflets were published, and on March 15, 200 to 250 students marched in protest, through the administration building, leafleting as they went. That afternoon a meeting of administration officials, student body officers, and representatives of the League was thrown off campus.

This coincidentally followed a speech given by Texas state Senator Grady Hazelwood to a state convention of policemen in which he stated he would fight to see that the University received no funds until they banned the League.

At present a small ad hoc group of students is preparing a paper on the basic wrongs of censorship, to be submitted to the Board of Regents. Students hope to effect change from within the body, and that the policy will be abolished.

NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE

On Saturday April 16, an intoxicated gentleman stumbled into the SSOC office and asked for some of our literature. After he got a healthy supply of back issues of The New South Student, he introduced himself as head of the Ku Klux Klan. "Hi baby," he said to executive secretary Sue Thrasher, "We're fightin' you and you're fightin' us." He left after inquiring whether the SSOC office had a basement.

A telephone call to his place of business revealed that he was not in because "there are big political doings in Nashville today."

Late that afternoon a phone call was received at the office. The caller told SSOC staffer Ronda Scilley: "You son-of-a-bitch. Are you ready to die over there?"

The next afternoon a call was received at the house. "Hey, are y'all running a whore house over there?" We replied no, and the caller said "Y'all are a bunch of half-breed sons-of-bitches."

TEXAS

Chapters of Students for a Democratic Society are being formed at Texas Christian University, Baylor, St. Mary's in Antonio, New Orleans, Stillwater, Okla., Little Rock, Ark., and Tuscaloosa, Ala. Jeff Shero, SDS campus traveler writes from Texas Western in El Paso: "The place is agitated up. For two days we have had a literature table, huge crowds. Several fellows got punched around yesterday, the literature torn up, the table thrown down. (Ah, the glories of a free society where one can air his beliefs.)"

MISSISSIPPI

The Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party is trying to recruit 200 volunteers to work on their programs this summer. All who are interested should contact: MFDP 802 G Street S.E., Washington, D.C.

MONTGOMERY, ALABAMA

The Southern Courier, a civil rights newspaper published in Alabama is looking for more staff people. They need business people, cartoonists, photographers, and reporters, in that order. Contact Robert Smith, The Southern Courier, 622 Frank Leu Bldg, 79 Commerce St. Montgomery, Alabama, 36104.

NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE

College students from the Nashville area have begun work on a project in the North Nashville Area. They have rented a house and are planning to survey the community's needs in such areas as medicare, recreation, and tutorials. Students will work fulltime this summer.

LABOR CONFERENCE

There is an increasing amount of interest among southern students in labor organizing. At Duke University students have played a key role in organizing a local of campus service employees who are working for recognition from the university. At five or six other colleges students have attempted to work with employees in organizing efforts or have attempted to work within the college framework to better wages and working conditions of campus employees. In other instances students have helped in organizing drives away from campus.

On April 22, 23, and 24, SSOC sponsored a conference on "Students and Labor" at North Carolina College in Durham, North Carolina. About thirty students from eight colleges and universities met with labor representatives and others familiar with the labor movement. There were presentations by labor people with panel reactions which served as background to general discussion of the labor movement in the South.

The most striking thing about the conference was the degree to which students who are in many ways critical of labor and labor representatives were able to discuss in an open way the problems of labor organizing.

In discussing ways for students to relate to labor those at the conference felt that one of the most important areas would be what might be called labor internships to allow students to work with southern organizers over the summer months. SSOC is exploring this area and it is likely that there will be internships for students this summer working primarily in North Carolina. These may be in a variety of situations ranging from university employees in an urban setting to organizing workers in packing houses and textile plants in semi-rural areas. Persons who are interested in this and in the student-labor area generally should write to Gene Guerrero at the SSOC office.

Finding and Making Leaders

by Nicholas von Hoffman

Leaders are found by organizing, and leaders are developed through organization.

The statement is so self-evident and so simple-minded that it is usually uttered only to be assented to and forgotten.

Instead of acting on the assumptions implicit in the observation, we begin the great hunt for the "natural leader", "the indigenous leader"; he is the great organizational nugget, whom we could find by panning for him if we only knew what the hell he looked like, and how he differed from the silt washed into our tin.

It's worth noting that practically everybody is looking for him. The civil rights movement, big business, big social work, church organizations. Everybody finds it handy to blame their problems on expressions like the "dearth of leadership", the "problem we're having finding leaders", etc.

He does not exist. If he were there--that wonderous all-purpose leader that every organizer dreams about in his moments of exasperation with and anger at his would-be constituency, you would not be necessary. The all-purpose indigenous leader with the sharp tactical mind of Lenin, the forensic abilities of Demosthenes or F.D.R., and the general loveableness of your mother would have long since asserted himself.

The quest for the natural leader--the quest as it is actually carried on is like the quest for the natural man. There is no natural man; there is no natural leader. The ideas are important because they remind us in any group of men some can come to live by certain ethics and some can become leaders--given the occasion.

I am hammering at this point because I have seen so many ardent young people run into communities, zoom around frantically for eight or ten months, and then say they can't find any indigenous leadership. Now when it is put to them in so many words that this is what they are doing, they deny it. Nevertheless, it is obvious that they are acting on notions of leadership that are wholly unrealistic.

Let's try and see why. Bear in mind, I am now speaking of the lower class Negro ghetto. In the main the same observations would hold for any community, but in white areas there are certain differences in application.

The first objective in the ghetto is building an organization that wields power. That is in marked contrast to the flash-flood demonstration kind of thing that northern big-shots quickly get blase about. An organization that wields power as opposed to the kind that throws an intermittent stick-bomb, must be big, must be broad, must be quasi-institutionalized.

The kinds of leadership it must have to operate successfully are the kinds that cannot exist in the community because no one or almost no one in the community has had the chance to gain any experience with big organizations. Most of the community's people will not even have been in the army. The few that have will have served in such a low echelon that they will not have had the opportunity to acquire a sense or a feel for the big organization, how it is put together, how it stays together, and what you have to do to run it.

A few people in the community may work for a large corporation or the government but here again they are cut off from gaining experience with the big organization. For another few the church may begin to supply the experience, but most people aren't church members or are very passively so, and most churches aren't very big, and most big churches are not very organizationally run.

The long and short of it is we are speaking of people whose organizations are mostly small, and, consequently, whose leaders are schooled in techniques which work for small groups, but seldom for large ones. If they had the large enduring organizations they would have the leaders to run them, and you would be superfluous.

However, it is also true that every community has a few naturals, that is a few people who by accident of life experience, an exceptional intelligency and some other qualities can begin to move to the forefront almost as soon as the first organizational beginnings are under way. But who are they? How do you find them, and how do you make sure that they actually do begin to assume the major roles they are capable of? It would be so much easier if we could spot these people in advance--unfortunately that is impossible. At the beginning of organization, you are the leader--natural or otherwise--because at least theoretically you know more about what you are doing--building an organization--than anyone else around. If any of these three conditions doesn't hold, by-the-by, get out and give the job over to somebody else.

Recognize the fact that the organizer who comes into the community for the first time is internally in a precarious position. He is afraid--or at least he should be if he has got any brains which he doesn't want beaten out.

He is afraid because he doesn't know the people, and we are all vaguely afraid of people we don't know. If he is white and he is going to work in a Negro community he is doubly afraid. If he is a middle class Negro, he is afraid too, for similar but not quite identical reasons.

He is afraid because he is the bearer of a new idea. Mankind does not cotton to new ideas in general, but especially not to the new ideas that organizers bring. This is so because they may mean trouble and because the organizer's mere presence in the community is a tacit insult. The organizer, merely by his presence, is saying in effect to the people, "You are so dumb that you need me to think your way out of this mess you are in." Don't kid yourself about this. I shouldn't have to remind you here--who have actually organized--of this reaction. (Nor I might add, does blaming the white man or the status quo or anything else absolve the organizer of the sin.)

The organizer is also afraid because a failure is a crashing blow to his ego or his self-respect. Even a bad organizer puts a tremendous part of himself on the line when he goes into a community. In his own eyes, he is being tried as a person, as a huge test of his own worth. To fail is to be adjudged a capon, a sexless, impotent thing by one's self, or so I always found it.

These fears work on most organizers to make them very susceptible to thinking that people they meet in the community who are sympathetic are the people to listen to and work with. I can't count the number of times I have wandered into communities to find the people who were supposed to be building a mass organization mucking around with pious, middle class clergymen or teenagers.

Or, of course, there is theorganizer who sees the weakness in himself, and over-compensates by finding a bunch of social outcasts, usually winos, addicts, or semi-criminal types, the kind that talk a good fight but lack the self-discipline to make hard-core organizational material. This kind of organizer may also be playing to a gallery of middle class friends (often white) who will be mightily impressed by his acquaintance in the demi-monde. It's nice to have one's outside friends think you are "in", but the question is, in what?

For the organizer who gets beyond acting as a reaction to himself--in my experience, few do--plucking out "natural leaders" by dint of casual observation and conversation is very chancy. I recall having picked a number of these on-first-sight-gems, and I also recall spending months kicking myself for having done so.

The guy who is indeed thenatural small group leader may turn out to be the guy who gets hopelessly and permanently confused by committees or simply by having to keep in mind that now instead of dealing with ten old faithfuls in the block club he's got to worry about what 400 people think. The guy you met at the barber shop who seemed so articulate and understanding, may turn out at second meeting to be a dogmatist of the first order or a flannel-couthed idiot. The guy with the big line about how "its about time the black man showed those "m-f's" can turn out to be one great big chicken, or what can be worse yet, a lazy bum who only comes to meetings to make long theatrical monologues.

Those of you who may recognize your own experiences in some of these words will say, "Don't tell us what won't work, tell us what will."

To you I repeat, leaders are found by organizing and leaders are developed through organizations. So let's discuss organizing and organizations.

But before we get to that, I want to set down two of the observations I have made where leadership has developed. They are: the leaders in the third month of an organization's life are seldom the leaders in the third year; a few leaders, ourselves included, are really all-purpose; and the best organizations create a "collective leadership".

Why should so few of the leaders in an organization's infancy be around as it grows to maturity?

The first leadership is usually the closest leadership at hand. It is selected usually in the enthusiasm of the first campaign, because it is available. You don't have a choice and you have to go with what you've got.

It may be a rent strike, a school demonstration, or what have you. Reverend So-and-So says he'll be the spokesman, and you want him because he's a clergyman and you figure he'll cut more ice because he's respectable. Maybe it's Mrs. Jones, because she's the only one of the tenants who shows signs of being able to speak out in front of a judge. Or, perhaps, it's So-and-So else because he has a reputation (with you anyhow) as a regular freedom fighter.

Note that all these people were picked on the basis of what they could do in a one shot affair. And the beginning of every viable organization smacks of being a one shot affair, for the simple reason that theorists who fiddle around waiting and delaying until they've got a full blown across-the-board organizational program se are never ready to commence swinging into action.

But you will notice, too, that the reasons for your picking the first leaders (and you know it's you who pick them) say nothing about how they will wear over a period of time. That respectable clergyman can turn out to be a timid jerk; the lady who was so good at sounding off in front of the judge may be good for nothing else, and that big freedom fighter can look like a vain egomaniac living off the reputation of the deed done many years ago.

The lesson I draw from this is that at the beginning keep the organization very loose, spread the responsibilities and the conspicuous places around. This permits you and the new membership which you are supposed to be recruiting to judge the talent, and it keeps things sufficiently porous so that new talent isn't blocked off. Nothing is more absurd than an organization that's six months old, without a dime in the treasury and a membership that can fit in a Volkswagen, having a cemented-in, piggy leadership. Vested interests are only tolerable when they are protecting something of value, not fancy organizational charts, letterheads and research programs.

Don't laugh. This kind of thing is a clear and present danger. Vain men frequently prefer to be members of obscure executive committees where they can spend years expounding doctrine. It is safer and easier than the realities of making and using power.

Men with the most to lose or men with the most to give in talent, money and experience are often not the first to join an organization. They will never join if they see there is no room for them in the top leadership.

Why should some of the most talented people hang back? One reason, of course, is that they want to check you and the incipient organization out. If they are worth having, they won't be the kind who must be on a guaranteed winner, but also, by the same token, they don't want any part of a born loser.

A big northern city is not like the south. In one sense the people are all in the same boat thanks to skin pigmentation, but not quite. People can and do make a variety of deals with life. In the North there are a lot of Negroes who may have cause to think that they have more to lose than to gain by signing on with you. They will be those who fear loss of jobs, prestige, business or such--and many will fall into that category. But there will also be those who think they can make a better deal by joining with somebody or something else, and those who just may not think what you're driving at is worth it OR that you can deliver goods.

The varieties of reactions have to be tackled in a variety of ways, but all the people who fall into these groupings--your potential second generation of leaders--must not be driven away gratuitously. They must not be allowed to dismiss the organization out of hand at the very beginning.

Yet in fact many organizations are killed off by their organizers even before they get close to a second leadership generation. It is pure charity of course, to speak of such preliminary groupings as organizations at all. Most of these endeavors never grow to look like much more than an aborted six-month foetus. They have been murdered by their own parents, the organizers who were supposed to give them life.

In the case of young organizers, their youth is enough to do it. People may admire youth, they may praise, they may believe that youth is showing the way in which age should follow, but they are very, very reluctant to trust youth with anything of immediate value. Youth is not an insuperable handicap, I rush to add. I have known top-notch organizers in their twenties.

The good ones know, however, that they must pick up more in the way of membership than the people with the least to lose, the people who are willing to put themselves under guidance to unreliable appearing strangers. Beware of the groups led by a couple of college students, composed of a membership of teenagers, ministers without serious institutional responsibilities and a few desperate mothers, driven to trying anything to get their kids into a decent school. Anyone who has been around knows the type of enterprise I am talking about. Yet such is the look of the organizational endeavor which has failed to bud a second generation of leadership; it is also the characteristic profile of the collegiate organizer's botched job. It is as recognizable as the insulated, dessicated organizational product put out by the professional social worker.

At the risk of sounding like mother, may I say that impressions do count. I'll mention clothes. It is one thing to wear overalls in Mississippi where many of the people actually do wear them--it is another to wear them as an occasional stunt in a big northern city, but to indulge in peculiarities of dress and speech simply makes you look like faddists. I apologize for saying this to those of you who know better, but those will also know it has to be said. Faddism makes you look like a horse's ass. White middle class girls from Des Moines, to be extreme about it, did not grow up referring to males as "cats" and when they do it on the south side of Chicago they sound either patronizing or idiotic--take your pick.

Nothing is so reassuring as a person who acts like himself. If you don't know who you are, stay out of organizing until you do and are willing to accept yourself as yourself. When you do, you will find that other people will.

Next, may I urge you to drop as much of your excess ideological baggage as you can outside the place where you are organizing. You are building a power group, a mass organization to serve a particular constituency, one that has certain paramount demands to be met. The demands are remote from "peace" or from any number of other, perhaps laudable, but irrelevant interests.

In other words, don't act like cultists. If you are a vegetarian, keep it to yourself, hide it, because there are a certain number of butchers in the community and you want them in the organization too.

This work demands self-discipline in every way. It means you either get your rest or hide the fact that you haven't because people who arrive at sixes and sevens and announce they haven't slept for 26 consecutive hours give the impression of being unstable. It also means that you recognize that you have no private life, or put differently, you do not offend against the public morals of the community. Why? Not because the morals are necessarily correct, but because organizers who do not seem to be observing them alienate potential members for no good reason.

Some people may read what I have just said and think, "Ah Ha! White man's conventional middle class values--ethnocentrism, etc., etc." To which I reply, these are the public values held by substantial portions of the people you hope to organize.

Whether they practice them is as beside the point as whether middle class whites do. The cultist will say that there can be no surrender and that freedom of the individual is involved. Perhaps it is, but he who wastes time debating such abstractions, or, worse, insists on making it clear by his behavior that he believes otherwise is enjoying a luxury that is organizationally ruinous.

As organizers, apostolic vegetarians can only organize and inspire confidence among other vegetarians.

The best organizers have single track minds. They care only for building the organization. When they alienate a potential member, they do so out of organizational need, not out of the egotism of irrelevant personal values. The best organizers stifle their tastes, their opinions, their private obsessions.

Now at least we have taken a few preliminary precautions to prevent killing off the leadership before it even arrives and we can turn back to the question of finding and developing it.

From what I have seen, most of the organizational life in the ghetto is the small group, usually no bigger than the number of people that make up an extended circle of acquaintance. This usually figures out to twenty-five or less and rarely more than fifty. Numbers that get larger than that have to be held together by different, written, systems of bookkeeping and communication.

Two conclusions can be drawn from this: (1) Building a mass organization in the ghetto is the tedious job of stringing beads on a necklace, and (2) self-evidently, most of the available indigenous leadership will only be practiced in the arts of the small organization.

I have in mind the block club, the local janitors' association, the multitudinous sororities, the choirs, the teenage groupings, the local political and business associations, the perennial members of the local pool tournament. I am sure you can name many more. Everyone of these groupings has some kind of leadership. So the quest for leadership is abruptly over. There is, for practical purposes, no other leadership to be found, because there exist no vehicles for leadership to drive.

What this boils down to, then, is your discontent with what the leadership can do--namely, lead the groupings you find in the community. Your dissatisfaction with the leadership has real enough basis in fact. It is a narrow leadership mostly interested in what concerns the small group; it has little save only the most conventional understanding of the great issues which brought you into the community in the first place.

Great issues absorb the interest either of small highly specialized groups, as for instance many a chapter of SANE or CORE or the NAACP, or of a great organization. The small group can make mischief and propagandize in a diffuse way, but power, power is the property of the big organization. All this you know, for it again is what brings you to the community.

At every turn, the leadership is unsuited for your purposes. And so it will remain, changing only as the big organization emerges. The same holds true for the leadership you "find", that is, people who enter the organization without a following, but create one in and by means of the organization. The character of leadership, to put it in other words, is determined by the character of the organization that trains it and which it leads. The making of an organization and the making of leadership are inseparable.

The proposition is not presented to you as a new great truth. It is no more than another application of the ancient observation that a man finds both his limits and his growth in his own personal experience. I have the temerity to advance this old bromide yet one more time, because it is often ignored. The fact that you are still thinking of leadership as an isolated category, one meriting its own workshop, shows how far people are from treating the leadership question as integral to the making of an organization.

This said, we can now spend some time talking about organizing as it fits into leadership.

The organizer's first job is to organize, not right wrongs, not avenge injustice, not to win the battle for freedom. That is the task of people who will accomplish it through the organization if it ever gets built. When things are looked at through the glass of organizational calculation, they assume new shapes.

A couple of examples may help to explain my meaning:

1. When the cops pick up a whore, shake her down and beat up her pimp, they have done wrong. Both the whore and pimp have rights, which have been grossly violated, but a thinking organizer may wonder how good an idea it is to commit his new group to their defense. What will the public at large say? More important, what will the different segments of the community say?

   The caballeros on the street hustling will love you, but what about the solid family types? Should the solid family types be taught the relativity of all human values, and will they consent to learn? Six months from now, will the caballeros think enough of the organization to support it by coming to one meeting, by contributing one dollar?

2. Rent strikes. They are very popular now, but as with leadership, they are seen as something that is good to do merely if you can do them. However, as anybody who has ever run one can tell you, they gobble up an organizer's time--which should be a valued asset--and may produce very few organizational dividends.

How might an organizer look at a rent strike proposition? (I am spinning this example out to illustrate the mentality which we might call organizational calculation.)

Of course he looks at the building. He does this for two reasons--the first is defensive; he wants to make sure the tenants aren't lying to him. Who doesn't think his landlord is a louse? Nothing is worse than getting into a fight in which the enemy can publicly prove your facts are wrong--note I said publicly prove.

The second reason he looks is to see how the building will photograph and will strike the eye of the often not very sympathetic press. I recall once having an argument with a photographer from the Saturday Evening Post as to whether a dead rodent in a slum building was a rat or a mouse. In short, the rats should look like rats.

If it still appears that a strike is feasible, he must ask what it will do for the organization. I will list a few possible things it might do, again by way of illustrating the organizational mentality.

1. If the political climate is right and you know local government is with you, it may provide a quickie victory--something every organization needs on occasion.

2. It can be a device to show people via face to face confrontation that a big, important white man like a slum landlord can be humiliated and beaten.

3. It may be a way to force a municipal government to begin rigorous enforcement of minimal housing standards.

4. It may be useful in building up general organizational cohesion. I recall one rent strike during which the landlord retaliated by such tactics as failing to buy coal for the building. The organization responded in its turn by taking a portion of the sequestered rents to buy coal. The coal truck was decorated with appropriate signs; the gentleman from the teamsters union who customarily drove the truck was replaced by several local leaders in the cab, while other people from the organization surrounded it as it paraded around the neighborhood before finally coming to its destination. Humor, color, the relish of a small triumph and greater organizational solidity came out of this little episode.

5. The strike may also be a useful method for organizing the people in the immediate locals around the building in question. Unless you have all of officialdom on your side, a rent strike is liable to be a protracted contest of nasty little surprises which each side springs on the other. The landlord's surprises are usually legal ones, bailiffs, court orders, etc. If the whole area is mobilized and organized into a big warning system, the landlord can't pull off much.

   But if the fight is really you and a few tenants versus the landlord in the midst of an indifferent populace, you are likely to invest hundreds of hours of time keeping the tenants morale up, with little to show for it but some publicity.

There are other reasons, good organizational reasons, for having rent strikes, but the point to bear in mind is having some reason other than the pure injustice of it all. It is, of course, very hard for an organizer to know when he has a valid reason for doing something, and when he is conning himself.

By nature most organizers are optimists--they have to be or they wouldn't be doing what they do. Optimists tend to be credulous. They get so fascinated by the putative advantages of a proposed line of action they never seriously examine either its drawbacks, or--and this is just as important--how they might be better spending their time.

I found in my own experience that my ego was incessantly trying to sabotage my judgment. For instance, I would argue in favor of striking a slum on the basis of organizational advantage without ever realizing that actually I was in a rage over the conditions the people in the building were living in. A good organizer cannot afford to vent his anger, anymore than he can use his position to push miscellaneously irrelevant pet social beliefs.

The ego works in other ways to deform the organizer's powers of judgment. Promising young organizers are prone to come up with clever ideas--and in their pride of invention, or in the egotism of mischief-making, to attempt to carry them out in circumstances that are neither propitious no even apropos.

The calculating organizer is forever suspicious of himself, forever mistrusting his analysis of the situation, and his plan of action. He is always asking himself questions like, "What am I doing? Why am I doing it? What if I succeed in doing what I am trying to do, will we really have gained anything worth gaining?" However, the organizer with a calculating mentality shall assuredly fail if he is trying to do the undoable.

What is an attainable organization in the working class ghetto? It is an organization of perhaps two percent of the people. Those who talk about organizing "all the people" or "the masses" or "the great majority of the people" are talking unrealizable balderdash.

In the first place, it cannot be done. The only way all the people or most of the people can be organized is by drafting them into the army. On the rare occasions when large percentages of a population are directly "participating" in the affairs of the community, they are probably having a riot. But this form of mass participation--I use the word that is fashionable--hardly gains much. Moreover, if you stop and reflect a second, you will see that any non-governmental organization comprising huge portions of the population would be so completely unwieldy that it could never achieve anything.

The purpose of organizations is, I remind you, at least in this discussion, power. As a practical matter, the organizing of two percent of the population is more than sufficient for the purpose of power. This you know from the history of modern revolutions--or if you look around, from the composition of the most effective present-day political machines. Indeed, even two percent of a population actively in an organization is an immensely formidable number. With two percent of a district's population closely organized, the organization should have an unbreakable control over things.

When the problem is viewed this way, it becomes more manageable intellectually and actually. To begin with, it now becomes possible to see where are the plausible places to start organizing and to sort out what elements in the community demand organizational attention and which are purely optional, to be courted provided the occasion arises and you have the time.

An organization needs three things: (1) A network of people spread out and in position to reach and mobilize the inert majority; (2) Continuity, and (3) Money.

The majority of small groups in the ghetto districts I am familiar with turn out to be potentially strongest in one of these three qualities. Thus a block club adds a good deal to the mobilization network, has some money potential, but is usually quite low in supplying continuity. The same can be said of the sorority or the poolroom gang, while a business group scores higher on the money and may bolster an organization's continuity.

Obviously, what is needed is the right mix of groupings to make up the sinews of organization. Sometimes this is accomplished by finding what the textbooks call the most common denominator. But the catch is, the most common denominator evokes the least general interest. Everybody is against juvenile delinquency, but who cares enough about it to do anything? An issue which lines a whole community up on one side is most often so innocuous as to be organizationally useless.

There is an exception to this, and that is the outrage, the atrocity, the bad slum fire, rat-bites-child, bombing the Sunday school. However, such crises are of limited organizational value. The shock and anger they cause are soon dissipated. Furthermore, they are of much greater value to an existing organization than they are to building an organization.

Where an organization exists, the emotion the momentary crisis causes to be released can be harnessed to well-thought out political maneuvers and demonstrations; it can also be exploited for money raising and recruiting in sections of the district where you are organizationally weak. But where there is no organization, there is no way to capitalize on the opportunity. There may be a few indignation meetings, or even a riot, and then all collapses back into its previous shape.

The foregoing should suggest that the right balance of network, continuity and money is engendered by an organizational program containing a balance or mix of goals or would-be pay-offs (which organizationally is all that a goal is) for the various groupings you need to recruit. For homeowners the program may be defense against venal building inspectors, for the unemployed it may be pressure on some well-known local firm that discriminates, for the church group or local civil rights sentiment, it may be some sort of an assault on the local educational system. Hence, it has been said that organizing of this nature is, at least in part, building up a community-wide set of interlocking log-rolling agreements: "You scratch my back and I'll scratch yours, but if we don't combine, nobody's back'll get scratched."

Purists may find such a procedure intolerable. For example, you don't put pressure on the white small store owner past a certain point--even if he can hire an extra Negro clerk. The reason is you need his money which you will get if he fears you, but not if he hates you. You will also get his money, I hasten to add, if the organization's program includes objectives that are worth something to him. Purists will find many, many of the things the individuals and groups which you are courting want, to be picayune. Yet these "picayune" wants are the stuff of which organizations are built. They are the things that must of necessity most occupy people and which move people to action as great abstractions seldom do. Moreover, it is by meeting through organizational conquest the picayune demands that the great issues are made immediate and divested of their abstract distance. The mother learns about segregated education by fighting for school books for her child, the home-owner struggling with urban renewal learns about the society's huge engine of residential segregation by battling to save his property--the people learn these lessons and the most important lesson about how the world that bears down on them actually functions. However, the organizer is there to draw the lesson, to make the experience valuable, to lead on into the next and larger round in this match which will only be won by those adaptable enough to use victorious methods.

The organizer who merely sees the people's day-to-day problems as the proof that oppression demeans men, and not as the chance to be exploited, lacks the patience, the ingenuity and the opportunism that makes success. The I-can't-be-bothered-with-that attitude is self-important, and the organizer who is mostly concerned with "big issues" will never meet success outside the debate room.

Again, I am speaking of the ability to see with calculation and act with calculation. It is not easy, particularly once you have sensitized yourself to the importance of little favors, little worries, little preoccupations, to know which are the organizationally useful ones and which are heart-rending but profitless. I remember a newly founded organization that was offered several thousand dollars worth of Christmas baskets by a group of terrified local businessmen hoping to placate the popular wrath. First we battled with the local sufferers-for-humanity about putting whiskey in the baskets. They wanted to money spent on extras for the children. After that we argued over who should get the baskets. They wanted to give them to the needy! The organizers wanted to give them to the strategic, the flat janitors and other key people whom it is good to have obligated to the organization.

If I may, I would like to advert to the stringing of beads on the necklace one more time. The beads, it turns out, are not all of one shape and color. They are a variety, and as you pick them out and string them, the necklace will have a correspondingly different pattern.

The bead analogy holds with leadership also. Too many money beads--that is organizations brought in primarily for the dough they can contribute--and you will find yourself with a lot of money, but a soggy, conservative leadership. Too little money, too many youth groups, and you will get an organization that's always broke, that's short on continuity, and always undertaking more than its organizational base can carry out.

A big organization demands a variety of leadership talents. Money raising leadership, oratorical leadership, tactical leadership, leadership for routine, leadership that can measure community sentiment, that knows when to move and when to stay put. The different kinds of groups that come into your organization train up their natural leaders with greater skills in one area than in another. You need them all, and for that reason, I spoke earlier about collective leadership. It is just unrealistic to expect a big organization to produce more than a few all-purpose leaders who can perform most of the various leadership tasks exceptionally well.

When you do find the all-purpose leader, you would do well to beware of him. More often than not his domination leads to organizational despotism. And it is nice to think that social change can be more than the replacement of undesirable despots with more commodious ones. I confess, though, this may not be the lesson which history teaches.

I have an addendum. It concerns the use of white organizers, and I bring it up because it is obvious to you and to me that the growth of black nationalist sentiment has put a lot of them on the hot seat.

Like it or not, white men have their uses. Organizationally, an astute pretty white boy with an ivy league manner can run circles around anybody else in certain kinds of highly proper middle class situations. White organizers can be useful in dampening the often destructive battle for prominence that has wrecked many a promising Negro endeavor. Remember, your white organizer has no political future in the ghetto, therefore he can be used as neutral absorbent material for out-of-control ambitions which are emitting dangerous rays. The white organizer sometimes can be a reassurance when making deals with outside white groups--and I hope there is no one here in such a retarded political babyhood as to think such deals are not necessary.

On the other hand, it grates in this time of rising independence to see the old dependence on whites--to see the old razzamatazz of whites leading Negroes. But for the good organizer, this should be no problem because the good organizer should never--or virtually never--make a public speech, never get his name in the paper, never enjoy any formal authority in the organization. The big deal organizer who becomes a figure in his own right was never serious about developing leadership. He is the man who always meant to be the leader himself; when this type asks how do we find an indigenous leadership, you can translate his words to mean, "How do I get myself a personal following?"

The good organizer is the self-effacing mentor who judges his work a success when he can leave the organization without even being missed. He is rare, rarer than first-rate leadership, but he exists and he comes in a variety of colors and he can work in almost any situation.

THE FAILURE OF FEDERAL PROGRAMS IN THE BLACK BELT

by J. V. Henry

The automatic response of some people in the civil rights movement to the poverty of Negros in the Black Belt is to say, "We need to get some federal programs in here." A more considered response would be to analyze the programs that operate in the South now, and to find out why they don't reach these people. First of all, most "Federal" programs are not really operated by the federal government. The federal government gives the money to the state, and then the state operates a program in line with the federal conditions. Usually, the states have to contribute their own funds to support part of the program.

What does this mean to the South? Southern legislatures are not known for their generosity in the field of social welfare (with the possible exception of Louisiana in some programs). The Southern states do not have a great deal of funds to expend in support of the programs. So, programs like welfare don't really help the people who need it. A mother with one child on AFDC welfare in Mississippi typically gets about $8.88 each week to provide for the family needs, if she has no other source of income.

Another reason that federal programs have failed to reach Negros in the Black Belt is that Negros have no effective say-so in the administration of the programs. There is overt discrimination in many programs. This is forbidden by Title VI of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, but the federal agencies have taken a very passive stand on putting the law into effect. Also the people don't know how to complain about this discrimination in a way that will be effective.

The 1964 Summer Project put many volunteers in Mississippi with the sole purpose of doing something about the federal program problems there. This had in most cases, absolutely no effect. If complaints were made to Washington, they were referred to the Jackson office for investigation. Most of them disappeared into the circular file there. This procedure has been somewhat improved but the difficulty of ever getting some effective enforcement of TitleVI persists.

Some programs don't reach most Negros in the Black Belt because most Negros in the Black Belt are poor. These programs are not really designed to help the poor. For example, in some Mississippi Delta counties, the white schools get twelve times as much money in federal school lunch funds as the Negro school. This is not overt discrimination. This is simply because the funds go to the schools where the students can afford to participate in the programs and the students at the Negro school are mostly poor, the whites get a larger subsidy for their school lunch program.

Another program which provides an example of the failure is the Hill-Burton hospital construction program. Hospitals are good, the response goes, and if we help build hospitals, they will help people. So the federal funds went in, over $2 billion nationally. In the South they went in to Jim Crow hospitals. They built facilities with all-white staffs or all Negro-staffs. The NAACP has filed complaints about 235 of these hospitals, but the Department of Health, Education and Welfare has refused to take serious action about one.

Even more relevant to the problems of poverty, the funds went into hospitals which were built for the prosperous America of today. In most of the counties, the people are not concerned about the racial segregation that puts Negros on one floor and whites on the other floor, or lets white doctors on the staff of the hospitals, while Negro doctors are admitted only as associates. The people are concerned about the economic segregation that lets middle-class people in the hospital, while Negros who are poor are turned away from the admissions office to seek their care wherever they can find it. A hugh number of Negro children are born each year, delivered by midwives in the mother's home. This is certainly one of the largest factors in the huge infant mortality rate for Negros in the South. It is higher than that of any "developed" country. The only other ethnic group having such a high mortality rate is the Indians, and theirs is high for similar reasons.

It is obvious that a family with an income of less than $1500 annually cannot afford the vast luxury of medical care in a hospital where bills run $30 or more daily. Thus, economic segregation leads to physical separation. Even if Title VI were perfectly enforced, there would be a ghetto of those unable to afford the "right" to be hospitalized in the "white" hospital.

Another example of how economic segregation leads to white supremacy in Federal programs is in the Department of Agriculture. There is a great deal of money available for farmers to borrow to purchase or improve their farms. Even if the county committee (which has a virtual veto power over the loan is granted or not) was color blind to every applicant, the regulations favor those farmers who are already running profitable operations. The subistence farmer, and this includes most Negro farmers in the South, is unable to obtain the loan to bring him up to his level, because he isn't there already.

The fact that Title VI gives the Secretaries discretion to grant or withhold the federal funds if there is racial discrimination leads to further problems. The power is perverted for partisan political purposes. The National Democratic Party has by no means given up its hopes of regaining the Deep South. This power can be used to pull the states back into line. The most obvious use of this weakness was revealed when the Office of Education held up federal aid to education funds for the Chicago schools, because of the Willis ghettoization of the school system. Mayor Daley made a phone call to the President. Half an hour later, the funds were on their way, and Consensus reigned again.

If the state or local recipient wants to get federal funds, they must sign a contract called an "Assurance of Compliance" with the federal nondiscrimination regulations. Most recipients signed these, and the federal departments will proudly exhibit them if any question comes up. But there is not any follow-up investigation in most cases. It's as if the most flagrant boozers in town were allowed to join the WCTU if only they would sign the pledge. Backsliders are ignored.

The departments complain that they don't have the personnel to investigate abuses of the funds which they grant. There is also the problem of a single state agency administering fifteen of twenty federal programs. If they are investigated by one department, and are in compliance with that department's program, there is often no check of the remaining programs.

The only cut-off funds activity which is currently underway for an existing program is the Alabama welfare program. Administrative review has been going on for seven months. Further review in the courts could take up to a year . This is in the face of the Alabama Department of Welfare to sign an Assurance.

The Office of Economic Opportunity has been insisting that all local poverty committees be racially integrated. It also requires something called "maximum feasible participation of the poor" , the subject of much controversy in the North as well as in the South. These requirements do not solve the problem of white power structure domination, but they give Negros and the poor some hope. As a means of implementing the non-discrimination clause of Title VI, the federal agencies could insert such requirements into all programs.

If we're serious about democracy and equality, why shouldn't Gardener Joe have a voice on the Board of Directors of the hospital? If the school board is elected, but Negros are not allowed to vote, then how can federal funds go to support this denial of the franchise? If we are serious about helping the poor, then why don't we amend the school lunch program to give poor schools the same benefits as the rich schools? Why not demand that county committees include Negros and representatives of the subsistence farmer?

These questions won't be answered at the conference. They won't be answered at any conference. The demands should be made, though. The real place to make the changes is in the Black Belt itself. The reigns of power must be obtained by the people, by the vote and by concentrated organizing to build a meaningful power bloc which can demand help of the intense and meaningful kind which is needed.

The Survey and Community Organization

Nick Egleson

This paper is based on surveys taken one summer in Cambridge, Maryland, and one fall in Chester, Pennsylvania. The information from Cambridge was not tabulated until just before the project disbanded in late August, and the information from Chester has not yet been compiled. Yet both surveys contributed immeasurably to the community organization programs of which they were a part. That is the theme of this paper. The indirect more than the direct results of a survey can make it an important link in the process of organizing a community.

A survey can perform four functions. It can supply accurate statistical information. It can provide a way of making contacts within a community. It can furnish informal knowledge of an area of a variety which cannot be tabulated, but which is organizationally useful. It can educate the canvassers.

(1) The direct statistical results speak for themselves, except for two words of caution. In all but the rarest cases it is possible to estimate on the basis of informal conversations what the results of surveying will be. This is particularly true of basic needs and of attitudes. A survey is not necessary to decide whether or not housing is substandard or the community is upset about the scarcity of jobs. From the point of view of community organization and action on a problem, it is far more important to find and to implement methods of improving housing conditions than to establish with certainty the number of overcrowded rooms, broken sinks, and non-functioning toilets. The length of time needed to collect and tabulate information necessitates the second word of caution. Unless the project is of long duration, or the number of people surveyed very small, the results of the survey will not be ready in time to be of any use.

Perhaps two examples to illustrate these points will be helpful. (a) Before we had canvassed three hundred of the twenty seven thousand Negroes in Chester, we had found an issue for a first attempt at organization. Working closely with three residents of the community, it was not difficult to determine that the poor conditions at one of the elementary schools could form a focal point with wide and immediate appeal. We canvassed the surrounding area and the results verified our guess. The Franklin School became the first issue of demonstrations in Chester. (b) After a week in Cambridge, we theorized from casual conversations and observations that any man who passed twenty would leave the jobless town as soon as he could raise the money and find a way. Three months later when we tabulated the results of a 50% sample survey, this hunch was clearly substantiated. The population broken down by ages followed roughly the normal curve until age 20, and then dipped to a low at 28 before rising slowly back to the normal line.

(2) The canvassers who went from door to door in Cambridge and Chester did not just ask their questions and leave. Whenever they could, they stayed to talk at length and some of the contacts they made came to play an active part in the organization. In an unfamiliar or completely unorganized area, these people would be the starting contacts. The conversation may be about the bombings in Birmingham, the way to fix a sink, or the platform of a local committeeman, and the intended ten minute interview may stretch to an hour, the time is never poorly spent.

(3) If these informal conversations in the course of the survey provide a way to find information which could not be asked for by a routine questionnaire, and which would not be useful for tabulation. In Chester through this method, we learned that an eighteen square block area was threatened with razing to make way of the local political organization or machine is not printed anywhere. Only the community's residents know the unofficial leaders of the community.

(4) The survey serves its fourth function by educating those who conduct it. People are forced to learn. Two days in the field going door-to-door can tell the conditions better and more honestly than many well-chosen words. And people are forced to think. Each canvasser has gathered only a small share of the information, and the shares must be pooled and analyzed. Each person has had slightly different experiences; these must be compared.

Yet one does not need specialized knowledge to set up a survey, nor previous experience to run it. In this respect, it is an ideal initial project for a new group or campus organization.

Statistics, contacts, indirect information, and experience are the four functions of the survey. I have divided the remainder of this paper into five sections, each one dealing with specific methods or problems in running a survey. These are: (a) Which questions to ask, (b) How to choose a sample, (c) How to ask questions, (d) Notation and card layout, (e) Tabulation of results.

Which Questions to Ask

A facsimile reproduction of the cards used in Cambridge and Chester is attached at the end of this paper, and will serve as a list of the questions asked. These lists will, of course, have to be varied to fit different situations. As an indication of why we chose certain questions, here follows a rationalization of the questions asked on the Cambridge forms.

Address: To assure an even and thorough distribution of samples, and so that we could locate again the interested people.

Name: To locate interested people. Very few people were reluctant to give their name, in spite of the fact that we asked some questions which middle class people might consider controversial or personal. In all our survey work, we found this openness typical of the lower class community, and attribute it in part to the fact that there is little status motivation within it.

Relation to head of household: We had assumed that the woman often served as the acting head of the household, and sometimes the titular one, even when a man was still part of the family. We wanted to prove or disprove this assumption. It was also useful in determining how many heads of households held full-time work, as opposed to other adults.

Birthplace: We asked this to get an idea of mobility patterns. For Cambridge, Maryland, the possible answers were: Cambridge, elsewhere in Dorchester County, elsewhere in Maryland, and out-of-state.

Registration: We were conducting voter registration drives in the city, and tried to tabulate this information early and use the list of the unregistered people to facilitate the drive.

Schooling: In particular we were interested in finding how many people were working below their educational level, and how many children were completing school.

Opinion of CNAC: (Cambridge Nonviolent Action Committee) was the organization for which we worked. We found many people reluctant to rate one demand in the movement's program above another. All seemed important to them.

Boycott: CNAC had called a boycott of the downtown stores in Cambridge, and we were trying to gauge the extent of participation.

Housing, Employment and Income: Here again few people hesitated to give the information; they did not consider it confidential. We had considerable trouble, however, getting accurate information on income, because few people at this low income level kept any records at all.

We did not try any systematic approach to the informal conversations, and tried only to make each one as informative as possible. Many people in the communities in which we worked had never had an opportunity to generalize their feelings about the conditions in which they lived. If asked if anything were wrong with the schools they would shrug and say no, but they might register strong complaints if asked specifically about the playgrounds at the schools, or the distance their children had to walk to them. Few of these people have had a chance to compare their condition to conditions elsewhere, and often they fail to make judgements for want of a comparative standard. No one will know to complain of 40 children per classroom if they have not had contact with other conditions. These remarks lead to two conclusions: the canvasser will get the most interested response in talking about specific problems of the community (instead of general conditions or possible solutions), and he must be careful to pursue each issue to the full (even when this is not the most rigorous sociological approach).

How to Ask Questions

Although the preceding remarks apply as well to the methods of asking as to the questions themselves, it would not be too helpful to set down a list of rules on how to ask questions. Instead, the practice of talking about and comparing techniques after several days of field work will do much to develop sound approaches to canvassing.

How to Choose a Sample

Cambridge had a Negro population of 4000. Although we aimed at first for a 100% sample, we retrenched towards the end of the summer and canvassed fifty percent of every street. In Chester, we attempted to hit one family in four. If you are striving for a high degree of statistical accuracy, several factors must be taken into account. Without a master street list giving every apartment as well as every house (this can sometimes be obtained from the post office, sometimes from the Chamber of Commerce or the local board of realitors) it is difficult to determine whether or not you have hit the target percentage accurately. The time of day when most surveying is done is also likely to affect the sample. A survey taken mainly during daylight hours tends to miss those people who have to work, and therefore lowers the percentage of single adult families. It also means that most of the information on salaries and income is second hand, since the person earning is away at work. The season makes a difference, particularly where seasonal employment is high. We found that the data on employed-unemployed from the Cambridge survey was almost useless because of this factor. We did not date the cards in the Cambridge survey which was an error.

Geographical distribution is perhaps a still bigger factor in the accuracy of a sample. A 20% sample from the northern end of the Chester ghetto would differ considerably from one at the southern end. We tried at first in Cambridge to get the requisite sample (50%) from every street, but even this proved somewhat unsatisfactory.

Notation and Card Layout

Even with the uncrowded layout of the Cambridge form (see appendix) we found that different copies used different shorthands for noting answers. Discussions about the notations, and perhaps a trial tabulation of the first few hundred cards should take care of this problem. Canvassers should put their initials on each card they do.

Aside from the increase in the amount of information requested, the major difference between the Cambridge and the Chester forms is the practice in the later Chester version, of putting a whole family on a card instead of just one person. Since we collected relatively little information about children sixteen and under the one card per person unnecessarily increased the number of forms, and, in addition, meant that the tabulation had to be done in three separate stages. We have not attempted it yet, but we hope that the Chester cards will eliminate the first step in tabulation.

The Cambridge forms were printed on a mimeograph machine, using standard five by seven cards. Because of need for greater clarity in the tighter Chester forms, we printed them on offset. Using the same stock, the cost for an initial run of 5000 was $35.

Tabulation of Results

The first step in tabulation was to give each card a code number of seven digits. The first two denoted the street--Pine Street was 34. The next three told the apartment number--say 009. And the last two told the number of members in the family--03. Thus the code number for all the cards belonging to the family of three at 9 Pine Street was 34-009-03. All the cards were then arranged in order, and checked against street lists to make sure we had the required sample from each street, and a fairly even distribution within the street.

The second step involved transferring the information from the individual cards to master lists, of the form illustrated in diagram 3, appendix. Each sheet of the master list contained the information from nearly thirty cards, in the coded form explained in part 4 of the appendix. Since all the information now appeared in parallel columns, correlations and cross-correlations involving two variables were relatively easily compiled. It is this step which we hope will be eliminated by the more compact Chester forms.

Step three, the tabulation, took two-man teams. One person called off a statistic (an age) or a cross correlation (the number of heads of families in income category four) and another took down the figures and kept count. When it was needed, we added the totals from each sheet, and did the sums for the averages on a cash register which we borrowed for the occasion.

It took eight of us working part time for ten days to do 31 tabulations from 2049 cards. This work did not have the same qualities as direct community field work, but taught us much about statistics and about the town. To have the same work done by computer would have cost approximately $175. As some indication of the results which can come out of such a survey, I have given a list of the various types of correlations in the fifth section of the appendix.

The formal information from the survey, together with the informal information from canvassing and other work in the community, was compiled in a 74 page report titled The Negro Ward of Cambridge Maryland: A Study in Social Change. An abridged version of the report will be available from the national office of SDS (119 Fifth Avenue, NYC) in the near future. Copies on loan and more information can be obtained by writing the Swarthmore Political Action Club, Swarthmore College, Swarthmore, Pennsylvania.

The survey is a beginning technique for organization. Within the community, it can provide information, both direct and indirect, and a first line of communication with people. For the canvassers, it can provide a first understanding of the actual conditions of a community, opportunity for thinking about and acting upon these conditions.

THE SOUTH AS AN UNDERDEVELOPED COUNTRY

by Robb Burlage

The last three decades in Dixie have moved the plantation economy clearly into the 20th century industrial world. The South, though a step-child, is a full-fledged member of the national economy. Fifty years later than the North, its urban areas have tipped the balance over the rural, though in values, traditions, and politics the battle has not been completely won. Perhaps fifty years later than the North, the crest of the industrial revolution has hit the South. The "New South" which Henry Grady heralded in the 1880's appears to be at hand.

To miss the dynamic aspects of the rise in average per capita income, manufacturing, employment, urban population, regional bank assets, and agricultural productivity (an "agricultural revolution" has swept the South as well as a manufacturing one, emphasizing capital-intensive large units and fewer and fewer individual farmers producing more and more total product) would be a serious mistake.

On the other hand, to refer glowingly to the "New South" as a thing completed or merely a matter of more incremental growth is to avoid serious problems that make the South, as it was in the '30's, the nation's number one economic problem.

According to the usual criterion of per capita income, the South has made heartening progress in the last three decades--from 50% to about 75% of the national average. However, this is only "three fourths American" and this figure in itself can be misleading. The urban Negro, the rural resident--white and Negro, and the people of "depressed areas" such as the Southern Appalachian region are generally below this figure. Many urban whites, on the other hand, are close to the national average.

The Negro is still the automatic lower class of the South despite some strides in improvement of educational and employment opportunities. The estimated average per capita income of the Negro in the South is less than $1000; for all other Southerners it is about $1500. The "place" of the Negro today, though more mobile socially and geographically than before, is most uncertain in the Southern economy. The Negro was the "technology of Southern agriculture for almost three centuries." The slave Negro-machine gave the South the edge in production and wealth over the rest of the nation for almost two centuries. It was the catching-up which the North has made with the non-human machines that gave Northern industrialism its victory over the agrarian South, which despite its cotton gin was the machinery of production to one which uses him as a skilled operator of the machinery of production has been the hardest task of Southern development.

The Negro, given a new image of life by the military, national communication media, and a slightly greater buying power, has felt the squeeze of being on the margin of the Southern economy and has led the stream of outmigration during the last two decades. More than one and one-half million Negroes left the South between 1950 and 1960. This trend is cheered by some Southerners who see a lessening of "racial tension" as the South's percentage of Negroes goes down to below half of the nation, but it is also a net loss as productive potential and as a market for the regional product. American merchandisers have just begun to realize that the "Negro market" is larger than the total Canadian economy. The Negro is beginning to self-realize his economic power as reflected in the Montgomery bus strike, the sit-ins, the Philadelphia "selective buying" campaign, etc. Meanwhile, the irrationality of segregation and the whole white supremacist tradition limit and scar progress in the South.

An urban-industrial complex like Birmingham, for instance, hulking part of the economic "New South" has become a scene of violence, has closed its city parks to avoid an integration order, has cut off its welfare relief (95% Negro) in retaliation against a Negro buying boycott, has fallen into irrational city politics at the hands of racists, and remains enslaved in the impasse between racist tradition and economic progress. Some Southerners still hold to the idea that both white supremacy and industrialism can be attained. The front-running candidate in the Alabama gubernatorial primary has pledged to go to jail to avoid integration and to get an industrial plant in every county. It is not necessarily so that industrialism is impossible with racism; Hitler proved that.

Despite an increase in population in the Deep South during the last decade, in all states except Florida more people left than came in. Besides, the large Negro outmigration, a great number of skilled and educated young persons of both races left the region after scarce regional resources had been spent on their training.

Another trend has been the shift in population from the economically overcrowded farms to the city. In the six states of Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, Tennessee, for instance, 80% of the counties had more people leave than came in between 1950 and 1955. There has been a "population explosion" in the metropolitan areas, but the cities have not coped with their new population very effectively. The "urban tenant" is more helpless and more in need of higher levels of income than the "rural tenant". Welfare, medical, and re-employment programs have been sparce. Housing and community development programs have lagged critically. Three Southern states--Florida, Louisiana, and South Carolina--don't even allow urban renewal. In other cases the programs turn into "Negro removal" projects without adequate provisions for resettlement. Large metropolitan areas are becoming increasingly segregated as whites scamper to the political and fiscal irresponsibility of the suburbs and the Negro and low income whites are left to the shrinking, blighted "central city" with no place else to go. It is interesting to note that in Atlanta Negroes comprise one-third of the population, but are able to occupy only one-sixth of the residential land. More than half a million blighted houses are reported in the 1959 Census of the six-state Atlanta Federal Reserve district.

Southern agriculture is still the largest problem area. More than three-fourths of the farms in the South are less than 23 acres (only 5% more than 100 acres). One half of the nation's farm families live in the South, yet only one third of the nation's farm product is from that region. Net income per family in the South is less than two-thirds of that of farm families outside. Forty-seven of the fifty-one economic areas in the United States with median farm family income less than $1000 are in the South. The South has only 13% of the commercial farms in the nation, but 70% of the commercial farms with less than 2500 income. Definite progress has been made in developing larger, more viable farm units; livestock and a variety of cash crops have supplanted King Cotton; fertilizers, hybrid seeds, scientific conservation measures, and mechanization have all contributed larger income potential. But thousands of marginal farmers, tenants and freeholds, are stranded in rural areas without any prospect of betterment. Even more unfortunate are the uprooted migrant workers who are helping in the South. Better education is needed (less than one-third of farm children make it to college in the South), more credit for large productive farm units should be made available, and well-planned programs of outmigration should be carried out. Of course, America's policies toward world use of agricultural abundance must change as well.

The "industrial mix" of the South is still rather "soft", featuring the natural resource-use industries of textiles, lumber, and food processing. Chemicals, heavy manufacturing, electronics, and other high-technology plants are relatively shy of the South, often because of a lack of skilled workers. Industrial wages have been rising but are still considerably below natural scales. Unionization has been beaten down since the late 19th century in the South by use of race intimidation and outright violence and social pressure, as well as local and state "right-to-work"-type laws. Thus democratic participation of workers in the economic decision-making lags as well. The nearest thing to economic decision-making in the economic sphere is in the rural cooperatives for feed and equipment, storage, electricity, ginning and processing, stockyards and slaughterhouses, etc. Some "community development" programs have brought together many different citizens for local economic planning and promotion, but this has been dominated by Chamber of Commerce approaches.

During the Depression of the Thirties the South learned a number of lessons. (1) First, that the South is not a separate regional compartment but is part and parcel of the national and international economy. The South was the hardest hit of any region by the national depression; (2) Second, that federal assistance is needed if the South is to reach its potential. President Roosevelt, in calling the nation's attention to the South's plight, responded with leadership and federal programs that included TVA, WPA, CCC, agriculture adjustment programs, and assistance for regional study and planning. With this impetus from the federal government, the most comprehensive program of research and planning in the South took place in the thirties. Professor Howard Odum of the University of North Carolina and many others formed the "regional school" of economists, sociologists, planners, anthropologists, geographers, etc., who, in the Southern Regions and other publications surveyed the resources of Dixie and planned for their best use. With the encouragement of the National Resources Planning Board, state planning boards were established to deal rationally with problems of underdevelopment throughout the South.

During World War II, much of this vision of the Thirties was lost. The South came to depend upon military expenditure for its "public works." Muscle Shoals shifted from fertilizer to explosives. TVA power laid the basis for Oak Ridge's nuclear weapons research. Lockhead, Raytheon, Dupont nuclear fuels plant, Pine Bluff Arsenal, Cape Canaveral, Redstone Arsenal and Missile Center--these are the "public works" the South now depends upon. This has tainted the Southerner's view of the Cold War and has narrowed his perspective on government participation in the economy.

The "planning movement" of the Thirties has become the "promotion movement" of the post-war years. Draftsmen and social scientists have been replaced by hucksters and industrial contact men. "Economic development" has come to mean: "Persuade a Yankee plant, any kind, to locate in your town." Rational planning and "developmental concern with health, education, housing, and welfare have taken a back seat to the full-speed-ahead hunt for external investment. Florida spends more than two and one-half million dollars a year on "industrial and tourist promotion." Communities have gambled their public credit on give-away bond issues and have guaranteed low wages to pull plants and processing firms in their area. This has made for grab-bag growth and uneven, "soft" development. There is a desperate need to pull these pieces together and to concentrate on coordinating public approaches to "development" with emphasis on the underdevelopment of human resources (training, health, housing and urban renewal, expanded welfare programs) as well as the need for external investment.

Sadly, many Southern Congressmen have been locked in a coalition with conservative Northern Republicans and have been less concerned with, in fact opposed to, legislation to help the South.

The heart of opposition to federal aid to education, expanded medical programs, improved housing and urban renewal, area redevelopment and public works programs are Dixiecrat Congressmen. This stems partially from the double-standard of States' Rights (remain independent on race, but get as much federal aid as possible) becoming a single negative standard and irrational fears of federal programs being used to destroy segregation. It is also the result of Southern dependence on Northern investment and the desire to build a "conservative" climate to attract it. The basis of the Dixiecrat-GOP coalition goes all the way back to the "Compromise of 1876" with the calling off of Reconstruction for the guarantee of Hayes' election, and continued Northern industrial dominance of the South. FDR broke through this coalition to some extent, but the post-war scene and the rise of the cold war have seen a hardening of it.

The pioneering work of the TVA has trickled down to maintaining the public power establishment. The "creeping conservatism" of TVA is less the fault of the Authority itself and more the fault of the vision (or lack of it) of Congress and the Executive. Bold, new economic development authority is needed across the tributaries of the Tennessee, throughout the Southern Appalachian area, through the Alabama River basin and elsewhere. The Area Redevelopment Administration program has been thus far essentially only a piece-meal loan and grant program to meet immediate "plant-attraction" needs with a few re-training experiments thrown in. The Public Works Bill now up for approval in Congress would speed up spending for public facilities, but there still is a need for long-run public authority to develop the natural and human resources of the South. The same zeal that brought the Peace Corps (does the President have another brother-in-law?) should be dedicated to a "Domestic Peace Corps" which emphasizes the need to fight poverty in the depressed "pockets" (involving, however, as many as 40% of the American people) where it exists in the so-called Affluent Society.

It must be recognized that "progress"--growth of gross product and increase in average per capita income--does not automatically bring justice. As Mike Harrington has suggested in his new book, The Other America, poverty is a "culture" that must be attacked from many directions at once to break its vicious circle. And despite the rise of urban industrialism across Dixie, racism still haunts the region. The Negro is still the most underdeveloped resource in America. His plight is greatest in the South. Attempts to preserve segregation corrode politics and obfuscate all other issues, prevent effective worker organization, lead to irrational plant organization (South Carolina has a law that prohibits whites and Negroes from working in the same textile plant), curb efforts to attract industry (Little Rock got no industrial nibbles for three years after Faubus closed the schools, though things had been booming before that), add to the "welfare" burden and make the administration of welfare programs discriminatory and prevent positive programs from being launched (an Area Redevelopment tractor-training program in the Mississippi Delta area was blocked by local politicians because there were fears that the interracial project would change the existing status of Negro farm laborers.)

Agriculture is not being totally replaced by manufacturing in the South but is changing its form to become more productive. "Industrial agriculture" on larger farms with less persons employed is the future trend (farm employment in the six-state Atlanta area declined 22% to 11% of the total employment from 1950 to 1960). This means that provision must be made for the margin farm worker doomed by technology to find a more productive way of life and make a satisfactory transition to non-agricultural employment. This should not be left to the cruel process of forcing farmers to starvation levels or staging reverse freedom rides to ship persons out of the South. Hopefully, the South can find a use for all its human resources and concentrate on shifting persons from farm employment in the South to productive employment off the farm employment in the South to productive employment off the farm in the South.

At one time the South was an "internationalist" producer of primary products, especially cotton, for foreign manufacturers. Opposition by the South to stiff national tariffs for protection of Northern "infant industries" was one of the official interregional issues at the time of the civil war. However, the South has now become the most "protectionist" region in the country about its "infant industries." The 1959 Southern Governors Conference called for more protection of Southern manufactures from foreign competition. This is clearly a block to the greatest possible flow of economic goods and is only a short-run view to protect marginal firms, textiles in particular. Just as the Southern contribution to cold war tensions because of its zeal for military public works must be seen in broader perspective--so must the rise of protectionism in the South.

As we view the Southern "mixed economy" in 1962 it is clear that vast changes are taking place in the structure of production, the distribution of population, and, more slowly in the social structure. It is important that "New South" fever not take away our critical judgment of the status quo of discrimination and poverty and undemocratic processes that still pervades the South. Southern leaders should not allow the region to make economic growth only a veneer and a "trickle-down" factor that ignores the traditional problems. There is a need for broad secular changes if the "New South" is to be a well-balanced and just society where all its citizens have the opportunity to grow and live in freedom. There is a crying need for broader expenditure for education, training, and research, for more basic community facilities such as sewerage, water plants, roads, for more diversified capital investment in manufacturing with emphasis on "growth" industries such as electronics and more intensive investment in agriculture with emphasis on "industrial agriculture," for direct assistance to the poverty-stricken, for elimination of the walls of race and region that leave literally millions of Southerners of both races still living as second-class citizens.

The southern potential is great. Its topography, soil, climate, water, forests, and mineral resources are abundant. Electrical, nuclear, and solar energy can be produced with relative ease in the southern environment. The South's greatest untapped resource is its people. It could accomodate four or five times the amount of industrial employment it has now. Its biggest problem is not "unemployment" but "underemployment". Healthy transition from the economy built around the plantation and the one-man farm to an economy of large-scale industrial manufacturing and large-scale mechanized agriculture must be made with full opportunity for all its people. The South has almost one-fifth of the nation's land and one-fifth of the nation's people. The land must be used more wisely, more intensively. The people must be trained and educated to face the challenges of an industrial economy.

Many of the problems of southern "economic development" are national problems writ large. The same muddled conceptions of the "mixed economy" that leave the nation subject to irrational laissez-faire attacks on Big Government and Poujadist anti-tax movements, defense as public works, welfare as vested interest rather than lever to opportunity--all haunt the South in double order. Add to this the problem of discrimination written into public law and hardened custom and our image of "another South" is clearly at odds with many contemporary facts.

What we are after is economic progress with justice--opportunity for all southern citizens. The region cannot be visualized apart from its national and world context, but it can be a beginning for attacking problems that plague the globe. A "rurban" South living with ease between uncrowded decentralized, integrated, "green belt" communities and centers of intensive, high-technology, democratically-controlled agricultural and manufacturing industry where all persons participate in economic and political decision-making bound together by broad metropolitan units of government; this is one glance at what the South could become. All persons must be "skilled" and educated and mobile--able to participate in the ongoing economy with full opportunity to grow within it. Urban sprawl without political unity and rural transition without political democratization must be translated into broad "metro" units that plan for needed public facilities, that supply a "floor" under poverty, that assume equal opportunity according to ability and training, that plan for beauty and access to the bounty of southern natural surroundings as well as economic facility, and that strive to make educational centers open and alive to prepare citizens for full, self-conscious, critical participation in society. Racism must be hammered out of the system. The politics must be open to all. Community development should involve all constituents. Service and the cooperative principle should guide economic decision-making--with as much participation as possible by all persons. This is the projection, the goal, the dream.

Where are we to amke our beginnings?

(1) Knowledge must become relevant in the South. The social sciences and the technical-industrial sciences must unite in eliminating the irrationalities of the southern system that make economic progress ambiguous and superficial.

(2) Racism and segregation must be eliminated in all places, all sectors, before the "New South" has even a chance of being anything more than grafting an industrial complex onto the old social structure with built-in alienation and discrimination. Only when the Negro is free of closed doors and the white is free of preoccupation with the Negro, can the Southern economy grow to the benefit of all. Attacks on segregation are economically sound--they are necessary to make the "resources" of the South sufficiently free, mobile and developed to contribute to the greatest possible economic advance. The "dislocation" or "tension" that a sit-in or boycott might bring to a community one day are not debilitating to the economy if in the long-run they bring a new, freer role for the Negro and the white society.

(3) Poverty must be attacked directly, just as discrimination must, as a vicious circle. A new "land grant" type program is needed to expand education, health, and housing opportunities for all southerners. Regional development authorities should be established not only to produce more electrical power, but to plan for the development of depressed "pockets" throughout the South. Public works programs are needed immediately. Long-range planning and careful investment, particularly in intensive, large-unit agriculture and experimental, high-growth-potential industry, must be made. Social and industrial research should become the preoccupation of Southern leaders and Southern public finance with federal help.

(4) Cooperative federalism must be advanced; negative states' rights must be buried. The South needs federal grants-in-aid for education, planning, research, and training, expanded health and welfare programs, urban renewal and housing, highway construction, water, power, and resource development, recreation and parks programs, etc.

(5) The southern economy should be viewed not as an antagonism between city and rural areas, between farms and factories, but as a continuum that is increasingly interdependent. Credit expansion for viable farm production helps cities. New manufacturing industries are crucial for agricultural growth. Technical education is needed by all persons, urban or rural. "Tenantry" and poverty must be attacked with equal fervor in the urban slums and on the marginal, eroded acres. Planning is needed in rural towns as well as in growing metropolitan areas.

(6) All efforts to increase worker participation in economic decision-making must be made. Unionization must be advanced. More experiments in cooperative development must be made (for instance, Negro freeholders in Mississippi who are living on small, marginal plots of land and are shut out of the segregated society, should be aided in more cooperative efforts: equipment-buying, ginning, marketing, etc.). Local and state, as well as federal units of government must strive to unite and coordinate public efforts to make all endeavor subject to the electorate. Needless to say, southern politics must be democratized, demythologized, racially integrated, pluralized, and made issue-relevant before efficient, effective, and truly "representative" government can be expected in the South--and the needed advances in public economic development can be made.

(7) Experimentation with non-military public works must grow. Only if southerners, as well as all Americans, can conceive of power plants, hospitals, highways, experimental factories and farms replacing airplaine-building, explosives-production, and military posts as the base of public "pump-priming" expenditure, can the efforts for a disarmament agreement be on solid ground--and, equally important, can the actual process of staged transition from cold war production to peacetime production be workable. Regional development authorities, public works efforts, hospital construction programs, farm credit plans (where discretion is made about the sort of units getting assistance according to economic growth feasibility), urban renewal and housing programs, Domestic Peace Corps--all must be seen in this "Transition Matrix" as well as in terms of the specific needs and the "mix" between public and private investment.

These are just a few suggestions. The most important thing is that Southerners are aware of the actual trends and problems of the region and are willing to apply their knowledge to political intervention for positive change. Southerners must consider the national and international implications of "southern progress" according to present patterns. Also, southerners should realize the opportunity that the South offers as a place to face some of the worst problems of the world: racism, poverty, militarism, undemocratic politics, irrational and unbalanced development.

While the South is not one of the undeveloped areas of the world, it is underdeveloped in many ways, particularly in its human resources. Though the people and the natural surroundings of the South are dear to many southerners, the stark problems of the past and present in the South must be faced for what they are.

In the words of Walter Hines Page: "We look forward to a golden age that we may surely help to bring, not back to one that never was."

FOREWORD:

One should not, on seeing a 1963 date of presentation for this paper, assume that its relevance is past; As this is being prepared, we hear that yesterday, April 4, 1966, students at Alcorn College were dispersed by the gentle means of billy clubs and boots, as their dormitories were tear-gassed. Indeed the time for "liberal rejoicing" is not yet.

THE POWER OF THE DIXIECRATS

by Tom Hayden

The last major stand of the Dixiecrats may be occurring in the 1963 hearings on the Kennedy civil rights bill. Behind the wild accusations of communism in the civil rights movement and the trumpeted defense of property rights is a thinning legion of the Old Guard. How long will the Dixiecrat be such a shrill and decisive force on the American political scene? The answer requires a review of Southern history, ideology, the policy of the New Frontier, and the international and national pressures to do something about America's racial problem. The conclusion seems to be that the formal walls of segregation are being smashed, but the White Man's Burden can be carried in more subtle ways--as the people of the North well know.

Dixiecrats in History

For more than a generation the Democratic Party has been split deeply between its Southern and Northern wings, the former a safe bastion of racist conservatism and the latter a changing bloc of liberal reformers. The conflict is not new, and cannot be understood properly unless it is traced from the period of the New Deal.

In the 1936 election, the Democratic tide was rolling. Roosevelt brought to power 334 Democrats in the House against 89 Republicans. In the Senate 75 Democrats took seats against only 17 Republicans. The President's inaugural address promised the greatest liberal advances of this century: "I see one-third of a nation ill-housed, ill-clad, ill-nourished...It is not in despair that I paint you that picture. I paint it for you in hope--because the Nation, seeing and understanding the injustice in it, proposes to paint it out."

But Roosevelt, in trying to oust the Dixiecrat bloc from influence, could not escape the contradictions that eventually would paralyze his program. At the 1936 convention he was successful in eliminating a rule that two-thirds of the delegates must support a presidential nominee--a rule that had meant considerable power for the Southern delegations. Roosevelt's next target, an anti-New Deal Supreme Court, was less yielding. He demanded from Congress the power to appoint justices to the court within six months after the seventieth birthday of each. The Congress realized angrily that Roosevelt's intent was not merely more efficiency, but to transform the Court into a legal outpost of the New Deal. Immediately the Southern Democrats and Northern Republicans, joined by a few Northern conservative Democrats began a clamor of opposition. The plan of court re-organization was destroyed--and in the wake, a recalcitrant Congress gained the political initiative.

By the mid-term elections of 1938, Roosevelt and Congress were stalemated, and the nation remained in the clutch of depression. Roosevelt tried to arouse the nation once more in the election campaign, often directing his vehemence against the South, but many of his liberal allies suffered defeat in House and Senate campaigns.

The overt conflict between the New Deal Administration and the powerful Dixiecrat-Republican coalition was slackened by the advent of World War II when the nation's leadership "unified". But immediately after the war, the fight resumed--and reached a peak at the 1948 Democratic Convention, when the Dixiecrats walked out of the party in opposition to its liberal civil rights proposals. Harry Truman's victory over Dewey, coming as it did without the support of either the left-wing Progressive movement or the right-wing State's Rights movement, seemed to signal the beginning of a more consistently liberal and viable Democratic Party. And so, as the 1949 session of Congress began, Administration liberals joined with liberal Republicans to limit the power of the House Rules Committee, a stronghold of remaining Dixiecrat-conservative influence. Under the liberal reform, the Rules Committee was given 21 days to report out a piece of legislation--or else the chairman of the appropriate House Committee could introduce the bill himself. Meant to subvert the tremendous power of the Rules Committee over legislation and the procedures of the House, the new measure was used only eight times.

In 1951, after 29 Democrats, most liberal, were defeated in House contests, the "coalition of Republicans and Southern Democrats, backed by Republican Party leaders and aided by a silent Democratic speaker, restored the group's former privileges" (quoted from Holbert N. Carroll, The House of Representatives and Foreign Affairs, U. of Pittsburgh, 1958, p. 258. For the full debate and proceedings, see Congressional Record, Vol. 95, Oct. 10, 1949, pp. 15096-8.)

Republican strength grew for two years under Eisenhower, but by 1955 the Democrats were returned to congressional committee power. That power was undercut slightly, especially in the Senate, by the remarkable liberal victories in the 1958 elections. But for the most part in recent years, the conservative coalition has ruled Congress as it would a barony.

Dixiecrat Ideology

What are the ideas and programs characteristic of the Dixiecrat establishment?

Often the term "reactionary" has been used glibly by liberal critics to cover a lack of information about specific Dixiecrat behavior which itself is usually not monolithic. In the Thirties there was a minority of Southern "planners" inspired by the National Resources Planning Board, just as today Estes Kefauver had a far different view of economic development than most of his Southern brethren.

Keeping these crucial disunities in mind, it still is fair to lump the Southerners together as conservatives--at least. On the level of political style, the Dixiecrats have been known for a stifling demogoguery that kept the better parts of the Southern white conscience silent and the Negro subordinate in every area of life. On the level of issues. the Dixiecrats generally split from the rest of the Democratic Party. Based on Congressional Quarterly (30 Nov. 1962) recordings of roll-call vote splits between the Dixiecrats and Northern Democrats in 1960 and 1962, the following issue differences are clear:

Civil Rights - Fifteen splits were caused in the 1962 session of the 87th Congress, 12 in the Senate and three in the House; on a constitutional amendment to ban the poll tax, on a bill to restrict the misuse of literacy tests by registrars, and on Thurgood Marshall's nomination for a federal judgeship. In the 1960 session of the 86th Congress, the two wings of the party split on 27 Senate roll-calls and six House roll-calls related to civil rights.

Foreign Aid - Nineteen splits, 13 in the Senate and six in the House, with the Southerners opposing or reducing foreign aid appropriations, and opposing the President's power to send aid to communist nations. In 1960 there were 15 party splits on foreign aid measures. Temporary unemployment compensation, extension to other to other workers--Opposed by a Southern bloc when it came up in 1962. Depressed areas recovery program--Caused two Senate splits and 10 House splits in 1960. Urban Affairs--The conservative coalition successfully opposed the President's plan for a new executive department to be headed by Robert Weaver, the liberal Negro administrator of the Housing and Home Finance Agency. Medical care--The coalition prevented the bill from reaching the House floor and killed it in the Senate in 1962.

Taxes - Seven splits occurred in 1962, the Senate Dixiecrats supporting tax relief for DuPont stockholders, opposing dividend withholding in the Administration's tax bill, and opposing amendments to close tax give-aways and loopholes. In 1960 the House Dixiecrats voted for a "closed rule", a procedure which prevented Northern Democrats from introducing legislation to tax corporation, telephone and passenger transportation services, and temporarily increase the national debt. Minimum wage--South and North split eight times in 1960, the South successfully voting for a minimum extension of coverage and for a wage of $1.15 or lower against the North's proposed $1.25 and broader coverage. Federal aid to education--In 1962 House Dixiecrats killed the President's college aid bill, and Southern Senators voted to delete scholarships from its provisions. In 1960 there were seven splits in which the South opposed federal aid. Housing--In 1960 the Dixiecrat Senators opposed increased public housing authorizations, and Dixiecrat representatives opposed urban renewal and slum clearance grants.[1]

These splits clarify the formal issues on which the Dixiecrats defect from the Democratic Party platform. But there is a spirit as well as a roll-call index that characterizes the Southern establishment. One must read an Eastland speech calling Chief Justice Warren a pro-communist; or a Thurmond press release demanding preparation for a war of extinction; or study the hypocritical grabbing of federal funds while denouncing government spending; or merely know that these politicians are in power only because their constituents are poor, politically voiceless, and segregated--to understand the decadence holding sway in America's foremost democratic institution.

The Base of Power

How do Dixiecrats remain in power? The answer primarily is structural, involving the political shape of the South and of the Congress.

First, until very recently almost all Dixiecrats were elected from one-party, non-competitive districts with relatively low percentages of participating voters. In these circumstances a congressman is more confident of continuous re-election if he can keep his constituents happy or simply acquiescent. Towards Negroes the treatment traditionally has been more severe. They have been excluded from the political process except in instances such as East Texas where they are manipulated by competing white power elites.

Second, although the South is quite diverse, its political representatives historically shared an ideological consensus: the need to defend "the Southern way of life". This defense required unity and, at times, conspiracy against its enemies. Thus the Dixiecrats often operate as a high-consensus, interest-conscious caucus. Their views, except on the matter of overt bigotry, converge with those of northern (usually rural) Republicans to form the bipartisan coalition.

Third, the Congressional system works to the advantage of men with tenure, and men with tenure can make sure the system is perpetuated. The key is the principle of seniority, which permits Congressmen, by virtue of their years in office, to be elevated to increasing heights in the committee structure.[2] "No major Western democracy rewards its politicians with so much power for so little relevant accomplishment," writes James McGregor Burns (Deadlock of Democracy, Prentice-Hall, 1963, p.244). At present, Southerns chair a majority of committees in both Houses of Congress, although they "represent" only two percent of the national population.[3] While seniority is the crucial principle, it is natural that the rest of the congressional rules structure benefits the Southern minority. Rule 22, the "filibuster rule", makes it impossible to end debate on an issue unless two-thirds of the Senate concur. Since Rule 22 was first adopted in 1917, there have been 27 attempts in the Senate to end filibusters (and the 28th probably is coming soon). Eleven of these attempts focussed on civil rights legislation and every one failed to cut off Southern oratory. In addition to specific rules, however, the entire tradition of "senatorial courtesy" inhibits any polarization and conflict aimed at radically changing the policies and structure of Congress.

The forces which historically have held the Dixiecrats in power run deeper than these immediate support mechanisms, of course. They include the usefulness of an easily-exploited Dixieland to Northern and Southern businessmen; the structured ease with which the nation has existed without confronting its problems of racial discrimination, and so on. But seniority, rules systems, and the traditions of "the club" are the immediate pins that secure the Southern bloc.

Kennedy and the South

What has been the relation of the New Frontier to the Southern bloc since 1960? The history shows a steady shift from uneasy fraternity to uncontrollable polarization.

It is not oversimplifying matters too much to claim that Kennedy's 1960 election was the direct result of a sympathetic phone call to Coretta King, whose famous husband Martin was impounded in an Atlanta jail just prior to voting day. Certainly the Kennedy political machine capitalized on the event: 800,000 leaflets describing the phone call were distributed at Negro churches in Chicago two days before the election (Kennedy carried Illinois by a popular total of only 9,000 votes--and received 63.7 per cent of the heavily-Negro Chicago vote).

Richard Nixon, meanwhile, issued a "no comment" on the King incident, intensifying the conservative image he had created earlier when he repudiated Henry Cabot Lodge's "Negro in the cabinet" proposal. For this and other reasons, Kennedy scored huge majorities in the Negro areas of the North: 64% of the city vote in Baltimore, 75% in Boston, 64% in Chicago, 71% in Cleveland, 66% in Detroit, 54% in Los Angeles, 63% in New York, 68% in Philadelphia, 67% in Pittsburgh. Both Republican leader Thruston Morton and Robert Kennedy attributed Nixon's narrow defeat to a failure to hold the Negro voting percentages which Eisenhower secured in 1956 (Ike was supported by 36 per cent, Nixon by less than 25 per cent).

Though enormously dependent on the Northern Negro vote, Kennedy was enmeshed in even deeper political debts to Dixiecrats and their allies. In his book Kennedy in Power (Ballantine, 1962), Prof. James T. Crown reports that in 1960 agreements were made with Southerners that no civil rights legislation would be backed by Kennedy in the first session of Congress and, further, promises were made of military contracts, increases in the cotton support level, and a $100 million loan fund for the South, attached to another bill. Kennedy, who breakfasted cordially with Alabama Governor John Patterson during the campaign, later appointed an old Patterson aide and prominent segregationist to the Export-Import Bank (which transacts business with "underdeveloped" non-white nations). That many other deals probably were struck is suggested by an editorial which appeared in the Birmingham Alabama Journal during the September 1962 Ole Miss crisis: the newspaper attacked the President for violating "pledges previously made to secure the Democratic nomination in 1960".

Thanks to the South's traditional pro-Democratic instincts, disclosed and undisclosed bargains, and the active work of Lyndon Johnson and Robert Kennedy, the President carried seven of the traditional ten Southern states--but only five of them solidly. Excluding the Texas vote which Johnson personally captured, Kennedy's electoral advantage in the South was 70-43, with 14 Mississippi and six Alabama electors defecting from the New Frontier to vote as independents. Kennedy reversed Ike's 1956 success in the South, when the GOP had swept to a 77-50 advantage in the same states. But it should be noted that JFK's surplus 27 votes from the South were still a "cushion" and not a decisive edge. The President finished 81 votes ahead of Nixon and 31 votes over the necessary 269 needed for a electoral college victory. However, the GOP addition of 22 seats in the House crippled the President's legislative chances and, presumably, made him disinclined to alienate those Southern Democrats with whom he disagreed.

The first key to understanding the Kennedy relation to the South, then, is the concept of political balance. The President was elected not just by disparate groups, but by sharply opposed ones, with Kennedy acting as the diplomat-manager of the coalition. In the first year, he sent liberal Mennon Williams to Africa but conservative Charles Meriweather to Export-Import Bank; he strolled with Martin Luther King through the White House but breakfasted with racists as well; he nominated Thurgood Marshall for a federal judgeship but sent four more segregationists to the Southern bench.

The President is fully aware that the Dixiecrats constitute a political impediment to the success of the 1960 Democratic platform. "Some Democrats," he said at a 1962 news conference, "have voted with the Republicans for 24 years, really since 1938, and that makes it very difficult to secure the enactment of any controversial legislation. You can water bills down and get them by, or you can have bills which have no particular controversy to them and get them by."

Their power is not simply political. It is also economic--the Southern Democrats are enabled by their position to demand priviliges that other regions cannot. More specifically, the Administration has seemed reluctant to tread on the interests of Commerce Secretary Luther Hodges, the only Southerner in the Cabinet. Hodges is a former governor of North Carolina and executive of the Southern Textile Manufacturer's Association, the South's most crucial--and most segregated--industry, with 800,000 operatives. Hodge's record indicates little sympathy for the development of racially-integrated labor unions in the South even though they are the only conceivable means by which the Negro will obtain the economic security he desperately needs. At least for the present, Kennedy's establishment rests partially on the support of those who hold the Negro in the lowest sectors of the economy.

Two further factors are operative in the Kennedy program, however, which crucially affect his approach to the South and civil rights. One is the Cold War, which demands that in appearance at least we brush off our racism. Secretary of State Rusk calls racial discrimination the "biggest single burden that we carry on our backs in the foreign relations of the 1960's". While Cold War diplomacy dictates improved race relations on the one hand, it requires also the playing down of incidents which receive front-page attention in the African press. For the Kennedys these colliding requirements have led, externally, to displays of "vigor" with spare content and, internally, to a steady pressure on the civil rights movement to achieve its gains through the courts and negotiation.

The other factor is the evasive one of mood and style. The New Frontiersmen are young, urbane, filled with a sense of internationalism that opposes racial bigotry. But while acknowledging much of the modern world, they do not dream of a seriously better life or act on the basis of human values. "Unlike many of the New Dealers of 30 years ago, they have no illusions about remaking America. Crusades are not their style; fanaticism is foreign to them. They are men of power who enjoy high offices because they like to run things...their approach to politics is manipulative and managerial," writes William Shannon (American Scholar, Fall 1961, p.486). This mood leads to bartering with entrenched Dixiecrats and to discomfort with the spontaneity and revolutionary mood of many Negro demonstrators.

In this context, the Kennedy administration has done much more in the field of civil rights than any other government--and yet one can argue that the American race problem has grown worse in the 60's, especially in the North, in housing, schooling, and jobs. At a time when the cumulative effects of centuries of racism are running against the "status" of America in a new world, it is doubtful that irregular and partial measures can root out the sore. Kennedy's relations with Congress, up to this summer's unavoidable crisis, show clearly the dismal lines of "progress".

Kennedy and Congress

In the first days of the 1961 session, there was a major liberal effort to amend Rule 22 to permit closure by majority, or even by three-fifths of the senators present and voting. Despite a platform pledge to "safeguard majority rule", the President refused to side with the liberals--and the measure was buried in committee on a motion by Majority Leader Mansfield, the vote being only 50-46. "Mansfield did not bring up the issue again until the September adjournment rush was on. The Liberal's defeat came in slam-bang order," according to Congressional Quarterly (January 4, 1963, p. 12).

The President also passed up the opportunity to support Senator Joseph Clark's move to unseat any Democratic Committee chairman who disagreed with the platform plank related to his committee's area of legislation, which would have robbed the Dixiecrats of their essential power.

Finally, Kennedy approved the modest course of expanding the House Rules Committee from 12 to 15 members--a move that barely succeeded and which has meant very little subsequently because of the extreme conservatism of the House. The enlarged Rules Committee in 1962 released tax and trade bills, but killed measures in civil rights, urban affairs, youth employment, mass transportation, and college aid.

In May, Senator Clark and Representative Emanuel Celler introduced a civil rights "package" especially aimed at discrimination in voting and education. Although the President had designated the two Democrats to prepare the legislation, new Press Secretary Pierre Salinger commented: "The President has made it clear that he does not think it necessary at this time to enact civil rights legislation."

The President was vacuous in his 1962 message to Congress. "The President linked the approaching centennial of the Emancipation Proclamation with a plea for fuller guarantees of racial equality, then made it plain he had nothing original to put forward in this regard," editorialized the New York Times.

In April, two voting bills, with Administration endorsement, reached Congress. One recommended action to prevent the discriminatory use of literacy tests, and to make sixth-grade education (or its equivalent) the only requisite for registration. The other called for elimination of the poll tax requirements in the five states where they still are used.

It is a stunning comment on America that its Senate voted against the bill to prevent the racial use of literacy tests. It was filibustered to death, with Administration lobbyists expressing no essential interest. Anthony Lewis wrote in the Times, "President Kennedy may have wanted the literacy bill as an abstract matter. But he said little on its behalf and did not act to make it a major public concern." The anti-poll tax bill did pass, however, with most Dixiecrats opposing it. But its significance is small, since it will take nearly five years in ratification and only affect a few areas at that time.

After two years of waiting for New Frontier action, New York Post reporter Milton Viorst wrote, "Southerners, especially those in the House, voted against most key Administration programs anyway--despite appeasement on civil rights." For example, as Spelman College Professor Howard Zinn pointed out, Georgia Senators Russell and Talmadge both voted with the New Frontier on only two of 12 key issues in 1961, and these two votes were on a non-controversial farm proposal. So it went with other Southern delegations.

In January 1963, Senate liberals again organized unsuccessfully to fight the Southern filibuster. They began a filibuster of their own early in the session, demanding a ruling from Vice President Johnson that the new Senate operate under general parliamentary rules until specific rules are adopted--which would permit a majority, instead of two-thirds, to eliminate Rule 22. Johnson, presumably representing Kennedy, ruled against the liberals, arguing that the Senate is a "continuing body" operating under its past rules. The Administration did succeed, however in obtaining permanence for the enlargement of the Rules Committee. The price of this ambiguous achievement, however, was silence by liberals on all other congressional reforms.

Then, shortly after, the President presented his first major civil rights message, calling for several reforms which would improve the effectiveness of voter registration efforts in the South, and which would aid school districts trying to desegregate in areas hostile to integration. Although very moderate, as shown by the stronger legislation demanded by the Republican liberal leadership two weeks later, these were important proposals in the history of the New Frontier.

Reforming the Dixiecrats?

During the entire period, the New Frontier was advancing a cautious but substantial program of reforming the Dixiecrat contingent. Through foundation contacts and Justice Department initiative, it was supporting--usually with equivocation--the voter registration and direct action drives of civil rights organizations. It was prudently edging the Executive establishment out of its more glaring attachments to bigotry--hiring practices were changed, some federally-subsidized housing was covered by non-discrimination agreements, etc. It was seeking to persuade "reconstructible" Southern officials of the need for new attitudes, and everywhere it was building contacts with and strengthening pro-Kennedy Democratic organizations in Southern states. This spring the Administration broke custom by openly trying to purge 13 Dixiecrat representatives by financing their "moderate" opponents, an action not tried since Roosevelt's miserable failure in 1938.
